Mr. Tebbit: After a moment's thought, my right hon. Friend will want to change slightly what he said a few moments ago. He said, or certainly implied, that the attitude of the Irish Republic or Belgium about the extradition of suspected terrorists was conditioned in some way by Britain's attitude towards the EMS. I am sure that my right hon. Friend did not mean that and I am absolutely sure that it is not true. I should like him to make it clear that he did not mean that.

Mr. Heath: I meant exactly what I said. The attitude of countries is affected psychologically by how other countries behave towards them, and anybody with experience of international politics knows that full well.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): My right hon. Friend is in danger of injuring his own reputation. Is he really seeking to say that Britain's failure to join the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS is some kind of justification for the refusal of the Belgian Government to respond to our request for the extradition of Mr. Ryan?

Mr. Heath: I am not in any way saying that it is a justification, but that it is an explanation of the attitude of many other countries towards us when they find that we are not co-operating with them. That psychology spreads and affects their other activities. My hon. Friend ought to know that.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will my right hon. Friend consider what he has said? He said that we were not co-operating with the Belgians. Can he tell us what we did when we were asked to extradite the football hooligans who were at the Heysel stadium?

Mr. Heath: My hon. Friend should look at the campaign carried on as a result of our actions by the British press about the Belgian constitutional and legal systems.

The important thing is to concentrate on the Chancellor's position about the European Community. Again I strongly urge him at least to explain his position, even if he will not reconsider it. He should explain why he continues to stay outside the European monetary system at a time when the use of the ecu is expanding in the City. The banking system wants to go in and recognises that the City of London will not be able to hold its position unless Britain is a full member of the European monetary system. I do not want him to come along and lament that the Community has gone ahead on its own and done it without us. In the words of some members, "Well, if you want to stay outside and be a second-rate state on a second-rate tier, that is up to you. We shall go ahead." That is clearly the mood at the moment, and I want my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to recognise that. Unless he does, our interests will be gravely damaged.

5.20 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) had some sympathy for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do not know about sympathy, but I think that most of us will have some understanding of the dilemma in which the Chancellor finds himself. The problem now facing both him and the economy is that we have reached the end of the go part of the stop-go cycle. It has been a very long go. Stop-go cycles are usually of a much shorter duration. This is a historically long one, and it has lasted for about five or six years, depending on one's definition. It has lasted longer than any previous cycle because of North sea oil. The oil allowed us to carry on the go part of the stop-go cycle to such an extent.

What has happened is that this stop has marked the end of the hopes that some of us had that North sea oil would be used beneficially for manufacturing industry—the only use of that money that would have produced abiding rewards for our country rather than the short-lived ones of consumerism or remittances obtained for sending oil money abroad. As the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said, the problem now is a familiar one in our post-war economy, but it is a much bigger one. We have to address ourselves to how we control this big expansion of credit and this consumer boom.

When the Chancellor talked about a blip, he did a disservice to the important argument and discussions facing us today. It is incomprehensible to talk about a blip of £12 billion to £14 billion, or maybe even £15 billion. In 1964, we had an £800 million balance of payments deficit. If we exclude capital inflows, it was about £360 million. That is equivalent in real terms to something far below anything in which we are engaged today. It took from 1964 to 1969, and a sterling devaluation, to correct that deficit, which is small by today's standards. Nobody could have called that a soft landing. Indeed, it was a particularly hard one. The soft landing for a balance of payments deficit of the size that we have now, of previously unimaginable proportions, is likely to take longer still unless certain measures are taken.

According to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the deficit should not have been there at all. His policy, through monetarism and reduction in the PSBR, would bring about the solutions to all our economic problems. The Chancellor now seems to believe, or did until recently, that excessive private expenditure is less serious than high public expenditure. However, he has responsibility for the economy as a whole, whether the spending is private or public. It is not less serious because there is a bigger import content in private expenditure than in public expenditure.

Just to take responsibility for public expenditure and leave private spending to take care of itself is wholly wrong, because the Chancellor knew in March of the problems with which he was being faced. He knew certain of the difficulties of the credit expansion, for example, and if he had considered the possibility of the £4,000 million of balance of payments deficit, which he predicted then, turning into £15,000 million, would he still have made those tax cuts? It is my belief that he made those tax cuts because he thought that early in the life of this Parliament was the only opportunity he would have to effect tax cuts during his time as Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was a miscalculation. There has been a huge expansion of credit, and mortgage relief, which now costs £4·5 billion, is an important element of that credit expansion. The Chancellor says that mortgage relief ought not to be in the retail price index, but he does not take into account the enormous inflation in house prices, which does not show in the retail price index. That is one of the major aspects of inflation.

The Chancellor said in Southport on Saturday 26 November:

> "We have never never run away from difficult decisions."

A U-turn is a difficult decision, but it is a political decision. It only causes embarrassment. What we need is an economic decision to deal with our economic problems, and those problems stare us in the face. What we need most of all is an autumn Budget. The Chancellor, and the rest of the Government, have scorned all past autumn Budgets, but when there is something unforeseen, one needs an autumn Budget. The Chancellor said that this was unforeseen. If it is unforeseen, that is the case for an autumn Budget. He is prevented from introducing an autumn Budget because of the statement that he has made so frequently and because of the obstinacy and obduracy that the Government have shown in this matter.

I thought that we might have been able to stretch on until the spring, but it seems to me that we cannot wait that long. We need to take action immediately. In the past, one might have been able to deal with the matter by imposing quotas on imports and other such measures, but those options are not available to us today, so we must look at the various possibilities of which we are able to make use. They are fairly restricted—taxation or a monetary squeeze.

As the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said, credit controls have limitations. One cannot do everything through credit controls, but one can make some use of them. The Chancellor said that credit controls were unfair to those who did not have the economic expertise to deal with such matters. It was a touching regard for the unsophisticated, which came oddly from his lips. One can take some action. National savings have for decades been making money from the unworldly people who put money into them. We need some sort of action—limited but valuable, and a useful addition to the kind of controls that might help to reduce the amount of credit in circulation. Hire purchase restrictions and other measures are all options that have been used in the past and they can have some effect.

Then there is taxation. There is nothing to stop the Chancellor using the regulator in an autumn Budget; a budget surplus, which he has enjoyed does not eliminate the need to slow down the economy by other means than interest rates. The give-away to the wealthy did not just mean the £2 billion to £3 billion to them. It generated the view and created the climate among those who benefited and among many others that happy days were here and would stay here, and they went out and spent and spent, and spent much more than they were given in any tax relief.

We need to ensure that we have a clear decision, made by Parliament, that there will be a reduction in the amount of money available to people. Interest rates do not provide that. Interest rates hurt industry, whose investment has to compete with the return from lending money which has jumped from 7·5 per cent. to 13 per cent., and industry has to compete with the banks, who charge businesses 15 to 16 per cent. on the money that they want to invest. Which business can get such a return from investment? The major competitors of many industries are the banks, because one can get a better return from banks than from investing in industry. That is one of the serious consequences.

When the APR on consumer credit is 27 or 28 per cent., a 1 per cent. increase means very little, even if people know about it, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said. If people know about it, what does an extra 1 per cent. mean? To investors, it means something. We also have the problem of a failure to invest at a time when there is an economic downsurge. That is the major problem facing us.

High interest rates intended to deter consumption push up the value of the pound. There is no targeting of any of this, but the two go together, and each of them is a deterrent to British manufacturing industry. High interest rates bear upon people's expenditure, the pound goes up and we then have difficulty in obtaining exports, and great difficulty in investment at home.

We have here the classic situation that we had in 1979-81. There is the danger of repetition of something that burnt into my soul, because it transformed the reasonably prosperous town of Ashton-under-Lyne into a town which is far less prosperous today. We are one of the towns that depend very much on small manufacturing industry. We lost 30 per cent. of that manufacturing industry. Small firms, medium-sized firms and medium-tech firms were destroyed by those policies. The demand is now there, but we do not have the capacity or even the industries to meet it. We cannot recreate those industries when the demand returns. The consequence is that we now have to import their goods. With the damage caused by the high pound, import penetration is made easier and home sales are reduced. That is the situation that we face.

At six o'clock on Saturday 26 November, on Radio 4, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the > "British economy is very strong indeed."

That is one of the most crass remarks that I have heard in my economic experience. We are weak industrially, weak in manufacturing industry and weak in responding to levels of demand that we should have been well capable of meeting. We are squeezed at home and abroad.

The medicine that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is prescribing is the same kind of medicine, under much harsher conditions, that was tried between 1979 and 1981. It was a poison then and it is a poison now. There is only one realistic solution for the Chancellor. He should remove his pride from his now threadbare cloak and bring in an autumn Budget.

5.31 pm

Mr. Norman Tebbit (Chingford) : I am sure that I was not the only hon. Member today who felt a great deal of sadness that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) was still too unwell to join us in our debates. We miss him. A Labour Member has just said that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was rather glad that he was not here. I suppose that that could be true in view of the mess that the latest yuppie on the Opposition Front Bench made of his chance to play understudy to his right hon. and learned Friend. I thought that it was perhaps just my perception, but I am glad to know that it was perceived by some Opposition Members.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tebbit: I shall not give way.

Mr. Ewing: Just for a moment?

Mr. Tebbit: I am terribly sorry, but no.

With inflation on the rise and the deficit on our trading account, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) must have thought that he had the luck to be the first Labour economic spokesman for years to have the opportunity in a debate to have a little straw with which to make his bricks. Unfortunately, he dropped them all even before he had finished making them.

The one thing that I found particularly odd about the hon. Gentleman's speech was his reluctance to give way when he could have been corrected and prevented from making some of his mistakes. In his litany of forthcoming price increases next spring, he referred to increases in Telecom prices. I wonder whether he was aware that the basket of main charges for Telecom has been frozen for the past two years and will remain frozen until August of next year at the very least. When he returns to the Chamber, perhaps he will tell us whether he knew that and when it last happened under a Labour Government or whether it ever happened while the industry was nationalised.

The hon. Gentleman was agitated about inflation. Some of us with longer political memories than his remember that double-digit inflation was a Socialist innovation. Indeed, during the term of the last Labour Government, the RPI rose by 112·3 per cent. in just over six years. This Government have been in office for nine and a half years and the increase in prices is 10 per cent. less than that. When we discuss inflation with Front-Bench Opposition Members, those discussions might at least contain a little humility.

The hon. Gentleman forgot to tell us when the last Labour Government achieved an inflation rate that was lower than the rate about which he was complaining today. I suspect that he forgot to tell us because he could not find the figures in the book.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tebbit: If the hon. Gentleman will excuse me, I shall treat him with the courtesy with which his hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East treated me.

On the balance of payments, Labour was in deficit every year except one. By the 10th anniversary of this Government, they will have been in surplus for seven years out of 10. What is more, Labour also achieved huge budget deficits whereas my right hon. Friend is achieving substantial surpluses.

However, the hon. Gentleman's speech was devalued because it was so heavy and over the top on forecasts of disaster and so light on firm policy proposals. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) made three clear points as policy recommendations. We did not hear one from Labour Front-Bench Members. We could perhaps with advantage bring back some of the old men and get rid of some of the young ones.

I have looked back at past debates on the Loyal Address. There is a strong similarity in Opposition speeches over the years with one exception: today there is even less effort than ever before to pose an alternative strategy. In May 1979 the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) opened the debate in the light of the first of the three Labour election defeats. He ended his speech with a good question. He said:

> "the policies to which the right hon. Lady committed herself at the time of the election were tried by her predecessor and failed. Why does she expect to succeed where the right hon. Member for Sidcup (Mr. Heath) was forced to admit failure within 18 months?"—[Official Report, 22 May 1979; Vol. 967, c. 891.]

That is a good question that we might all consider. Perhaps the best replies could be put in over Christmas to one of those contests in the Sunday papers.

It was only a week earlier than that that Mr. Callaghan, as he then was, had observed:

> "This period of Tory rule will be a brief interruption, and then we shall resume the march forward"—[Official Report, 15 May 1979; Vol. 967, c. 73.]

—in his case, a march forward to the House of Lords. By November 1981, Mr. Silkin, winding up for the Opposition, said:

> "Import controls and massive public investment are one way.
> . . . Here again the Labour party has a unanimous belief that exchange controls ought to be dealt with, and used in our favour."—[Official Report, 11 November 1981; Vol. 12, c. 617.]

We have not heard those remedies today, so there has at least been some progress in that Opposition Members have no policies rather than those policies. I do not know whether they still share Mr. Silkin's wish, which he expressed that night, that he wanted to restore the top rate of tax to 83 per cent., or whether they wish to restore it to only 60 per cent. However, either way, it is unlikely to happen.

[Mr. Tebbit]

In November 1982, the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) opened the debate, full of gloom for the economy and optimism for Labour, which were both falsified. Abusing my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), just as he has been abused today, the right hon. Gentleman said:

> "Who can fail to forget the scream of bubbling optimism that issued from the Chief Secretary in speech after speech throughout the winter and spring of this year, culminating in his famous assertion that he could see signs of recovery everywhere? . . . The truth is that on present policies, reinforced by the attacks on the publicly-owned industries, there will not be 'a sustainable growth in output' . . . and there will be no reduction . . . in the number out of work."—[Official Report, 10 November 1982; Vol. 3[illegible] 560–63.]

The right hon. Gentleman has been proved substantially wrong.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney) rose——

Mr. Tebbit: Of course I am willing to give way to him.

Mr. Shore: I think that the right hon. Gentleman will agree with me on two points. First, there was no reduction in unemployment between 1982 and 1986. That was a four-year period in which unemployment was around the 3 million mark. Secondly, not even in 1986 had we recovered to the same level of manufacturing output in our industry that we had in 1979.

Mr. Lawson: That is not true.

Mr. Tebbit: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, part of the right hon. Gentleman's intervention was not true. Secondly, he has not met my point, which is that he said that on the policies to which he referred there would be no reduction of unemployment. In fact, there has been a long, continuous and substantial reduction in unemployment.

It is time that a touch of realism was introduced into our debates and I should like to help to introduce it. I shall quote Lord Prior, who was interviewed recently on the BBC. He finished by saying:

> "As things are at the moment, I think that the economy is overheated. I think the Chancellor's measures will help to bring it back under control. I'm a supporter of the Chancellor in what he is seeking to do. It will now take time to come round and I don't think we can look for instant results and I would expect high interest rates to be with us until the middle of next year."

Lord Prior was speaking, I think, as the chairman of one of the largest manufacturing companies in Britain, not as a politician. Contrary to what has been suggested by the Opposition, there is considerable confidence both in the economy and in the conduct of the economy by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer by those who are at the sharp end of business, as opposed to those who would not recognise the blunt end of most businesses. As the House will know, I am a director of four major public companies and one private company.

It is possible to criticise any Chancellor of the Exchequer; none of them gets everything right. Indeed, before 1979, some of them managed to get everything wrong. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup suggested that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a one-club golfer and that he should get some more clubs. I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup that the most important thing is to be able to play the game and to have a proven handicap that is better than that of any of the other players in this place for a start.

In the real world, industry and commerce are not in seething discontent. Of course, not everything is perfect. Most of us, except importers, would like sterling to be a bit lower, except when we are buying in foreign components, semi-finished goods or raw materials, when we would like it to be a bit higher. Most of us would like interest rates to be a bit lower. However, the difference in United Kingdom costs from those of our competitors arising from interest rate differentials has proven to be rather less on the whole than the difference arising from differentials in the unit cost of labour. We have made great progress in increasing productivity and holding down unit labour costs, but so have our competitors. I had hoped that there would be some common ground between us all on that, but, sadly, that is not so.

It would have been pleasing recently to hear trade union leaders, whose members have done well in recent years, taking the lead in seeking further ways to cut the costs of industry, not to inflate them. Perhaps whoever replies for the Opposition will say whether the Opposition believe that pay settlements that are well above the retail prices index are benign or damaging to the interests of the economy, or even to those who gain them, unless they are fully justified by productivity advances.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): How much productivity has the right hon. Gentleman given?

Mr. Tebbit: Sufficient to convince my colleagues who hold responsibility for businesses that it is worth while to employ me. The hon. Gentleman is free to apply for a job and to ascertain whether anyone wants to employ him.

What are the effects of the increase in interest rates that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has introduced? In my experience, retail sales have slowed sharply but not uniformly, and that is exactly what we should expect. Monthly outgoings for a first-time buyer have increased by about 35 per cent., so the froth is certainly off the house market. Many mortgagors are only just beginning to pay the higher rates, and many will not do so until the new year or even later. The slowdown in retail sales is therefore skewed towards more up-market goods as those other than mortgagors are still enjoying the tax cuts of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and are little affected by the increase in interest rates.

Most people do not borrow money on their credit cards, or certainly not into the interest rate range. The majority of card holders clear their account at the end of the month. As my right hon. Friend has said, credit cards are not the major problem of credit control. The major problem of credit expansion has been in lending through building societies and banks. We all know that from the letters that we receive from our building societies in which the society offers to lend us another £5,000 or so for anything we want, such as a holiday abroad or consumer goods. That is where the leakage of cash is to be found.

The boom in the construction industry is still going ahead. It is taking place on the impetus of events before the summer. Undoubtedly there will be a considerable cooling off in that industry next year. From now on my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer must be extremely careful in his use of further interest rate changes, because what he has done already has probably wound a quite powerful deflationary spring. The full effect of past increases in rates has not yet been felt and it may be that it has not been enough. We do not yet know. On the other hand, it would be easy to pile on too much further pressure and then find that the force of the deflationary spring is too great.

All that underlines the fact that the Opposition are hopelessly wrong in their prescriptions, such as they are. If the tax cuts were withdrawn, presumably the Opposition would want not an ever larger Budget surplus but an increase in public spending, much of it putting more spending power into the hands of those who are least likely to be savers, or into non-wealth creating or even wealth-destroying schemes.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made a trenchant defence of his record and his policy. On form as a Chancellor, and on his handicap in this economic game, he has no equal, certainly not in the House. The Opposition have advanced no alternative policies that we can consider. Presumably that is because those that they cooked up at the SOGAT rest home—how singularly appropriate that it was SOGAT of all unions —were the result of discussing how to improve the supply side of the economy. SOGAT! Oh dear, what ironies we find in the Opposition's actions. Despite that meeting, they have no policies that they yet dare to disclose.

On the record of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and on his policies, he has already won the debate. He has won the support of his party and that of a far wider constituency in addition. He has won especially the support of those who are running industry instead of running it down.

5.48 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) seemed to have full recourse to his notes as he gave a commentary on what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said earlier this afternoon. It was clearly based on what he had decided to say before the debate began. There was a sting in the tail when the right hon. Gentleman said that the piling on of further interest rate increases, should that be indicated to the Chancellor by further trade deficit problems, which we may well have, could cause serious problems to industry. In a rather more generous way than some other Conservative Members the right hon. Gentleman is giving a not proven verdict. It was the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), who chairs the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, who said that the jury was out, considering its verdict on the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

It is an unusual Gracious Speech debate that turns into a confidence debate on the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Ten days ago, it seemed that it would focus on the Chancellor's animadversions on the pensioners. Within a few days a new subject for a confidence debate had been spawned, following the latest trade figures. The message that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given to Conservative Members is that there will be no change in policy, that "What we shall do will be unpopular" and that "It is all very simple and it will be all right in the end." Those are the key points of the message. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's forecasting record is sufficiently bad for me not to want to concede too much to him. He is right in predicting that what the Government will do will be unpopular. It may be that there will be no change, but it is certainly not simple. To talk about it all being simple was a surprising observation for him to make. I do not believe that everything will turn out all right in the end.

The measure of how far the Chancellor has got it wrong is provided in his Budget speech in March 1988. He said:

> "inflation is forecast to end the year at 4 per cent. While this is still too high, it is a testimony to the soundness of our policies that the present strong and sustained upswing . . . has not led to any resurgence of inflation."

Last month inflation rose to 6·4 per cent. and it is unlikely to keep within the Autumn Statement forecast for an average of 6·25 per cent. in the last quarter of 1988. [Interruption.] I see that not only is the jury out, but the defendant is out as well. The Chancellor is leaving the proceedings as he is unable to bear it any longer.

The last Gracious Speech referred to:

> "Policies designed further to reduce inflation."—[Official Report, 25 June 1987; Vol. 118, c. 39.]

In this Gracious Speech we are only promised policies designed to "bear down on inflation". I do not know what the phrase "bear down" means. If my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) was "bearing down" perhaps there would be some prospect of inflation actually going down. However, the idea of "bearing down" on inflation as a substitute for further reducing it seems to be an index of how far the Government's targets have slipped.

Later in his Budget speech the Chancellor said:

> "the current account of the balance of payments is forecast to remain in deficit this year, by some £4 billion, . . . I foresee no difficulty in financing a temporary current account deficit of this scale."—[Official Report, 15 March 1988; Vol. 129, c. 996.]

Of course, the reality is that after the worst ever figures we are heading for a deficit of £12 billion or perhaps £14 billion in the current year and hence the high interest rates.

When speaking to the Treasury Select Committee in March, the Chancellor said

> "I am not concerned about overheating in the economy, though one has to be vigilant all the time."

In March, we had a strategy of massive tax cuts against a background of the explosion of credit opportunities which the deregulation had brought about. That created a spending climate. The right hon. Member for Chingford referred to the kind of letters that banks are sending out. It is really quite extraordinary to read what has been sent out in recent months. The post boxes and doormats around the country are littered with computerised letters from banks. I have an example with me from the National Girobank which is still a publicly owned body, although the Government are trying hard to sell it. The letter states:

> "Do you need money right away?
> Like most people, you can probably afford to increase your monthly outgoings because of tax cuts made in the Budget last March. So why not use the extra to improve your lifestyle? After all, you've worked hard for it."

How do they know?

> "Maybe you would like to replace your car . . . splash out on a new bedroom or kitchen . . . enjoy a luxury holiday . . . or treat yourself to something really special."

An accompanying circular states:

> "Yes you can replace your car . . . you can afford that fitted kitchen . . . you can take a well deserved holiday . . .
> With a Girobank Personal Loan, you can say goodbye to window shopping and buy the things you want right now."

[Mr. A. J. Beith]

We have all received stacks of those letters. People all over the country have received such material and, along with the tax cuts, these letters create a spending climate. [Interruption.] I must state that I have never paid a penny in interest on a credit card nor have I responded to the invitations from the National Girobank.

The effect of all this is that tax cuts began to fuel consumer spending before the money was in people's pockets. They had that effect before the cuts fed through into pay packets and the effect has continued. Alongside that, there was an abandonment of any real monetary strategy. The only monetary target now referred to is M0, which does not even involve the bank loans or other means of consumer credit. That is a recipe for inflation by anybody's reckoning. That is classic text book, demand-led inflation. Too much money is chasing too few home-produced goods. That problem will now be compounded by the Chancellor's measures feeding through wage bargaining.

The Chancellor is trying to be a post-Keynesian by downgrading demand management to something which he believes is not an essential responsibility of Government. In fact, he has turned himself into a pre-Keynesian by ignoring the effect of fiscal policy on demand in the economy. We are now paying the price for that, and what a price. There have been crippling increases for home buyers, especially those in the south-east, who, because of high house prices, have had to lay out very large sums of money and are committed to the hilt. There has also been a further twist to next year's inflation spiral. I do not know how the Chancellor can say that that is not inflation as other countries understand it. In this country it is Government policy hugely to increase home ownership and in this country home ownership depends on mortgages. Therefore, for many people inflation is drastically affected by the level of house prices and interest rates.

Along with all that there is a potentially serious restraint on investment, especially in smaller businesses. The right hon. Member for Chingford referred to the chairman of GEC. They both speak from the vantage point of being members of the largest companies who, as a result of their exchange rate activities, are best able to insulate themselves from these problems and whose cash flow is the most comfortable at the moment. However, many medium-sized and smaller businesses and many innovative businesses are facing the greatest difficulties in investment in the present circumstances.

There will be short-term upward pressure on sterling which threatens the competitiveness of manufacturing industry. The Chancellor's forecasts are suffused with optimism. I believe that there will be a much larger trade deficit than the Chancellor predicts, that there will be lower output growth than he hopes for and that all this could actually take us to a sterling crisis. It is such a dangerous mix that, rather than be advised from the Opposition Benches to resign, the Chancellor might do well to take that job in the City now and not be around when it all comes to the boil.

The Chancellor is arrogantly unrepentant. The key passage in the Gracious Speech states that public expenditure will continue to fall

"as a proportion of national income, thus providing scope for further reductions in taxation, as and when prudent."

Presumably the Chancellor thought that major tax reductions were prudent in the spring which does not say much for his grasp of prudence. He is like someone convicted of driving through red lights who causes a serious accident and who says to the court, "I'll do it again whenever I think it's prudent to go through the red light." That is the message in the Gracious Speech.

What measures could the Chancellor take now to have some effect on the crisis which would make him less dependent on interest rates? First, he could make it quite clear that there will be no income tax cuts next spring unless there is a major turn-round in the economy which none of us, not even he, is now predicting. If he finds any scope to cut the burden of taxes, he could look to employers' national insurance contributions and offer some relief on savings. If he feels it necessary, there are some areas in which he could make useful changes.

Secondly, he could take urgent measures to boost savings. It is evident that high interest rates by themselves have not prevented us from having a very bad savings ratio. He should stop dropping hints about means testing pensioners' benefits. That leads people to believe that saving is not worth while. I am sure that Conservative Members find, as I find, constituents coming to them saying that they have saved all their life but now find that the little bit in the bank stops them getting help even to insulate the loft, let alone receiving benefits being received by people who in reality are better off than them. Many of my elderly constituents have told me that.

The Chancellor is creating a spending climate which does not support saving. He should reverse that and go further by looking for new tax reliefs which offer opportunities to people whom the personal equity plan scheme will not reach. There are opportunities for a much wider range of personal savings designed to shift that adverse savings ratio.

Thirdly, the Chancellor could call in the credit-giving institutions to discuss how credit expansion can be restrained so as to avoid the necessity for cumbersome, uneven and inequitable credit controls. I am no enthusiast for credit controls and I share some of the Chancellor's misgivings about their effectiveness. However, it must be said that credit controls which have some uneven effects might in some circumstances be better than none at all even if their effect was incomplete. However, that is not a measure I would like the country to adopt if we can possibly avoid it. Let us start talking. Let us see the Chancellor and the Bank of England talking to the banks and credit-giving institutions about the kind of nonsense that I read to the House earlier and the high pressure to borrow and spend. Otherwise those institutions may find themselves talking to the Chancellor about cumbersome and highly inconvenient credit control arrangements which the Chancellor may have to devise as an emergency measure.

Fourthly, the Chancellor could show some evidence that he is starting on some of the major long-term tasks that are woefully absent from the Gracious Speech. There should be real efforts about skill training, research and development, investment, improvement in labour mobility and an attack on the regional maldistribution in the economy. He should embark on tax and benefit integration, which will help to ensure that benefits are directed to those who most need them and ensure that they are taken up. He should address, like the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), the question of the European monetary system. The Chancellor is making it harder to get Britain into it at the moment. It was ironic that the Prime Minister's only stated reason earlier for Britain not entering the exchange rate mechanism was that the Germans might force us to press down more firmly on inflation than the British Government would want. That is an extraordinary argument for us to have been kept out of the exchange rate mechanism for so long.

Then I want to see the Chancellor attacking monopoly instead of creating more and more and transferring it from the public to the private sector virtually unscathed, as has been the Government's record. Attacking monopoly is one way of attacking inflation, because monopoly is one of the means by which unrealistically high prices are sustained.

I should like to see the Government embarking on many of the wider long-term measures that have economic importance, to which our amendment refers. We have tried to set out some alternatives, a task for which we are equipped. The official Opposition, on their own admission, got it wrong at the election. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), in a paper which seems to have gained wider circulation than he intended, said:

> "Before the last election we were vulnerable to the charge that by proposing to raise public spending as a means of reducing unemployment, we were ready to take risks with inflation and the balance of payments."

The hon. Gentleman is now engaged on a perfectly proper and honourable search for alternative measures to those that the Labour party advanced at the election. The problem that he faces is that they have no real ideological base. If he shifts away from the ideological basis on which the Labour party is founded, he will have some difficulty in finding an alternative. That is why I feel much more comfortable advocating policies based on the individual in a free society and in a free market, policies that build on the capacity of individuals to work together to build a fairer society and stronger communities and to obtain a cleaner environment, if those individuals and communities are given power and responsibility.

A primarily collectivist society is not a worthwhile or electable alternative. Ours is, and it is the only viable alternative to the most centralising and arrogant Government in modern British history. It is not just the Chancellor who deserves to go, it is the whole lot, some of them on the ground that they have allowed their Government to bring in measures in which they cannot possibly believe. I urge the House to support the amendment in the name of my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): I agree with the criticism made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) that he made no alternative suggestion about how our economy could be improved.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) drew our attention to 1973. But, as has been pointed out before, after the U-turn, 1973 did not help our economy much at all. In fact, it subsequently led to our defeat. I am sorry that my right hon. Friend is not here, but he may have noticed that during his speech most of his support came from the Opposition rather than the Conservative Benches.

The Labour party's remedy is more taxation. That is always its stance. There is no question but that these were unexpected trade figures and they need more analysis because there must be statistical distortions. High imports, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has pointed out on many occasions, are caused not by the Government but by the private sector. There is tooling-up and restocking and last month's figures could have been affected slightly by the postal strike. However, having said all that, the figures are still high and some, including the City, are not sure whether our figures are accurate.

We cannot run the deficit too long, but, as has been pointed out, it is sustainable. At the moment, our gold and dollar reserves are approaching £30 billion and our overseas assets, which have been largely built up since 1979, are approaching the £100 billion mark. There is no crisis, as Opposition Members try to point out. The Opposition and the media have played up the matter, certainly the debate, out of all proportion to the facts of the case.

To a certain extent the deficit is being financed by money coming in from overseas and that shows that the foreigner, if not the Opposition, has confidence in Britain's economy.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South) rose——

Sir William Clark: No, I shall not give way. We have been asked to be brief, so if the hon. Gentleman will excuse me I would rather not give way.

As has been pointed out, the latest increase in interest rates has slowed down high street sales. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford that the effects of the latest increase must come through the pipeline. Imports ordered today do not arrive for another two or three months and it is only then that we shall know the figures. There is no question but that the property boom has been stopped, but consumer spending has not. I agree that consumer spending has not been sufficiently curtailed. Consequently, the Chancellor was right to increase the base rate from 12 per cent. to 13 per cent.

It is all very well Opposition Members, and, indeed, some of my hon. Friends, criticising the Chancellor. It is easy to criticise with hindsight. If each of us knew yesterday what we know today, we should all be millionaires. It is easy to know the answer after the event. At the time of the Budget, as the Chancellor has tacitly admitted, future growth in the United Kingdom was miscalculated. Because of that, Britain is now suffering not the "stagflation" that we suffered under the previous Labour Government and successive Labour Governments but "boomflation". [Interruption.] It is easy for Opposition Members to smile and laugh.

I regret that my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup did not mention one good thing about our economy. He did not mention our production, investment, standard of living and the profitability of companies being up and unemployment being down. Such things should be said by a leading statesman such as my right hon. Friend. Consequently, when he makes such a speech it does our economy and our standing in the world no good at all. In fact, the underlying strength of our economy is the envy of the rest of the world and I and most people are convinced——

Dr. Bray rose——

Sir William Clark: No, I shall not give way. I do not have time.

We must also remember that inflation is down from 25 or 26 per cent., but, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said, it is creeping up and it will probably creep up a bit more. As he rightly points out, if we were to take the tax and prices index, the inflation rate would not be 6·4 per cent., but about 4·5 per cent. If mortgage interest was taken out, it would probably be down to just over 3 per cent. I mention that because Britain's inflation rate and RPI are often compared with those in Germany, France, and so on. If we are going to make such comparisons, they should be on the same basis.

Opposition Members talk about credit controls, but, as has been said, how would we have credit controls without exchange control? Should we reintroduce exchange control or hire purchase control? I remind the House that we have been down that path before but it led us only to the International Monetary Fund. Interest policy is one arm in the fight against inflation. We should not borrow to spend. However, as has been pointed out, my right hon. Friend could consider the position of those in the community who do not have to borrow to spend because they have money. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) touched upon the question of saving. The Government and the Chancellor have a first-class record on the business expansion scheme, PEPs, and so on but the savings ratio has gone down. One has only to look at recent statistics to see that.

I must ask my right hon. Friend the Chancellor: "Why cannot we encourage people not to spend the money they already have in their pockets?" I should like more and more pressure to be applied. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor introduced individual pensions which are a great boon to people and the business expansion scheme is a first-class success. If we could copy something like loi monory, we could give those in the middle income bracket the opportunity to save. I know that would cost money but my right hon. Friend is in a position that enables him to be flexible.

I, as most hon. Members know, am a low tax person. I like low taxes, the lower the better. There is one fact that has never been effectively explained to me. If my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer allows me, as he did in the previous Budget, to keep more of my earnings —for which I was most grateful as were we all—and I then spend that money, that is inflationary. However, if I say to the Chancellor, "You keep it, you spend it for me" that is non-inflationary. I cannot see the difference between me spending the money and my right hon. Friend spending it for me. Although I have the greatest admiration for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, I shall not let him spend any of my money if I can help it.

The Labour party has now, belatedly, become the champion of the owner-occupier—what hypocrisy. When the sale of council houses was introduced not one Opposition Member wanted it. Up and down the country, especially in areas with Left-wing councils, every obstacle in the world was put in the way of council house tenants buying their own houses.

There has been a lot of talk about mortgages. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said that if mortgage repayments go up and the value of the house goes up, one can only pay the mortgage by selling the house. That is not so and I was surprised to hear him say it. If one has a mortgage and does not want to increase the monthly repayments, practically any building society in the country will give permission to extend the life of the mortgage. If it runs for 20 years it can be extended to 22 and the same repayment rates can be maintained. The increase in mortgage interest rates is only a temporary measure. I do not know when interest rates will come down. I would be surprised if they do not start to come down within six to nine months.

The danger signal for the future of the economy is high wage demands. That is something we have to watch carefully. It has been said that our manufacturing base is depleted and all we have heard is that it is the fault of the Government and that they have not invested or done this or that. Nobody has said that it was the activities of trade unionism that priced many men out of a job. That is why our manufacturing industry went downhill.

We have a budget surplus and public expenditure is under control. I am sure that we would all like to congratulate not only my right hon. Friend the Chancellor but my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary on reducing public expenditure below 40 per cent. with the prospect of it going lower still. We take our economic pulse too frequently. Whenever an economic figure is produced we take the pulse and hear gloom and doom. One never sees the Opposition happier than when there is bad economic news. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford said, the Opposition have not mentioned unemployment because it is coming down. It is something about which one should be pleased.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor said that we were in a similar position in 1985. He took the necessary action then and has done so again now. When action is necessary —all fair-minded hon. Members will agree with this—my right hon. Friend the Chancellor takes the necessary decision whether it is difficult or unpopular. That is something for which the country should be extremely grateful. The Conservative party is certainly grateful.

The debate has been blown up out of all proportion. It is an important debate but my advice to my right hon. Friend is that we should not have any panic measures. Let us stick to the policies he has pursued over the past five or six years and I am certain that the economy will remain as prosperous as it is today.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I do not think that the country or the House has got out of proportion the seriousness of the present economic crisis. I use the word "crisis" deliberately. I am sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is leaving the Chamber because I wanted to tell him to his face that, apart from the bluster, he made an unconvincing and extraordinarily complacent speech which failed to address any of the real problems facing Britain today. He soothed his feelings by drawing upon the analogy with 1985 when there was a surge of inflation and which, by principally raising interest rates, he brought under control during the succeeding 12 months. The problem facing the Chancellor now is far greater than the problem in 1985.

In 1985 Britain was running a balance of payments surplus of the order of £7,000 million to £8,000 million. This time we are running a deficit of what looks like being £14,000 million. In the history of post-war efforts to deal with the periodic balance of payments crises, I can think of no Government that has relied upon simple interest rates to correct a profound imbalance in our current account and trading position. Believe me, we are in a state of profound imbalance at present.

For the Chancellor simply to say that there will be no change of policy and that he will be sticking to what he is doing now, which is relying simply upon what the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) described as the one—iron solution—using his golfing analogy—is unconvincing and inadequate. For him to say, as he did, that in time the current account will correct itself is to miss the whole problem that will face Britain not just now but in the future. We will be wrestling with the balance of payments problem from now until the next general election and probably beyond. It will be a number of years before we can begin to get things right after such a severe and damaging current account deficit.

One point on which the House is generally agreed is that there is clearly an excess of purchasing power in the economy. It is that which is putting an upward pressure on prices and the massive pressure, to which I have alluded, on the current trading account. With imports rising at 12 per cent. this year and exports at only 1·5 per cent. and with consumer expenditure rising by 11 per cent. this year and 9 per cent. last year there can be no doubt that excess purchasing power is sucking in imports and diverting exports away from the export to the home market.

What has produced this surge in purchasing power? Three factors have contributed. First, there has been a continuing fall in the personal savings ratio. Since 1979 it has fallen from 12·6 per cent. of personal disposable income to a mere 5·4 per cent. last year and, I believe, the figure will be even lower this year. In 1987 savings fell by no less than £4,000 million. Although I have yet to see the figures for this year, I am sure that there will be the same rate of decline.

Secondly, there has been a massive growth in indebtedness. I shall put aside house prices because they account for a large part of the personal sector indebtness. Nevertheless, since 1979, in real terms, outstanding consumer credit has risen from £16·7 billion to no less than £39·8 billion. That is an enormous and, in many ways, major new factor in the total British economy increase in debt. Since the end of 1986 to this summer, outstanding consumer credit has grown by just over £8,000 million. In addition, there were tax cuts worth £4,000 million in this year's Budget, which further increased purchasing power from June.

Thirdly, there has been an increase in income over and above the rate of inflation, although I hesitate to put a number on that latter factor as I have not seen it properly analysed. The decline in the savings ratio together with the growth of indebtedness and the tax cuts produced an increase in purchasing power of almost £16,000 million this year. In those circumstances, it is no good the Chancellor patting himself on the back for prudence in having achieved a more than balanced budget; a negative public sector borrowing requirement. The truth is that the effects of that have been more than wiped out by the massive personal sector borrowing requirement. What has been gained in public expenditure restraint has been thrown away in an orgy of private sector borrowing and expenditure. The consequences for the current account are clear and have already been discussed.

I wish to emphasise the gravity of the current position. In 1974 Britain did not have a drop of its own oil and the OPEC cartel quadrupled the price of the oil that Britain had to import. There was also a serious problem arising out of the three-day week that operated during the first quarter of the year. Apart from that year, when the British economy was reeling, Britain this year has the biggest trade deficit that it has suffered certainly for the past three decades, and possibly since before the war.

The Chancellor, who has mouthed many strictures of the United States for its large trade deficit, must now recognise that Britain's deficit, as a proportion of gross domestic product—it stands at no less than 3·5 per cent. —has actually surpassed that of the United States. The prospects for next year are not much better. The Chancellor speaks of a reduced deficit to £11,000 million, but even that is challenged by most independent economists.

The Chancellor must face the fact—even if he is not prepared to admit it in public—that there has been a gross failure of economic management and forecasting during the past year. We recall with incredulity what the Chancellor said only eight months ago when he replied to the Budget debate:

> "The policy that we have been pursuing has already brought economic success. This country is now experiencing an economic miracle, comparable in significance to that previously enjoyed by West Germany and still enjoyed by Japan."—[Official Report, 21 March 1988; Vol. 130, c. 109.]

Such a claim is simply laughable. What the Chancellor has not begun to realise—and it is a fault that he shares with many Conservative Members—is that both Germany and Japan achieved their enormous economic success through export-led growth, accumulating balance of payments surpluses, high investment and low unemployment. Seldom has there been a greater flight from reality or a more hubristic statement than that made by the Chancellor on 21 March. Now, Nemesis has followed and the Chancellor's judgment has been devalued and deflated, not merely in this House but in the country and in the markets.

The question now is whether a similar fate awaits the British economy. How are we to put right such a massive deterioration in our economic affairs? We must increase exports and reduce imports, but to achieve that two things are necessary. First, there must be a reduction in domestic purchasing of goods and services. Secondly, we must ensure that British products are priced competitively in domestic and world markets. The Chancellor's only answer to both those requirements is to raise interest rates —which, as we well know, have already risen from 7·5 per cent. to 13 per cent. That has inflicted great pain upon house purchasers, especially first-time buyers, and there is no sign yet that there has been any significant change in the level of purchasing power. Of course, at some level of interest rates there will be a check on consumer expenditure. There will certainly be a squeezing out of the inflationary forces in the economy. No one should doubt that, if an interest rate policy is pursued ruthlessly enough, it will deal with inflation. The problem is the price that we shall then have to pay.

Those hon. Members who have already spoken properly reminded the House of the appalling damage done in 1979-80 when a massive, strongly applied interest rate policy—leading, as it did, to a massively overvalued exchange rate and a very high pound—led to the annihilation of 20 per cent. of British manufacturing capacity within two years and to a doubling in the number of unemployed to more than 3 million. Surely we should all be desperately anxious to avoid that. I do not refer only to the Opposition because anyone in his senses would not want to repeat the appalling experience of 1979-80.

The trouble with an interest rate policy is that it does not help us to become competitive. It will not lead to the successful transfer of resources into the export market while the pound is forcing up the price of our exports. The CBI's recent survey on British trade prospects drew attention to precisely that point. It expressed concern about the competitive pricing of British products, not simply about the lack of supply.

During the two years since June 1986—and I hate to use a jargon term, but it is the accepted measure of international competitiveness—the IMF's relative normalised unit labour cost index has shown that the price of British goods relative to those of other countries has risen by more than 16 per cent. In other words, there has been an upward valuation of 16 per cent. before this latest rescue operation on the pound and before the raising of interest rates has had time to take effect.

What the Chancellor—indeed, all of us—should be considering is how to reduce purchasing power in the United Kingdom without crippling the competitiveness of British industry. There are many ways to discourage borrowing—although I know that the Chancellor does not like them—without relying on higher interest rates. They may be imperfect, but credit controls, special deposits and other devices are available if the Chancellor has the will to use them. There is also a strong case for raising taxes. Despite the immediate adverse effect on the retail prices index, there is a great deal to be said for reconsidering the levels of VAT and Excise duties—assuming that we are still free agents in adjusting the level of such taxes and that they have not already been harmonised or frozen at their present level by agreement in the EEC.

There is a larger lesson to be learnt from this year's crisis. Is it not extraordinary—this point was made by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup—that, when more than 2 million people are unemployed in the United Kingdom, we are experiencing this massive excess of demand over supply? There is an unused resource of human beings, but we are experiencing a massive demand inflation. I believe that the chickens have come home to roost. They are not simply due to misjudgment this year and last year, but they are the failures of economic management during the entire period of Conservative Government. I hope that I am not making simply an old point, because I want people to think about this.

I have mentioned already the loss of capacity in 1979 and 1980, but the fact is that in every year since 1982 when we began, in the Chancellor's words, "to recover", investment in manufacturing industry failed to reach the levels of 1978 and 1979. Therefore, it is not surprising to find that the output of Britain's manufacturing industries has been less in every year between 1980 and 1987 than it was in 1979. That was the effect of that earlier disaster and the subsequent lack of adequate investment. Until this year, we had a smaller output to meet the surge of demand than we had even in 1979. There should not be much surprise that demand has outstripped supply in British industry this year.

The final lesson that we should draw relates again to our trade deficit. It is not just the way in which it has proceeded this year, but in 1983, for the first time in our history, we had a minus balance in our trade in manufactured goods. Since then the situation has worsened year by year. In 1986 our trade deficit in manufacturing had risen to more than £5,000 million, in 1987 to more than £6,500 million and so far this year has reached £9,700 million. That is an annual rate of about £12,000 million in manufactured goods, which until 1983 we produced ourselves and were always in surplus.

This is a worrying situation. Of course, the deterioration in our trade position was masked from 1979 to 1986 by the massive output and benefit of North sea oil, which yielded some £120 billion worth of productive wealth in both import saving and exports of oil. Deterioration in our trade has now reached a point where, notwithstanding North sea oil, a massive and unprecedented deficit has been allowed to accumulate. It is anticipated that this year it will be £13,000 million to £14,000 million.

It is not, therefore, only the grievous errors of this year that need to be put right by new actions and policies, but there is a desperate need for new and realistic policies to ensure the growth of real wealth in our society and a sustained increase in investment in research and development and in education and training for our work force. To achieve that, we shall need not just a new Chancellor but, I fear, a new Government.

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): It is traditional to debate economic affairs on the final day of the debate on the Loyal Address, but the tradition, too, is that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House replies and comments on matters of concern to the House.

I shall begin by raising two points to which I hope my right hon. Friend will respond. I believe that in many respects the accountability of the Government to the House has improved in the past decade. The Select Committee system, which is departmentally related, has been established, and we have introduced the Estimates Day procedure. Most recently, the Government have accepted that an agency set up under the Next Step proposals should be accountable directly to the Public Accounts Committee through its own accounting officer. However, there is a considerable danger in that the House and its Committee system have been put under pressure because of the amount of documents coming from the European Economic Community. This is putting a tremendous burden on the Scrutiny Committee, which is so admirably chaired, and carries out such important work. Therefore, I hope that we can consider—preferably through improvements in the Scrutiny Committee's work and that of the departmental Select Committees—the way in which we achieve effective accountability of the EC to the House.

Secondly, the Government have recently reorganised their affairs and split the Department of Health and Social Security. That raises the question whether there should be a corresponding division of the Select Commitees, because to a considerable extent the system of Select Committees is departmentally based. Of course, this is a matter for the House, not for the Government, but my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has an important role to play, and I should welcome his views. Because of the high percentage of expenditure and responsibility which falls on both the Department of Health and the Department of Social Security, there is a case for a corresponding division of the Committee. Having said that, I should add that it is clear that the existing Health and Social Security Committee is already engaged in studies covering the two Departments. It would be unfortunate if that work were lost. Perhaps, too, it would wish to consider whether the Department should have been split in the way it has been. I believe that it would be appropriate to make clear at an early stage —even today—that the Committee should eventually be divided but leave the amendment of Standing Orders until a later date when the Committee has concluded its existing work.

The Treasury Select Committee is proposing to take evidence tomorrow on the economic policies contained in the Chancellor's Autumn Statement. However, without pre-empting in any way the report that will be produced, it is appropriate for me to make some comments today.

It is quite extraordinary that the Opposition Front Bench spokesman made such a speech today. I believe that there is little benefit in going back over the record of the Labour Government, because it is a diminishing asset in political terms. Many of my constituents who now vote are not old enough to remember anything about it. It is extraordinary that, far from adopting a policy of happy is the party that has no history, the Labour party appears to be in the position of happy is the party that has no policy. The policies proposed by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) of special deposits and credit controls belong to a bygone age. The system now is far too open—in 1992 it will become even more so —for it to be considered that credit controls or special deposits would be an effective way of dealing with our problems.

I supported the Chancellor in putting up interest rates last week. It was the right thing to do. I am rather more doubtful about his presentation of that matter, because he is inclined to say, "Short-term interest rates are the only weapon which has been available." It has been suggested that this is a sort of one-club golfer approach to the problem. I am worried about analogies to golf, because in the first match that I played in my constituency I received a prize for the highest score at any one hole. Be that as it may, it is much easier to play golf with just one club if one can determine the shape of the course. My right hon. Friend is not dealing only with interest rates, because they must be considered within the framework of fiscal policy. He is wrong to underestimate the importance of that policy and that has led to some confusion.

Although the Opposition complain about the size of the tax cuts in the last Budget, the combination of the present level of taxation and public expenditure means that we are now running a massive budget surplus. That is also bearing down on inflation and it is important to economic management. We are not faced with the problem of too much public borrowing—a problem that has beset us for many years—because the Government are now making massive debt repayments. The problem, as pointed out by many hon. Members, is that there is too much private borrowing to pay for consumption. In that context, the increase in the rate of interest will undoubtedly have an effect. It may not deter the person who intends to buy a washing machine with a credit card because, in many cases, those interest charges are already extortionate, but it will affect those who are borrowing on mortgages and therefore it will affect their ability to consume.

I believe that the measures that the Chancellor has taken will affect the general level of demand and bring us back on course. The problems of forecasting make it difficult to predict the rate of economic growth and I am sure that all hon. Members would accept that. Therefore, our present economic position is not as envisaged.

We face problems with the savings ratio. People are not only borrowing too much, but they are saving too little. I know that my right hon. Friend will be making a review of the economy ahead of the next Budget and I hope that he will consider incentives for saving. They deserve review. In that context, I have considerable doubts about whether he is right to press ahead at this time with some of his proposals to change the taxation position of life insurance companies. Life insurance policies are an important feature of our savings structure and it would not be appropriate to alter their tax position now.

It is important to stress that the present pattern of interest rates is not what it used to be. The Chancellor is using short-term interest rates to determine the way in which the economy operates. None the less, the longer-term interest rates are significantly lower and the yield curve is unusual. For industries the longer-term interest rates are more important than the short-term interest rates.

My right hon. Friend was right to take action last week on the interest rate, given the balance of payments figures. If he had not taken such action it is likely that the exchange rate would have declined. That would have meant that the substantial exports that are already in the pipeline would have produced less. In the short term, that would not be a favourable state of affairs. Therefore, the tactical decision taken by my right hon. Friend was appropriate. We do not know how long my right hon. Friend will need to sustain interest rates at their new level, but in the context of last week's announcement, my right hon. Friend's action was correct.

For the long-term future of industry a crucial aspect is not simply interest rates, but wage settlements. Such settlements give cause for concern and of particular concern is the fact that the retail prices index includes mortgage payments. I was surprised when my right hon. Friend referred to that. If one wants to understand the danger in specific terms, one should consider what happened with the Ford pay settlement the other day. That settlement is a certain number of percentage points above the RPI and the RPI happened to jump at the time that that settlement was negotiated. It did not jump because of the underlying rate of inflation, but because of the increase in mortgage interest rates. Of course we shall not see a corresponding reduction in the pay of Ford workers if the mortgage interest rate comes down. Therefore, the inclusion of mortgage interest rates in the RPI causes a ratchet effect. As mortgage interest rates go down as well as up in the normal course of events, we must consider whether it is appropriate to include them in the RPI. For that reason I was interested in the comments that my right hon. Friend made.

Mr. Harry Ewing rose——

Mr. Higgins: I shall not give way as I always get worried when Privy Councillors go on too long. In any event, I am about to conclude.

The overall position that the Chancellor has adopted on interest rate policy is correct. The current fiscal framework, which shows that we have a massive surplus compared with previous periods, is the appropriate one for the present time.

It is odd that the Opposition appear to be arguing that we should have an even bigger surplus because there were too many tax cuts in the Budget. As the late Iain Macleod always said, Labour Governments put up taxes and Conservative Governments reduce taxes. That is the correct strategic approach. Obviously we shall need to review taxation in the context of the next Budget and I look forward to my right hon. Friend presenting it.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): The right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, of which I am a member, talked about accountability. The way in which it works is like this: he drafts the report and then uses his Conservative majority—some of them are here—to get it through. If the next report expresses what the right hon. Gentleman has said this year, we shall have a report of such sycophancy that some of us shall be asking Alice to pass the sick bag.

When I heard the Chancellor today all bubbly and bright, when I thought that he would have a hangover, I was reminded of the aphorism of Alexander Pope in his epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot:

"Take it for a rule
No creature smarts so little as a fool".

I note that the Chancellor has just left the Chamber.

When the Chancellor goes to meet his maker—perhaps if the Prime Minister has any say in this matter it will not be too long hence—I believe that his row will not be with the modern poets so much as with the philosophers of antiquity. Frankly, I doubt whether Aristotle, the logician and the great creator of the syllogism, will ever forgive the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what he has done this year.

When the Chancellor of the Exchequer first came to office he gave us a breathless syllogism. It was irredeemably strong, irreducibly simple and ineradicably true. He said, "All countries of low inflation are competitive. All countries which are competitive do not have a balance of payments problem. Britain has low inflation and does not have balance of payments problems." Here was a syllogism that scintillated. He united Aristotle with the classical economists, the Keynesians, the neo-monetarists and even the new Tories from Marxism Today. But—there is always a but when con artists are concerned—somewhere along the line someone forgot to tell the Chancellor that for a conclusion to be not only deducible from its premises, but correct in its application to the world which it purports to describe, its premises must be capable of empirical verification. Deduction and induction must at some stage during the argument synthesise.

The Lawson fallacy has been to move from false premises to false conclusions by suspect processes of logic. I believe that the purpose of this debate is to teach the Chancellor not only a few lessons in elementary economic theory in practice, but a few lessons in elementary logical analysis.

I begin with a succinct premise born of dispassionate analysis with which I believe every hon. Member would agree given the events of the past year. It is a simple one: "The Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), is an economic illiterate". Does it really matter if that is so?

I do not wish to place too much faith in economists. I am rather inclined to the view that Sir Kenneth Berrill, the former chief economist to the Treasury, gave me over a pint of beer at Sunningdale one day. He said that the difference between a scientist and an economist is that scientists sometimes get it right. Nevertheless, I believe that the Chancellor's ignorance in economic affairs is gross, excessive and offensive.

I shall deal first with economic forecasting. When I was 16, my economics tutor at school said to me "Sedgemore, in the hands of a professional, economic forecasting is a dangerous business. In the hands of an ambitious politician, it gives rise to self-delusion, followed by deceit, ending up in catastrophe." The Lawson catastrophe is surely living proof of what a wise old owl my tutor was.

Let us first consider the Chancellor's forecast for the balance of payments deficit. Assuming that the outturn will be £16 billion—my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) is always too kind, and I think that it will be more than he said—that is not 100 per cent., 200 per cent. or 300 per cent. wrong; it is 400 per cent. wrong.

Let us suppose that the chief economist to the National Westminster bank goes to his chairman, Lord Boardman, at the other end of the corridor and says, "Mr. Chairman, your Lordship, I've got my economic forecast for the year, and here it is, but I must tell you that the margin of error is plus or minus 400 per cent." Let no one tell me that that chief economist would keep his job. What worries me, as I look at the Government Benches, is that not a single Conservative Back Bencher—except perhaps the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath)—feels any guilt, shame or worry that there is a 400 per cent. margin of error in the forecast which has serious repercussions for the economy.

The matter is worse than that. When the Chancellor came to office, he forecast zero inflation in some years' time. I do not know how many mathematicians there are in the House. If there are any, they will know that the difference between zero inflation and the current rate of inflation is not 100 per cent., or 1 million per cent., or 1 billion per cent.; it is an infinite per cent. What can one say of a Chancellor who, on proven mathematical formulae, gets it infinitely wrong?

Let us consider the cure for inflation. Many cures for rising prices have been put forward by economists through the ages. As far as I am aware, the Chancellor is the first person in human history to say that the only cure for rising prices is to push prices even higher. That must be the own goal of the century. Let us imagine that England are playing West Germany at football and that Bobby Robson —one of the greatest failures of our time, as the Chancellor will be proved to be by history—comes into the dressing room and says, "Lads, this West German side is damned good, but when the players become over-confident they become vulnerable. Here's the game plan. If they don't score in the first 10 minutes, we'll put the ball into the back of our own net. Then they'll become over-confident and vulnerable."

I do not want to be unfair to the Chancellor because he has an answer to my criticism. I shall paraphrase his answer, but it is an honest paraphrase. He says, "When I push up prices by pushing up the cost of borrowing and when I push up mortgage rates so that Sedgemore, who paid £464 in November 1987, now pays £505 and in January of next year will pay even more, I am actually lowering prices and only the mad, the bad, the sad and prats like Sedgemore believe that I am doing otherwise." When the Chancellor says that when he gives us poison in the short term he is really giving us medicine in the long term, he reminds us of Father William in "Alice in Wonderland"—I am sure that all hon. Members have read that book, although they are not all mathematicians:

"'You are old, Father William', the young man said,
'And your hair has become very white;
And yet you incessantly stand on your head—
Do you think, at your age, it is right?'
'In my youth; Father William replied to his son,
'I feared it might injure the brain;
But now that I'm perfectly sure I have none,
'Why, I do it again and again.'"

It must be because the Chancellor's brain has gone missing—"Spitting Image" has got it wrong—that interest rates have been put up again and again.

I shall again paraphrase what the Chancellor said on television last week about the relationship between wage pressures and inflation. He said, "I shall reduce wage pressures by increasing them through higher mortgage rates and higher inflation." I used to think, being a gentle man, that despite the fact that I sometimes came to verbal blows with the Chancellor, he was a lovable, Rabelaisian roué. But the more I think about it now, the more I believe that he is a devious and sinister Schiller-like figure and, like the gods, I begin to despair. As Schiller wrote,

That is, against stupidity, even the gods struggle in vain.

When one considers the balance of payments, which has been a major issue today, the gobbledegook not only from the Chancellor, but from his chief economic adviser, Sir Terence Burns, becomes even worse. Sir Terence gave evidence to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service last week. I shall paraphrase what he said to me. "When the statisticians correct the figures, things may not be as bad as they seem." That is economics on a wing and a prayer. Last week, the Chancellor said—I shall again paraphrase—"The balance of payments deficit is a sign of the success of our policies. All I need to do is to make a few adjustments." That is economics by hunch, by guess and by god. I prefer it by somebody else.

Last week, the Chancellor said on radio—I am paraphrasing—"I'm so happy with things as they are that I'd willingly give up my job and make money in the City." That is more honest and that is the economics of blue funk. The Chancellor is the first economist in history to insist that the only cure for the balance of payments is to raise interest rates.

At the Treasury—there are a few Treasury officials sitting in the Box—there used to be textbooks on the walls. I am sure that the textbooks did not say that the only way to deal with a balance of payments crisis was to raise interest rates. In the textbooks that I read, the authors used to give many options. They said, for example, that there could be currency depreciation, devaluation, import control by administrative means, price or quota, or deflation. In an arrogant fit of pique, the Chancellor has burnt all those books, so he need not admit that he has made a mistake. Those books are no longer on the library shelves. When I asked Sir Terence Burns about the textbooks, he did not know anything about them and said that they were no longer relevant.

On the subject of the consumer boom, the Chancellor is the only economist in history to say that the only way to cure it is to raise interest rates. The textbooks would tell another story, if they existed, and would suggest a whole battery of fiscal policies that could be used. They would say that monetary conditions can be altered by credit control, with or without exchange controls. They would say, even more importantly, that the propensity to imports can be changed either by switching from consumption to investment or by switching from consumption to public expenditure. That meets one of the sillier points made by the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark).

Having abandoned the sum total of human knowledge as set out by economists around the world throughout history, the Chancellor is surprised that he now begins to get everything wrong, that he is the laughing stock of G7 Ministers, that the people from the International Monetary Fund who have just come to this country are beginning to find him an object of scorn and that he is the butt of cartoonists in our national newspapers.

The underlying reason for all that is simple. The Chancellor is driven by one linked belief—a belief in markets, deregulation and the idea that monetary control is the only control of the economy. He has tried it nine times and has failed. He tried M3, and when that failed he tried MO; when that failed he tried M1 and when that failed he tried M2; when that failed he tried M4 and when that failed he tried M5; when that failed he tried PSL1 and when that failed he tried PSL2—and when that failed he tried DCE.

We are coming up to Christmas and I am prepared to offer £10 to a charity chosen by any Conservative Back Bencher who can now interrupt me and give me a definition of each and every one of the Chancellor's monetary variables. Is it not extraordinary that not one Conservative Back Bencher knows what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been talking about for the past five years? They go back to their constituencies every week and preach monetarist dogma, but they cannot define the basic definitions.

Then, as if all that is not enough——

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay) rose——

Mr. Sedgemore: I think I shall sit down.

Mrs. Gorman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that his party's addiction to Keynesian economics is just as indecipherable, inscrutable and completely unintelligible to the man in the street?

Mr. Sedgemore: As I am never quite sure what my party is addicted to these days, the hon. Lady must forgive me if I do not respond. I like Keynes and think that he was a great person. Indeed, I believe that we want a combination of Keynes and Marx, and that is what I am working on. If the hon. Lady has a little faith, the right policies will come along.

The last curse of the Chancellor is that he is now coming here with the ultimate lunacy. He told us this afternoon that he can control each and every one of these economic variables all the time and at the same time, and that, although there is not a shred of empirical evidence that there is any relationship between one or all of the variables and the rate of inflation or the balance of payments, that will effect a magical economic cure. What is wrong with that is quite simple: it is economics by formulae, whereas we want economics by judgment. It is because the Chancellor of the Exchequer is wholly lacking in economic judgment that we shall oppose the Government tonight.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I call the next hon. Member, I should remind the House that we are now in the period of the 10-minute limit for speeches.

7.2 pm

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) told us that he very much admired his economics tutor, but he did not tell us what his economics teacher thought of him. I can only guess from his fluent command of German that his economics tutor shunted him off as soon as he possibly could.

Last October, most of us were concerned about the effect of the crash and what it might do to the world economy. Although there were signs of monetary overheating, the judgment of the House—this was certainly true of the Opposition at the time—was in favour of keeping the economy going, and that was the view of other countries also. I know that by the Budget earlier this year it was clear that the world economy had recovered and that all might be well, but there was nevertheless some doubt about that.

Therefore, it was perfectly proper for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remind us earlier today that on balance he thought that reducing the rate of interest to 7·5 per cent. was the right thing to do. If he had reduced the rate of interest to 7·5 per cent. and combined that with an announcement that we were to join the European monetary system and have a close association with the deutschmark, that would have had a salutary effect on inflation prospects. Unfortunately, that was not done.

In retrospect, it is easy to see that reducing the rate of interest at the time of the Budget without an accompanying commitment to the deutschmark or to joining the EMS was a mistake. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has cheerfully admitted that.

Looking at this crisis—as the Opposition call it—and comparing it with others—many right hon. and hon. Members present can remember former crises—the question that arises is how serious a crisis is it. The one thing that distinguishes former crises from the present situation is that in each and every one of those crises there was a large public sector deficit and a significant public sector borrowing requirement.

Those deficits drew the attention of the International Monetary Fund and created real problems for the Governments of the time. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) reminded me of that, but did not say that the distinction between the current position and that in 1973-74 is that out of our total revenue in 1973 of £24 billion, our PSBR was £2·2 billion —nearly 10 per cent. In 1974, the PSBR was £3·5 billion out of a total revenue of £29 billion—well over 10 per cent. If that did not set the alarm bells ringing, I do not know what should have set them ringing. It certainly alarmed me and some of my hon. Friends.

If one contrasts the position of the early 1970s with the later 1970s when we saw the large PSBR difficulties and the deficit of the Labour Government with our position today, one must admit that there has been a most remarkable transformation. I did not think that we would see the day when we would be repaying our public sector debt at the level that we are. I believe that it is £10 billion this year —and not all of that is money drawn from the sale of nationalised assets. Even if we do not take those into consideration, I believe that we are repaying about £4 billion.

It is not possible to minimise the importance of the public sector surplus and the way in which it is being treated. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is perfectly justified in taking credit for that. If that large sector of the economy—the public sector—is in surplus, where do we look for the trouble spots in other parts of the economy? Companies are a very important part of our economy and it is clear that we are in substantial surplus in that area also. In 1983, company savings amounted to £25·9 billion, less capital investment of £15·8 billion. Last year, company savings were nearly £46 billion—by far the largest ever —and our capital investment was £30·7 billion—again by far the largest ever. In the second quarter of this year, both savings and capital investments in the company sector have been higher. Therefore, we are in an extremely strong position in both the public sector and the corporate sector. Indeed, I do not believe that the corporate sector has ever been as healthy as it is today.

One can draw a sharp distinction between today's position and what used to happen in the 1970s. That distinction is important and significant. However, we have a particular problem with the personal sector and I do not think that it is right to minimise that. In 1983, personal sector savings were £21·3 billion, but last year they had fallen to £14·8 billion. However, the figures for borrowing for house purchases were £14·5 billion in 1983 and they have risen to £29·6 billion. Therefore, not only had savings in the private sector reduced significantly, but borrowing for house purchase and other activities had increased markedly. In fact, borrowing for house purchase was twice the level of private sector saving. The Government must take account of that fact.

We need to address the matter of borrowing for consumption. In 1987, such borrowing totalled £8·7 billion and in the first three quarters of this year it was £9·3 billion. That shows an extraordinary increase which far exceeds the rate of saving. Therefore, if we have to distinguish the parts of the economy that are doing pretty well and are comfortably well off, they would be the public and corporate sectors.

When Opposition Members talk about the damage caused by higher interest rates, they should bear in mind the level of corporate sector savings. I do not think that they have ever been quite so healthy. It is quite clear that corporations are increasingly financing themselves not through borrowing but through retaining cash. Contrary to what Opposition Members say, the corporate sector will not find much of a squeeze for the moment. Smaller companies and individuals may do so, but, in the sector as a whole, companies will not find all that much difficulty.

What is to be done in the private sector? My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and other hon. Members touched on this matter. We need a two-pronged attack to increase the level of private sector savings and to diminish private sector expenditure. If we can improve the rate of savings by a significant amount, the consumer boom will diminish, and if we can discourage people from spending as much as they do at present we shall enlarge the effect.

Let us examine the prospects. With interest rates as high as they are now, they must be an attractive proposition for private savers. We should not forget that there are rather more private sector savers than borrowers, and I expect them to increase thir savings. The private sector is quite well off at the moment, with wage increases going on as fast as they are. That is another point that we must have in mind. It is right to use interest rates to discourage expenditure.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) thought that the Chancellor was using only one golf club. I inform my right hon. Friend, who used all kinds of devices, including prices and incomes policies and other things that did not work, that it is much better to go around a golf course with one club—I speak with my enormous handicap as the parliamentary golf champion—than it is to go around with a sand bag and axe in one's golf bag, which is what my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup did.

I conclude my remarks. I had no idea that I had taken so long, and I apologise for doing so. I have made the important points that I wished to make.

7.12 pm

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): I start by referring to a couple of points that affect my constituency and Scotland, and use them to instance where things are going wrong in the economy. One matter about which people have not talked much, but which I find disturbing, is the of takeover mania that has been going on. I refer to a quite small takeover, whereby the French firm Kelt has been trying to take over the British oil firm Carless. In Old Kilpatrick, in my constituency, there is a small oil refinery that Kelt has never heard of. One of those high leverage bids is in progress. A bid of £206 million has been put in, and, to finance it, Kelt must borrow £191 million, which must be paid back in total within 12 months. It is quite staggering. There is only one way in which that can be done, and that is by selling the assets of the company that is being bought. It means that, in a sense, Kelt has quite honestly declared that it has no interest in downstream activities—oil refineries, oil products and so on. It is interested only in drilling rights. My constituents, along with those of many other hon. Members, have found that a firm is being sold off.

What are the prospects for that firm? Carless behaved in an exemplary way. It had taken over an oil refinery that was going nowhere. It invested heavily in it, and saw that there could be a long-term market—already employing 100 people in my constituency—in producing specialist oils, napthenic oils, and transformer oils, for which it had a market lead. It is clear that if the bid goes through the company will be sold, either at a cheap rate—in which case, it will eventually close—or to a foreign competitor.

What is the relevance of that kind of takeover to the future prosperity of the country? Who benefits from that kind of takeover? The Chancellor is turning a blind eye. That is one illustration of how the economy is working.

Another illustration has an insidious effect on the social fabric of the country. We heard the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and other hon. Members refer to wage rises and how they are pushing up inflation. I refer to the behaviour of the directors of Scottish and Newcastle Breweries. As it happens, the great mass of Scottish Members support Scottish and Newcastle in its resistance to Elders bid. But what have the directors of Scottish and Newcastle done to command support?

A group of people were already in a position to set their own salaries and to say what they were worth. How lovely it must be for one to say how much one is worth and how much one can be paid. Then along came the Chancellor who said, "You are not worth as much as you once said you were; you are worth more." Then along came Elders. This year we have been inundated with rumours about the takeover of Scottish and Newcastle by Elders or others. The directors of Scottish and Newcastle were issued with privileged shares. What did they do? They sold them at a profit of £560,000, individually making £80,000 profit.

On 17 December, the chief executive of Scottish and Newcastle, Mr. Rankin, exercised his right to buy 100,000 shares at 110p. He sold them the same day for 214p, netting £104,000 profit. On 22 March, the managing director exercised an option over 80,000 Scottish and Newcastle shares at 110p, and sold them the same day at 280p a share—a profit of £136,000 on one day.

In that sort of climate, in which the force of Thatcherism has been set loose, it ill-behoves Conservative Members to talk about holding back wage demands.

Let us examine another way in which the events of that crisis are bothering my constituency and many other Scottish constituencies. It means that, perhaps, we are heading not only for a slow down in the economy but for a full stop as the forces of higher interest rates operate. There will be considerable difficulty for areas that have not yet benefited from any northward spread or ripple in the economy. I am particularly keen to change the Government's belief that urban regeneration in the north and in Scotland and Wales can be private sector-led.

The chairman of the Scottish CBI, Mr. William Hughes, pointed out that Glasgow was the best example of what public and private partnership could achieve. He acknowledged that the Scottish Development Agency, Strathclyde region and Glasgow district had been the prime movers in starting Glasgow's remarkable investment programme. He stated:

"Business contributed its energy, enterprise and capability. It is not necessary that we bring cash to the partnership."

It is essential that someone brings cash to the partnership, that we stop the abuse of local government which Mr. Hughes recognised was causing the turnround in Glasgow, and that this regeneration is not stopped because the south-east starts to overheat. We shall look for a change of policy by the Government in that respect.

We have heard about economic miracles, but what economic miracle do we have? No other advanced country has neglected manufacturing industry as we have, and we claim an economic miracle when the British public cannot or will not buy British goods. We have heard about increases in productivity but, as John Banham said, our productivity is still 10 years behind French and West German levels and 20 years behind the Japanese level. Our productivity has increased but from a low level.

We hear about 1992 which holds considerable dangers as well as opportunities. Banham says that German social costs and legislation, together with United Kingdom productivity, would be a lethal combination. Is it any wonder that the Chancellor is worried about 1992?

7.22 pm

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): I think that my right hon. Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) were a bit rough with the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) in saying that he did not produce any policy. The fellow was doing his best and he produced a policy in the middle of his speech as the answer to our immediate problems. It was one that he had inherited from previous Labour Governments: to increase taxes and reverse tax cuts. We have heard that before.

The Labour party has been through a good many rethinks recently, some of which are rather heartening. For example, I like the way that it is beginning to take Europe seriously, even if it is attracted by some aspects which do not attract me. But it has not yet grasped the central point about taxation policy, which my party and the Government have grasped, and that is that if one reduces the rates, one raises the yield. The Labour party should grasp that point by studying the facts of recent developments here, in the United States, West Germany, France and Japan. Again and again low-tax societies are seeing an acceleration in revenue, and until the Labour party grasps that, it will be in a constant muddle.

Mr. Dobson: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howell: I cannot because we are in the sprint section of the debate and we have to scramble on. I do not like it, but that is how the debate is organised.

We face ferociously unstable world conditions. Ours is a medium-sized economy in a big sea and the high ambitions of any economic task today must be to keep the boat afloat rather than to be precise about where we can land it.

There runs through these debates nowadays a grossly exaggerated view of what national economic managers can achieve either by manipulating Keynesian or monetary aggregates. The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) treated us to an endearing and entertaining speech which we enjoyed but which was riddled with that concept which Marx to some extent entertained. Equally, Keynes saw, because that was the world in which he lived, that each economy was an autonomous unit which could be managed and turned up and down by pressing the appropriate monetary or Keynesian levers. That age has completely disappeared.

We are now in an enormous and uncertain global environment in which appalling crises come along, forecasting is virtually impossible and statistics are wildly wrong. I believe that the Central Statistical Office is still revising the figures of 10 years ago and finding them wrong. We face great uncertainties, not least across the Atlantic with the new President shaping up to his huge budget deficit, the continuing imbalances of both Japan and the United States, the looming crisis over leverage buy-outs—another big crisis involving billions of the American thrift institutions which have all been taken for a ride—and plenty more crises beyond that, all occasionally erupting into financial instability.

The Chancellor had to make his judgment a year ago in the context of black Monday and everyone, but everyone, was saying that we must avoid a repeat of 1929. There was universal acclaim for the skill with which he and other G7 Ministers organised finances to prevent economic slump following financial slump. It is no good today saying that we have forgotten all that and we shall judge him on different criteria. A year ago everyone—not least the Labour party and many of my hon. Friends—was full of wisdom that that was the line that he had to take. Now the pattern has changed and expansion has been far more vigorous than anyone predicted. We face overheating which has given rise partly to the trade deficit and to the theme of this debate.

Interest rates of 13 per cent. are probably the top and high enough to satisfy the international holders of sterling and to cool the economy. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) is a great expert on these matters, I do not think that that rate provides much of a savings incentive. An individual would receive 8·5 or 9 per cent. interest from a building society or high interest bank account, but when one knocks off 25 or 40 per cent. income tax it hardly leaves a real return, so that will not help the drive for savings.

What then do we do? All hon. Members have rightly said that this is not 1974 or 1981 but an entirely new situation both globally and locally. It is new because we have some of the strongest public-sector finances in the world with a colossal surplus. The public sector is saving and is not in debt and the corporate sector is saving massively and is not in debt. Some experts say that that is an inevitable reflection of the fact that the private sector and consumers are not saving.

The corporate sector is sitting on billions of retained profits. Mr. Tim Congdon, in an interesting article in The Times, pointed out that perhaps all our views of the low personal savings ratio here and in the United States are badly wrong. Bearing in mind his warning that the situation may not be as bad as we think, the next move in the evolution of Government strategy, having so far rightly put all the emphasis on interest rates, should be to give some indication of thinking about how to raise personal savings. In short—and my Conservative colleagues should be particularly enthused with this thought—we should consider how to get savings out of the state sector and into private hands without it leading to more consumption.

There are ways of doing that and they should be discussed in preparation for policy makers to develop them in time for the Budget. In particular, we should think of ways of encouraging savings in shares, unit trusts and various assets, as they have gone into housing. I should like to see a levelling up rather than a levelling down of tax reliefs. As others have suggested, I should like to see limited front-end tax relief for savings for millions of people similar to the system introduced in France in the early 1980s, which was called the loi monory.

We should encourage a much greater expansion of personal pension schemes—the self-employed pension schemes that involve putting money aside to add to one's own pension. The trouble is that the fiscal structure is geared away from encouraging personal savings and towards institutional savings. Again, there should be a levelling up rather than a levelling down. Unless we change that pattern, far from wider share ownership there will be narrower share ownership. That is happening already, with 80 per cent. of equity being held by institutions. That is much higher than even five years ago, and the pace in that direction is increasing. If my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench wish to maintain steam in the direction towards wider personal share ownership, they will have to have some new thoughts about personal savings incentives to make them at least as good as the incentives to save through institutions. The latter increasingly dominate our economy—much more so than many other economies.

I have talked about savings for people who pay tax, but we must not forget that many millions of people do not pay tax. The social security system is geared to discourage them from saving and to push them into a poverty and savings trap. That is highly undesirable and should worry the Conservative party more than it does. If we wish to extend the philosophy of more personal savings and wider share ownership to all levels of society, we must reform the tax system and the social security benefits system together, which at present are too discouraging to those who save a little. Their savings deny them a range of benefits.

That poverty trap is much too deep in our society, and it is made deeper by too much targeting. I am all for targeting the elderly, but if we target too much those of working age we shall create an even bigger poverty trap and greater discouragement for millions of people to save money and join in the ownership economy that we wish to create.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): In the Gracious Speech the Government said that they would bear down on inflation and foster conditions for sustained growth. But we are in the midst of a crisis of inflation. Barely a week ago, we were told that everything was fine and that we need only keep our current policies on course to reach a point where inflation would be much lower than it is now. We were told that unemployment would continue to fall and that, perhaps before the next election, it might be as low as it was when the Labour Government were in power. But the balance of payments deficit and the 1 per cent. increase in interest rates, which is likely to lead to an increase in the mortgage rate of 0·5 or 0·75 per cent. next year, following more than half a dozen increases since May, mean that we are in the middle of a crisis. But the Government pooh pooh that notion and try to push it to one side.

Suddenly it has become wrong to include mortgage interest increases in the cost of living index. Tell that to home owners who must dig deeper into their pockets to pay increased mortgage charges. Of course, the mortgage rate is part of their cost of living. Any attempt to take it out of the retail prices index would echo the tricks used by the Government to reduce the real rate of unemployment. They are merely shuffling the figures. Let us not push aside the increase in mortgage rates as being of no importance. What price does the Chancellor put on the property-owning democracy that he is so keen to encourage?

The Chancellor's policies are in shreds. He cannot admit it, but almost every forecast that he made in the Autumn Statement has already gone hopelessly wrong. He says that he has never laid importance on forecasting, but as Chancellor of the Exchequer he must develop policies based on forecasts of what he believes may happen. At one time, the Chancellor hoped that inflation would be zero, and later he thought that it might be about 4 to 5 per cent. It is now nearly 6·5 per cent. and is likely to go much higher during the year. Unemployment, which was showing a downward trend, is likely to increase again. Perhaps when the Leader of the House replies to the debate he will forecast what will happen to unemployment. Dare we ask for a forecast of the trade deficit? Will the Government give us any idea of what they believe will happen? If the policy of increasing interest rates is the only one that the Government have, what effect will it have on the British economy? What effect will it have on inflation and on unemployment during the next three months, six months or the coming year?

It is especially important for the regions of the United Kingdom to know what those forecasts are. Most jobs have been created in the south-east. Outside the south-east, there are far fewer jobs than there were in 1979. Despite an expansion in part-time jobs, in Wales there are 130,000 fewer jobs than there were in 1979. In Scotland, the comparable figure is 173,000. In almost every standard planning region in England, above the line drawn from the Severn to the Wash, there are fewer jobs than there were in 1979. Will the Chancellor's policy of a 1 per cent. increase in interest rates now, perhaps with later increases, do anything to create jobs, especially north of that line from the Severn to the Wash? I want to hear answers to those questions tonight.

What will the increase in interest rates do to Government revenue? Although it may be the most fiendishly difficult area in which to make forecasts, it is thought that if domestic demand is reduced—that is what the Government hope will happen—by about 2 or 2·5 per cent., it could reduce Government revenue by almost £2 billion. We have many questions to ask the Government about how their current policy will affect the economy, especially the economy of the regions.

The Government's regional policy has resulted in real-terms spending on the regions being cut by two thirds since they came to power. What are the alternative policies? Virtually everybody outside the Tory party and its running dog economists forecast that the cuts in tax rates would lead to a consumer boom and to pressure on the balance of payments. An even more conservative body than the Tory party is the House of Lords, and its Select Committee on Trade and Industry said in 1985 that under the Government's current policies there was bound to be a problem in sustaining exports and controlling imports.

The chickens are coming home to roost and there is no point in the Government saying that their interest rate policy is the only one that they have. There is no point in Conservative Members and the Chancellor saying that the mortgage interest rate should be taken out of the retail price index because it does not really count and that things will be better if it is removed. The high mortgage interest rate means that it is costing people more to live in Britain and it is resulting in higher unemployment outside the south-east. Because of dramatically overheating pressures in the south-east, people from Wales, Scotland and the north cannot afford to go south to take up jobs.

Some of my constituents have written to me asking if I can find them a home that they can afford in London. They say that they have jobs here, but cannot bring their families to live in London. That will remain a constant problem for the Government. I hope that the Chancellor will have some humility and will realise that what he has done so far is wrong. I hope that he will adjust his course so that we can get more public investment because that will create more jobs and will not lead to a vast increase in imports. I hope that the Chancellor is listening.

7.42 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): I should like to speak about competition policy and ought therefore to declare an interest, albeit a rather indirect one. For some years I was a director of Morgan Grenfell, the merchant bankers. I resigned from the board a few months after being elected to the House last year, but I am still a consultant to my former firm. I am also a director of Dewe Rogerson International which has advised many major companies on the communication aspects of bids and mergers. I emphasise that neither of those companies had the faintest idea that I would seek to speak in the debate and neither knows what I am about to say, except in so far as my former colleagues may know my general ideas on the subject.

I congratulate the Government on what appears to have been a robust response to the nervous bleatings that we heard the other day from some members of the Confederation of British Industry who appear to be afraid of being taken over. The existence of a public market in mergers and acquisitions is an important element in the motivation of top management. I can think of few better ways of blunting the cutting edge of management aggressiveness than sending out a clear signal to top managers that they are secure in their jobs indefinitely and can sit back comfortably until the end of their careers.

Mergers and acquisitions are also an important element in the essential process of readaption and renovation of industry. Traditionally we used to think of mergers and acquisitions as leading to the concentration of industry. Of course that is the Marxist tradition in which some Opposition Members were brought up. We now see increasingly—and the examples in the United States are particularly encouraging—that mergers and acquisitions can just as readily be about the disaggregation as about the concentration of industry. Sometimes they are the only effective way of breaking up conglomerates that have lost their rationale or perhaps never had a great rationale. They can release the component businesses to develop their own focus without the encumbrance of the constraints and the avoidable overheads from which they previously suffered.

Where mergers or acquisitions involve management buy-outs, whether because management instigates the bid or because a successful bid clears the way for a management buy-out, a most interesting and encouraging phenomenon occurs. The businesses concerned are returned to the entrepreneurial model of business leadership that was the basis of our industrial revolution and the model within which most firms have known their fastest periods of growth.

Mergers and acquisitions are thus an important and useful engine of economic progress and it is important that competition policy should not act as an undue brake on that engine.

Against that background I should like to draw the attention of the House to a major qualitative change in this area which we are now forced to recognise. It is the international dimension to competition policy. Global markets—financial, industrial and commercial—appear to be here to stay and I thank God for it. We no longer therefore have the luxury of conducting a pure competition policy within national boundaries.

I draw to the attention of the House two aspects of this internationalisation. One is the impact of the choice of a geographical perimeter or horizon for competition policy on industrial structure. I shall quote one brief example. At the time of the Nestlé bid for Rowntree it was widely theorised that an alternative might have been a merger between Cadbury Schweppes and Rowntree. I have no idea how seriously that possibility was examined by those firms. However, it had been considered axiomatic in the City for a long time that such a merger would have been excluded by competition policy because in Britain those two firms combined would have had a dominant market share, or would have been considered to have such a share.

In the international context or in the context of the European Community, however, a merger between Cadbury Schweppes and Rowntree would have had less of an impact on competition than the merger between Nestlé and Rowntree which took place. I pass no judgment on the merits of that merger, but draw to the attention of Ministers whose responsibilities lie in this direction that competition policy, as it is presently structured, effectively excluded the option of the emergence in Britain of a major international confectionery grouping, a British Nestlé or a British Jacobs Suchard. I regret that, and in that context I am delighted to see that the Government are taking part in discussions with our Community partners with a view to producing a regime under which major mergers with sales of more than 1 billion ecus and considerable transnational business will in future be examined on a Communitywide basis. I am convinced that that is in the interests of British industry.

Another aspect of this international dimension is the whole issue of reciprocity. At the time of the Nestlé bid, general attention was focused on the fact that many Swiss and Scandinavian companies have articles of association or foreign exchange regulations that prevent foreigners from buying certain classes of their shares. It is much less well known that even within the European Community many public companies, and the majority of such companies in Holland and Germany, have provisions that prevent any shareholder holding more than 3 or 5 per cent. of their stock. Effectively that means that those companies are proof against takeovers. That presents a dangerous and unfair constraint on British industry. It means that the acquisition and merger flows can go in only one direction. It also means that if major international industrial groupings are to be formed by means of acquisition in the European Community, they will be based on the continent and not here.

I ask for no privileges for British industry but only that it should not be asked to play on a field where the other side plays in front of a closed goal. I beg Ministers who have these responsibilities to consider with some urgency, whether in the context of a new European company law or otherwise, how we can get back to having Queensberry rules in this area. That would be in the interests of the whole of the European Community.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): The silence which greeted the Chancellor's speech from those on the Benches behind him was eloquent testimony of the scale of the difficulties that he now faces. This is a cruel place, and those who cheered his tax cuts to the roof last April were noticeably silent as he dug the pit deeper today. Perhaps they got a glimpse of the future, and did not like what they saw.

I shall forgo the temptation to sympathise with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He is in the process of getting his come-uppance. It is long overdue and it could not have happened to a nicer fellow. However, no one should suffer from the delusion that the scale of the difficulties that we now face is down to him alone. He is only the most conspicuous representative of an immoral philosophy shared by at least two thirds of Tory Members, which has at its core the remorseless pursuit of the fast buck in the shortest possible time without regard to the social consequences.

Whatever his fate, the Chancellor will not be the one to pay the price for the folly that he has pursued. That fate will be suffered by the millions of shattered lives that are a consequence of his economic policy. It will be left to others to clear up the mess. It cannot be said too often, and it has been said today, that the alleged economic miracle is based on a number of unique factors that have given the Chancellor resources that no other Chancellor before has had, and that no Chancellor after him will have, at his disposal. He has had from oil revenue at least £65 billion, and, taking account of savings as a result of not having to import oil, the figure amounts, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said, to £120 billion.

The revenue from privatisation—there is no better example of the short-term folly that he has pursued than the sale of public assets—amounts to about £25 billion. Some £7·7 billion of it came from the sale of British Gas, £3·6 billion from the sale of British Telecom and at least £1 billion from the sale of Britoil. The Gracious Speech refers to the privatisation of water and electricity, and no doubt that will accrue other enormous short-term revenues, which will be squandered in the same fashion as the revenue so far accumulated.

In addition, the Chancellor has had at his disposal £31,000 million arising from the cuts that he has made in the rate support grant over the past few years, the results and the social consequences of which are clear to all, particularly to those of us who represent poorer and less prosperous areas. The provision of public housing is grinding to a halt, our inner cities are decaying, our social services are unable to cope with the casualties. Many Labour Members have been reduced to being well-paid social workers clearing up the mess created by the Chancellor and his colleagues.

All these revenues provided the Chancellor with an unprecedented opportunity and one that has never been enjoyed by any other Chancellor before him. It could have been invested in creating a sound infrastructure for future generations, in creating a strong economy able to compete with the rigours of 1992, about which we hear so much, or in providing decent living standards for all our people. What has happened? It has been used to purchase the votes of the southern middle classes with tax cuts and windfall dividends. The idea is widely abroad that one can get something for nothing—something that the Prime Minister used to deprecate. That idea will shortly be punctured, but many people have already gained something for nothing as a result of the reckless folly of selling off public assets.

At the core of what the Chancellor and his colleagues have done, which perhaps sums up the entire philosophy of the Prime Minister's Government, is that they have ruthlessly and cynically mobilised the fortunate against the unfortunate. Since, for the time being and for some years in the past, the fortunate have been in the majority, it was always inevitable that they could be mobilised by a sufficiently cynical Government. They have unleashed on our economy every species of spiv and conman known to civilisation, and created an ideology not of the wealth producer but of the looter. They have resolved the historic conflict within the Conservative party, and in the country, between the industrialists and the bankers, finally and conclusively in favour of the bankers at the expense of those who produce.

If one seeks evidence for what has happened to our country over the past nine or 10 years, one of the better illustrations is to be found in the magazine section of a W. H. Smith bookshop. There was a time when one could find many magazines devoted to the pursuit of ideas, both Left and Right. They have nearly all disappeared and they have been replaced by consumer magazines—What Car?, What Computer?, What This? and What That? I saw one the other day entitled simply More. I can think of no better epitaph for the economic policies of this Government.

As has been widely remarked, all this has given rise to a new breed of Conservative Members of Parliament. The gentlemen of the old school, while they still exist, have been replaced by philistines and barbarians who do not believe in treating people decently. I concede that many Tory Members believe in treating people decently, but they are a dying breed.

Where will it all end when there is nothing left to privatise, when the oil revenue is gone and when every conceivable asset has been stripped? It is no good replying, as the Chancellor sometimes does, that we have sold the assets abroad and can live on the dividends. What makes him think that the dividends will be repatriated to an economy that is on its knees?

When the time comes to clear up this mess, those who pay the price must be those who benefited. The burden must not fall, as I suspect that it may, on those who have already suffered so grevously from the Government's policy. If I seek a lasting image for the Government of the past 10 years and the economic policy that they have pursued, it is of a young couple whom I saw last week when I drove to my home in Sunderland, who were picking rubbish out of the litter bags left out in the back alleyway behind my house. They were not old; they were young.

My wife comes from Vietnam, one of the poorest countries in the world. She has lived in this country for only 18 months. The other day we saw a man picking food out of a litter bin in Hyde park and she asked me, "How is it possible in a country as rich as this for that to happen?" I had no satisfactory answer to that question. I do not understand, and it is symptomatic of the economic policy pursued by the Government that some people have to eat by taking the leftovers from litter bins.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): At this late hour I shall deal only with one point that has been raised by a number of hon. Members—concern about the overall competitiveness of our economy and especially of our manufacturing industry. I have shared that concern for many years.

There has been a great improvement since 1979, but it is not enough because our competitors have not been resting on their laurels for the past nine years and we still have not caught up with our leading competitors, the Germans, the Americans and the Japanese. I shall not detain the House by quoting figures in support of that contention, but those of us who are close to manufacturing industry are aware of them.

The abiding doubts about our economic performance as measured against those leading competitors arise as much from cultural as from economic reasons. The problem lies in our national attitude to business and especially to manufacturing industry. As a nation, we do not admire business; at best, we tolerate it and at worst we scorn it.

I have in the past drawn the House's attention to the curious alliance between the aristocratic Right and the intellectual Left, which acknowledges rationally the necessity for business, but rejects it emotionally. We see the same attitude reflected in the media which treat business with lofty and unconcealed disdain as a sort of lumpen proleteriat of our society.

I came to the House from industrial management and I have retained some contact with it. As a general rule in industry, we still require no proper management qualifications from those whom we appoint as managers. I declare an interest here as a vice-president of the Institution of Industrial Managers. We at least try to get more professionalism into industrial management, but we are by no means supported by everyone. We must beef up the professionalism of our management in industry and do more to attract a higher percentage of the brightest of our people into engineering and industrial management. We underpay our engineers and overpay our accountants. Who are accountants anyway? They are only bookkeepers with social aspirations. Until we demand higher standards of industrial management and pay for them, we shall not be truly competitive with the Americans, the Germans and the Japanese.

Those important matters are largely beyond the remedial grasp of any Chancellor of the Exchequer. They probably lie closer to that of the Secretary of State for Education and Science because their origins lie deep in our culture, in our schools and universities. Those cultural problems affect adversely our economic performance and they are further reasons for doubting whether it is given to any Government to fine-tune the economy. I do not believe that Governments have either sufficiently accurate or up-to-date information or sufficiently sensitive regulators at their disposal to fine-tune it. It is an illusion. In all my years here I have never seen a Government be successful in fine-tuning the economy. At best, they have crude instruments to work upon.

Lewis Carroll put the case graphically, as he put many other truths so graphically. When describing the little croquet match, he said:

> "The chief difficulty which Alice found first was her flamingo . . . generally, just as she had got its neck straightened out, and was going to give the hedgehog a blow with its head, it would twist round and look up in her face."

That has been the experience of many Chancellors of the Exchequer. The flamingo looks up in the Chancellor's face just when he thinks that his policies will work. We must therefore accept the Government's inability to fine-tune the economy and accept that the best that they can do is something relatively crude because so much of the action is outside their scope.

The problem of the cultural attitude to business and, above all, to manufacturing industry is one that we must solve. It will be solved not by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but by political leaders in this House showing more interest in industry and business and not making the contemptuous remarks that we so often make about those who are successful in both those endeavours.

8.5 pm

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): Tonight's debate is very significant. It opens the final act in an unfolding drama—the steepest drop in the reputation of any Chancellor of the Exchequer since the war.

Just seven months ago, the Chancellor was the toast of the City, the yuppie and the Tory Back Bencher. Tonight, his fair-weather friends on the Back Benches are sitting in sullen silence when they are not stabbing him in the back. Every prediction and boast that the Chancellor has made has been shown by events to be worthless. The Chancellor says that these are the problems of success. We see that the British economic miracle of which he boasts has been exposed as a blip in his imagination.

Let us examine the nature of the success that has given us so many problems. First, let us take inflation. The Government are presiding over an inflationary spiral unparalleled in Western Europe. Britain's inflation is now the highest of the top seven industrial nations. At 6·4 per cent. and rising to 8 per cent., according to a recent Phillips and Drew prediction, we are falling behind France, Italy, Germany, Japan and the United States.

It is simply not the case that British growth in the past couple of years has been exceptional. It has been part of a spurt of similar growth enjoyed since 1987 by other European economies, among them Spain, Portugal, Italy and even Ireland. Those economies are traditionally considered to be smaller, weaker and possibly even backward.

I do not want to stress the comparison between the British economy and those other economies. Whereas those economies will continue to grow next year by 3 or 4 per cent. according to EEC forecasts, we in the United Kingdom face yet another painful slump as the Chancellor gambles on a recession to correct his past errors. If we want to marvel at a real economic miracle, or an economy with a greater claim to an economic miracle, we should look at Italy whose economy is forecast to grow at a higher rate than ours both this year and next year. The difference is that it is growing at that rate with lower inflation and a trade deficit of less than 2 per cent. of GDP compared with our deficit which is already heading for 4 per cent. of GDP.

Every boast and claim of the Chancellor has been successfully discredited. The Government should not take refuge in their boast about the budget surplus which was achieved only through their cruel meanness towards the benefit claimants and old-age pensioners who alone have lost £4 billion since the Government stopped linking their pensions with their earnings. Even the Chancellor's proud boast that this is a tax-cutting Government is rejected by his friends when the total of the direct and indirect tax burden remains

> "higher than at any time under the last Labour Government."

That is not my opinion, but the judgment of Sam Brittan, writing in the Financial Times.

Taxes, including social security contributions and rates, are equivalent to 38 per cent. of GDP, which is higher than in 1979 and higher than at any time during the period of the last Labour Government. Even the money supply, the favourite indicator for monetarists everywhere, is now growing beyond the Chancellor's prediction and at the same rate as in 1972 under the very Government that this Government so much deride. As for the balance of payments, the trade deficit is now £14 billion or £15 billion. There is no economic miracle. Instead, we see the return of the same old British disease, and it is returning with a vengeance.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Macdonald: No. I have only 10 minutes and I shall press on.

The Government's entire strategy is now in complete disarray. The much-vaunted economic miracle is sadly just another old-fashioned consumer boom, a Barber boom mark II. That judgment is not confined to Labour Members and political allies of the Labour party. It is arrived at even by the Government's friends. Lord Rees-Mogg made the same point in an article in The Independent.

Now is the time for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce a mini Budget to restore investment in neglected roads and railways, in training and in education. Without investment in basic economic assets, the country can have no future. Of course, the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not like mini Budgets. During his Budget speech, he boasted that the Government kept to one Budget a year. The right hon. Gentleman argues that interest rates are the only feasible economic tool worth using. It could be said that each interest rate increase is for the Chancellor of the Exchequer a mini Budget. Until last week, we had had 12 interest rate rises in the year. We now have the 13th and the rate is 13 per cent. In the words of President Reagan, when it comes to interest rates, it appears to be a case of making it one more for the Gipper. Surely the time has come for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to follow the path of his equally erring predecessor, Lord Barber, out of the Treasury into a quiet and undeservedly well-paid sinecure in the City.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): One of the themes that has run through the debate is inflation, and many of us remember the times of high inflation and the tremendous hardships that that brought. The argument has been less about the disease—I think that we all realise the evils of inflation—and more about the nature of the possible cures that are available to us. To take the analogy of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), how many different types of golf club does my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer have to tackle the problem?

The two remedies that have been most cogently argued by Opposition Members as alternatives to the path chosen by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer are the old remedies of higher taxes and a credit squeeze. We remember the remedy of the credit squeeze from the 1960s and 1970s. Higher taxes have a serious effect on the economy. We remember the experimentation in high taxes which started after the 1964 general election, when direct taxes were raised to an extremely high level to fund a massive increase in public expenditure. Those taxes cut growth in the economy. They caused a wage-price spiral and increased the expectations of many people who did not regard what they were earning as a gross figure, as economists told them that they should, but took the more rational view that the sum that they received after paying tax was more important.

Higher taxes have two effects on the economy, both of which are bad. The problem is made the greater because of the way the Government spend the taxes that they raise. Consumer spending is increased because of the redistribution that may occur through indirect taxation and Government expenditure.

Credit controls are a much more interesting experiment, and the Opposition have been suggesting that they are a potential alternative to raising interest rates. We have tried introducing credit controls on many occasions in the past. Indeed, they had a certain ability to work in the economy as it once was. I am talking of the time when the economy was much more closed than it is now. My hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) said that when we had a closed economy we could restrict the ability of domestic banks to lend. We could put political pressure on them. We could even put laws into place to stop domestic banks being able to provide the credit that was demanded by domestic consumers especially. If we were not careful, credit controls cut credit to industry. That meant that we ended up with many exceptions to the controls. We found that the exceptions started to outnumber the opportunities for restricting the availability of credit to such an extent that the controls ceased to be effective.

We now have an open market. No longer do we have the ability to stop those who are denied credit from one source obtaining it from another. The credit can be found from overseas from foreign banks, which may be active in our domestic market, or through the various financial intermediary mechanisms that are now so sophisticated that even the domestic mortgage market is increasingly financed by money that originates from outside the United Kingdom. We have an open market and credit controls would be an impossibility. Indeed, they would have no chance of working without the imposition, or reimposition, of exchange controls.

Exchange controls had ceased to work to any real extent when they were abolished in 1979. They were a problem for tourists who wished to leave the country to travel and spend money overseas, but they had ceased to be a problem for any company that wished to raise money overseas. Similarly, they had ceased to be a problem for any foreign company that wished to raise sterling in this country. Any method of exchange control that was introduced had to have many loopholes if it was to circumvent the real demands of the international market.

We have had some comments about the problems that may be created in the City and the benefits that the City may derive from high interest rates. It is worth remembering that the City, or the financial sector, employs over 1 million and generates over £5 billion in net earnings.

[Mr. Matthew Carrington]

The development and growth of the City is something that we should and need to protect. That is one reason why exchange controls should not return.

Exchange controls lead on, perhaps, to the other solution that is sometimes suggested, which is the manipulation of the exchange rate. That manipulation is now an impossibility, if only because the volumes that are traded in the international market are so large. It has been suggested that we should push down our exchange rate or fix it against other currencies. That is fine at an instant in time, but it is difficult, as we have seen with the rise in United States base rates, to predict what will happen to other currencies. It is rather like looking at the bird in "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland" that turns its head and stares at us. We may think that we have one solution, but the other countries against whose currencies we have fixed sterling may manipulate their currencies away from sterling.

The real problem is house mortgage lending and the leakage from it. The leakage in 1987 was about £14·6 billion, which was half the total sum raised in the house mortgage markets and about three times the rise in consumer credit. It is that leakage which has led to consumer spending, which to a large extent has led to the balance of payments problem that we now face. How best do we control the leakage? My feeling is that the leakage itself is not that much of a problem. If we examine the asset base that underlines the leakage and the borrowing that the house mortgage market represents, the gearing for the borrowing is only about 17 per cent. That is still a relatively low level, although I quite accept and understand that on an income basis the strain on the income ratio is actually higher and more serious. However, that is a short-term problem rather than a structural problem. If there were a higher ratio on the asset base, there would be a more serious problem.

The real difficulty arises from the low savings ratio. Our savings ratio is a highly questionable figure. Many areas of dispute have arisen over the accuracy of our savings ratio figure, if only because the figure is calculated by subtracting one very large number from another and is therefore subject to the inherent volatility and uncertainty of those two numbers. I suspect that we would all agree that the personal savings ratio is too low.

One of the major challenges facing the Government is to raise the personal savings ratio. High interest rates are a start and I believe that they will push up the savings ratio —[Interruption.] I beg the House's pardon for the frog in my throat. It must have been caused by the comments made yesterday by the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) about the frogs that left the marshes as they were drained. I should like to see measures taken to increase the savings ratio and to encourage personal savings.

Mr. Thomas McAvoy (Glasgow, Rutherglen): I want to comment first on the behaviour of Conservative Members during the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). I do not normally make attacks on Conservative Members because that is usually a waste of time and is non-productive. Today, however, we saw a concerted and disgraceful attempt by Conservative Members to disrupt my hon. Friend's speech. That was clearly a tremendous compliment to my hon. Friend because it showed that Conservative Members feared his effectiveness in exposing their economic mismanagement and the Chancellor's incompetence displayed in his Budget speech. At one point this afternoon, Mr. Speaker urged the Front Benches to set the lead. The Government Front Bench set an example by smirking and sniggering during the organised disruption of my hon. Friend's speech. That suggested foreknowledge of what was about to happen.

Many people feel that the Government would stoop to any level to silence criticism of their record. I know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not like it, but his track record merits repeated examination. His Budget forecast the trade deficit at £4 billion, his Autumn Statement forecast £14 billion, and after the latest figures who knows what the ultimate figure will be—certainly not the Chancellor who is supposed to be in the economy's driving seat.

Imports have flooded into Britain, increasing by 12 per cent. this year while in contrast exports have risen by only 1·5 per cent. The Chancellor has increased demand far beyond the capacity of our industry to supply that demand. Those bottlenecks reveal the lack of investment in industry and training that has occurred under this Government. The lion's share of the deficit lies in Britain's manufacturing. The balance of trade in manufactured goods fell sharply into deficit in 1983 and has continued to deteriorate. That reflects the disastrous and dogmatic approach of the Government in 1979 towards manufacturing industry when they pursued their monstrous economic dogma and slaughtered manufacturing industry in this country.

The Chancellor's only response to the deficit has been to raise interest rates again and again. Home buyers and industry are hardest hit by the interest rate rises. The average mortgage payer faces a monthly increase of £30. That should be contrasted with the £12 a month in tax cuts. Even people regarded as the Government's friends, like the CBI, have responded. At the recent CBI conference industrialists warned that high borrowing costs were strangling their companies. They even passed democratically a resolution complaining that the level of interest rates has damaged the international competitiveness of sterling.

Another criterion by which we can judge the Chancellor is inflation. Inflation is now 6·4 per cent. and rising. The Chancellor has admitted that it may reach 7 per cent. in the next seven months irrespective of any other independent forecasts. As hon. Members have rightly stated during the debate, the United Kingdom's inflation level is among the highest of our industrial competitors. Charges for water and electricity are being pushed up in preparation for give-away privatisation and we have seen the onward thrust of inflation as the result of the Government's policies. The mortgage rate increases are the biggest single contribution to the rise in inflation. No wonder the Chancellor would like to remove mortgage rates from the retail prices index. That is another case of Nero fiddling the figures while the country suffers.

Let us be clear. The rise in the inflation rate has been stoked by the Government. If we consider the balance of trade, interest rates and inflation, it is obvious that they have all been a disaster for the Chancellor and hardly merit the description of brilliant.

The Chancellor strutted on to the parliamentary stage on the day of the Budget as the hero of his Back Benchers. What a contrast now. The jury is indeed out on the Chancellor and the forewoman of that jury is waiting for the opportunity to announce the verdict, and is desperate to carry out the sentence.

The Government's strategy gives no hope to the unemployed and it accentuates the north-south divide. We have levels of unemployment in Scotland well above the national average. The Government are doing nothing to give hope to us or to the more deprived areas of England. The tragedy is that ordinary people are suffering and the Government refuse to act, purely and simply to try to preserve their fig leaf of economic credibility.

The events this year have been a watershed in the public's perceptions of the Tories' handling of the economy. The Government continue to make comparisons with the Labour Government, but they forget to mention that they have had the benefit of North sea oil and the massive income from selling the nation's assets even at knock-down privatisation prices. The Government have used those benefits to bribe the electorate to achieve election victories, as all Tory Governments have done in the past.

The reaction on the Conservative Benches to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East shows that they understand that they have reached the end of the road. An old cliché states that when the going gets tough, the tough get going. The country is getting it tough, but the Chancellor should be going, right out of No. 11 Downing street.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): The speech opening the debate from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) would have gone down well in a debating chamber if the audience had no knowledge of economics or economic policy. Sadly for him that was not the case today, and I suspect that that is why he did not give way when some of us tried to help him understand the statistics that he was abusing. He simply failed to admit that the economy is intrinsically extremely healthy. It is not only Conservative Members who state that. The most recent survey from the OECD highlighted the supply side impact on the economy of the Government's policies which have been most important in our progress since 1979.

In comparison with 1979, we now have a shrunken state sector; a public sector budget surplus; less interference in industry; fewer regulations and controls; lower personal and corporate tax rates and fewer tax-induced distortions. The restoration of the market economy has been supported by a reduction in trade union restrictive practices and the deregulation of the labour and financial sectors.

That is an extremely good record, of which we can be justly proud. It has had some very important net effects. For example, Opposition Members have not noticed that investment in this country is ahead of consumption. That is a key indicator. Manufacturing investment in the past 12 months has been up 18 per cent. Productivity is high and likely to stay high. It is important to analyse imports in the latest trade figures because imports of capital goods rose 4 per cent. during the past three months, and that increase in investment shows that the continuing increase in productivity is likely to be secured.

If it is true—I concede that it is—that in our economy consumption has run ahead of domestic supply, who is borrowing more and saving less? It is clearly not industry. Industry has restored cash balances. There was a net real rate of return for industry of just over 9 per cent. in 1987, the highest for 20 years—a significant factor which should be taken into account when considering the impact of interest rates. In 1987, according to the latest figures, corporate savings were £46 billion out of a total of £69 billion of trading profits—a remarkable percentage.

Therefore, industry is not likely to be as damaged as it was before by higher interest rates. It may be that they will cause industry difficulty with its exports because of an increase in the value of sterling, but higher interest rates are more likely to force companies to restrain their wage increases and in those circumstances they will not find their export opportunities damaged. Some Opposition Members would find it instructive to look closely at the policies of Ludwig Erhardt in Germany in the 1960s when he pursued policies that had a similar virtuous effect on German exporters.

It is also important to note that industry is hurt several times more by a 1 per cent. increase in wages than by a 1 per cent. increase in interest rates, something that I hope industrialists will bear in mind if they ever try to complain to the Chancellor about his current policy.

Secondly, is it the Government who are borrowing too much and spending too much? The answer is no, because the public sector surplus is £10 billion and there is a declining trend in public expenditure as a proportion of national income. That gives expenditure programmes greater flexibility without an increase in total spending because of the reduction in debt servicing costs. That is an important point, which again seems to have escaped those Opposition Members who have spoken today.

Thirdly—here I accept that there is a difficulty—there is the private sector. In the past three years the personal savings ratio has fallen from 10 per cent. to 4 per cent. That fact alone has led to a 2 per cent. per annum rise in consumption. I understand that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) said, the figures may be unreliable and Tim Congdow has recently done some interesting work on the personal and corporate savings ratios. But there is no doubt that the Government's overall thrust should be to tackle the increase in personal consumption.

I support the use of higher interest rates. That policy is also supported by Professor Alan Budd, whose recent work has shown that in the short run high interest rates nowadays bear more heavily on consumption than on investment. He also demonstrates that income tax changes unequivocally bear more heavily on consumption than investment, but they take a long time to do so and to do a deflationary job. Therefore, the Government's interest rate policy is the right one.

Several Opposition Members bemoan the fact that the Chancellor cut the highest rates of tax, thus stimulating the economy in the long term. But even if one assumes that the £1 billion that was raised from tax cuts went entirely in consumption this year, it would have had only a marginal effect on the current balance of payments problem. Opposition Members have things completely out of perspective. I wish that they would try to look at the figures in the right context.

There is another weapon that the Chancellor can use and I hope that, given the time that interest rates will take to bite properly into personal consumption, he will be able to look at this at the next Budget. Like other right hon. and hon. Members, I am referring to savings.

It is especially important when trying to encourage personal savings to promote investment in risks—in other words, equities. Let me be controversial and ask the Chancellor to look closely at whether we should allow the £30,000 mortgage relief to be available on share investments as well. Let me ask the Chancellor to look closely at the personal equity plan and dramatically to change the limits that are currently imposed on it. Will the Treasury consider profit-related pay and, instead of making it possible to have a cash bonus, make those bonuses payable in shares, particularly in shares in the company for which people work?

I have recently written a pamphlet "Fair Shares for all the Workers" urging employee share ownership schemes. The House will be glad to know that I do not have time to read it out, but I hope that they will avail themselves of the copy that is in the Library. Employee share ownership schemes are an important way not only of increasing the access to capital investment by the British people, but of giving them a greater commitment to the success of the company for which they work, and I commend them.

Saving encouragement should be used to bring the personal sector in line with the prudence shown by industry and Government. The economy is fundamentally sound. We have a problem with personal consumption and that has caused a difficulty on the overall balance of payments. But it is clear that we have a Chancellor who is prepared to take the right action when the statistics show that it needs to be taken, and who will not throw away the tremendous developments that Britain has made since 1979 in freeing the economy and giving the British people not only a pride in their country but an ability to participate in it through the wider share ownership and other schemes that the Government have introduced.

Mr. Pat Wall (Bradford, North): It is a little over a year since black Monday 19 October 1987 and the stock exchange collapse which wiped about $2 trillion off the value of shares on the world exchanges in three days.

In the words of the Financial Times a couple of weeks ago:

> "At the time it looked . . . and felt . . .like an earthquake, an event that would change the economic direction of the world."

The spectre of another 1929, of a stock exchange collapse followed by a world economic slump, was propounded on both Left and Right in the House and outside.

Instead, paradoxically, we have seen a further expansion of the economies of the western world, with an average growth rate of 3·5 per cent. in developing countries which is expected to rise to 4 per cent. next year.

What is really interesting is that the doubts that were expressed 12 months ago still remain. The attention that today's debate has received demonstrates that, and rightly, because the problems that faced us some 12 months ago are far from solved.

The Chancellor is no longer the emperor of the world. Even within the Conservative party the critics and the doubters multiply. Among the more sober analysts outside the House, that trend is much more marked—indeed, it is exponential. During the Budget debate I hazarded the idea that the Chancellor would become known as the emperor without any clothes, and that is becoming more and more evident every day, even if it is not a particularly pretty thought.

Before the stock exchange collapse in 1929 the economic cycle had already begun to plummet, unlike in October last year. Production reached a peak in April 1929 in Germany, in June in America and in July in Britain. In America, manufacturing production dropped 20 per cent. between August and October 1929. The crash that followed was based on a tight money policy which led to a large number of bankruptcies. It led to the Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930, which provoked a world trade war. Protectionism, competitive devaluation and similar measures transformed the recession into a deep slump in which millions of people throughout the world suffered.

Sixty years on we have a different world with a more integrated economy. That was shown by the suddenness and universality of the October 1987 crash. On that occasion the group of seven countries attempted to learn from the experience of 1929 and tried to ward off the recession by pumping $100 billion into the United States economy. At the same time, particularly in this country, there were policies of increased Government spending, cheaper credit and tax handouts to the rich. There has been a reflation in all major Western economies, but nowhere more than in Britain where the Government have doubled the money supply over the past two years.

The fact that there has not been a similar increase in the production of capital goods and commodities has led to an increase in inflation. It is already 6·4 per cent. in Britain and 4·6 per cent. in America. With the exception of West Germany, it is rising in all the countries of the Western world.

The Chancellor said there will be no change. In fact, since last October the Government's policies have marked a fundamental change in the monetarist policies that the Government followed in the previous eight years. Continuing to reflate will lead to the same consequences as those which occurred in 1973 and 1974 when inflation in the OECD countries averaged 14 per cent. and reached 25 to 30 per cent. in some countries, including Britain. After a small change in policy towards inflation the Chancellor is now using the crudest of monetary weapons—a rapid increase in interest rates and a return to stop-go policies, which he has decried in the past.

The Chancellor faces a twin dilemma. There is stagflation—economic stagnation with high inflation—or a continuation of high interest rates which, as has been said, will lead to a fall in investment in productive industry, over-valuation of the pound, a fall in British exports, and an increase in our trade deficit.

The Chancellor talks as if Britain is an isolated island cut off from the rest of the world and as if it did not feel the effects of the American economy. In America the trade deficit is rising. It is over $170 billion and the budget deficit is $135 billion. American interest rates are rising as our interst rates rise, and the strength of the dollar increases as the strength of the pound increases. However, there is still the danger, as there was a year ago, of an increasing trade war and restrictions on world trade which will lead to a world recession. That would have appalling consequences, particularly for Britain. Countries such as Japan will have to seek other markets in Europe, as will West Germany. Thirty per cent. of our manufacturing base has been destroyed and our productivity is one third to a half less than that of our major competitors. Manufacturers are already complaining about the lack of a skilled or trained work force.

With those problems Britain will face a desperate economic position. Those who want to talk about a market economy should look at the world in which we live with its booms and slumps which affect the lives of millions. There is a net transfer of financial resources from developing to advanced countries in excess of $30 billion per year. That is leading to appalling conditions in those countries. There are still 20 million people unemployed in the OECD countries, and in Britain at least one third of the population lives in poverty and at least two fifths have not benefited from the policies of the Government and have lower living standards.

We should not forget the social consequences of the Government's policies. In an editorial in The Sunday Telegraph Peregrine Worsthorne said that the Government

> "fail to grasp the depth of outrage done to socialist-minded people by this Government; far greater outrage than was ever done to Tory-minded people by any Labour Government. Just imagine what the state of Tory opinion would have been if a Labour Government had ever felt strong enough to introduce a swingeing wealth tax, abolish the public schools, nationalise the Oxbridge colleges, prohibit fox hunting, proscribe titles and turn Whites' Club into a GLC creche".

He went on to say:

> "There is no gratitude in politics. Those who have benefited from the Thatcherite revolution won't thank her if they see their gains eroded".

He ended by saying:

> "Not only has she trampled on genuine ideals with deep roots in our national history but enjoyed doing so. In economic good times this did not matter. But if economic times turn downwards . . . it could matter a lot."

The Government's economic philosophy is based on the belief that there is a choice between the bureaucratic state-owned economies of the East and the free-for-all market economy they preach. I believe that there is another choice—a democratic socialist choice—where the state intervenes in society, not in a bureaucratic way but democratically, with the full involvement of the producers and consumers in our society.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I wish to contribute to the debate from the perspective of someone who spent 15 years of her working life before coming to the House in business. I started a business from scratch and worked it up producing goods, selling them, importing, exporting, understanding the significance of the value of money, and buying and selling foreign currencies in order to trade.

There has been much talk today based on political or economic dogma, whether it is Marxists who believe that one should control everything, including exchange, the Keynesians who believe that one can manufacture money and create businesses out of that, or the monetarists who believe that one can manipulate the money supply to control the economy.

I started my business in the early 1970s and lived through the horrors of the rampaging inflation experienced under the Labour Administration. Wilson's weasel words about the pound in our pockets not being devalued are carved on my heart because at that time I was heavily involved in importing bits and pieces and I suffered badly. I almost lost my business as a result of that economic interference. Therefore, I am no lover of Government interference in the economy.

The tremendous success that our Government have achieved in righting the economy was predicted on the degree to which they left the economy alone. They reduced tax rates so that people could make their own decisions about what to do with their money. The Government abolished exchange controls, which was a brilliant move by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's predecessor. It freed people to spend money in the world market as they saw fit. The golden thread that has run through our economic success has been lack of intervention in economic matters. It is for that reason that it troubles me that we have now taken to the "touch on the tiller" mentality, which is what altering the interest rate is about.

We are in danger of impaling ourselves on that dogma. It is extremely important to take stock of the effect that such an idea is having on our business community. Business is about producing and exchanging goods. In reality it does not matter whether it takes place with foreigners or within our domestic market. It is nonsense to suggest that exporting has some intrinsically greater value than does selling goods domestically. That is like saying it is better to sell in Billericay than in Birmingham, Bradford or anywhere else. It is a subjective judgment of what economics and the economy, the business world, is all about.

If I had to buy foreign currency to purchase goods abroad, the money markets would adjust their values accordingly. If I wanted to buy an Hitachi television set, that would be taken into account by those who deal in currencies. To create artificial values for currency is to interfere with the natural market process. To try to tie the rudder of a ship so that it can no longer steer between the rocks is very dangerous. The same is true of trying to control exchange or interest rates in the interests of balancing the economy.

The concept of the balance of the economy is absurd. It really does not matter whether, at any particular time, we export more than we import or vice versa. If the economy is left to settle, it will balance itself. The level of the exchange rate—the value of money—shows what the world market thinks about the way our economy is going. That is what should decide the issue. To try to control that pivot point create difficulties.

Why are we trying to control the economy? Is it because of inflation? We all know, because my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor have said so often, that inflation is created by politicians, not by business men, the greedy consumer who wants to buy more goods, or even trade unionists. It is an artificial extension of the money supply. Only the Government, by reducing the difference between their expenditure and taxation, can do anything about that. Trying to manipulate people's buying habits—which, to some extent, we are doing by raising the cost of money—will not succeed. We should allow exchange and interest rates to float and then the economy will balance.

We have heard a great deal about the need to increase savings. It has been said that raising interest rates will somehow induce people to save more. Japan faced many economic problems during the 1950s. In an attempt to encourage savings, which I accept is an important aspect of a healthy economy, it exempted interest on savings from taxation. That had a stunning effect on the level of savings which, in turn, produced the capital on which the success of the Japanese economy since then has been based. In addition, the then Japanese Chancellor reduced and stabilised the rate of taxation to a flat rate of 30 per cent. Those are the sorts of measures that will bring the economy into balance.

I do not believe that manipulating interest rates is the way out of what we perceive to be a dilemma, although I do not think that there is a balance of payments crisis. We have a healthy economy and we have put more money into people's pockets. People naturally want to spend it, which in turn increases the domestic market. Of course, some of that money will be spent abroad, and there is no great harm in that. It is not a tragedy. The Japanese do not eat the money that they obtain from our buying their goods and services; they do not stick it in a box under the bed —they spend it in Britain by investing in factories or buying our goods. They exchange it in the money markets for other currencies. It is absurd to suggest that there is something intrinsically bad about importing goods.

Increasing interest rates causes many difficulties for the business community. Big businesses may well have large savings, but small businesses are almost always working on overdrafts. Before my right hon. Friend thinks of raising interest rates again, I ask him to consider the basic policy of the economist Hayek, whose views I greatly respect, which is to allow the exchange and interest rates to float.

8.55 pm

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): Today, in the face of another devastating and effective critique of the Chancellor's strategy, the right hon. Gentleman's credit ran out. It was foolish of him to claim that the Opposition motion does not refer to inflation when it specifically regrets

> "the way in which current policies have pushed up mortgage rates and other prices and charges".

Some of us had previously only suspected that the Chancellor was an economic illiterate. If the recent price rises do not constitute inflation, the Chancellor must explain what does.

The truth is that the term "inflation" is now as embarrassing to the Government as the term "unemployment" has been hitherto. It will have come as no surprise to the House today to hear the Chancellor attempting to modify the definition of "inflation"—no doubt the first of many—so that he could achieve a reduction in the same way that the Government changed the methods of recording unemployment to mask its real level.

If the Chancellor is right in saying that the real level of inflation is less than the Treasury figures because mortgage rises are included, how will he explain that to the millions of families in London who are now paying £20 a week more for their mortgages than they were at this time last year? How can he say that that is not inflation? For the 100,000 home owners in Edinburgh, and almost 1 million throughout Scotland, the rise in mortgage rates since the Budget has burdened them with an average monthly increase of £30. For thousands of home owners in my constituency and others, the rises so far this year have added £1,000 to £2,0000 to their annual repayments. The next mortgage rate increase will be a direct result of the Chancellor's 1 per cent. increase last Friday. That will deal a crippling blow to hundreds of thousands of home owners. The Chancellor will add another record to his collection—the record number of mortgage defaults, although in fact he already holds that record.

The Chancellor will live to regret his failure today to take action to help mortgagors. Many of the poorer home owners cannot live with that. Indeed, it is not only home owners who have suffered since the March Budget— tenants have had to bear rent increases of more than 8 per cent., almost twice the March rate of inflation, and electricity price rises of 9 per cent. That has also hit industrial and commercial competitiveness. The householders who have been hardest hit by the price rises that the Government have forced on consumers are the 10 million senior citizens who spend a higher proportion of their income on fuel than do the remainder of the population.

One of the 14,000 senior citizens in my constituency telephoned me this morning to comment on the latest pronouncement emanating from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, who said at the weekend that fuel costs were low and that state benefits meant that old people should have no problems keeping warm. This latest advice is part of a series of advisory notes, including advice to pensioners to start knitting to beat the winter chill and to sell their assets so that they can take out health insurance in the private sector.

Like the Chancellor, the Under-Secretary is out of touch with reality. As Age Concern has said today, the reality is benefit cuts, with senior citizens waiting months for any cash help. The reality is that the Help the Aged's winter warmth line has received more than 1,000 calls in the past 10 days from people who cannot afford to heat their homes. The reality is that pensioner couples should have had in their hands every week £18 more from this Government to spend on their fuel bills, but the breaking in 1980 of the link between pay and pension rises has allowed the Chancellor an extra £5 billion this year alone. Last Friday the Chancellor said that from next October £200 million of that would go back to the pensioners.

Today, the Chancellor had the chance to state how he would use the remaining £4·8 billion that he has taken from the pensioners to help them. However, as we know, the Chancellor has already given that money to help those on top earnings. He has not invested in our senior citizens or in industry. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) said that industry was destroyed in this country in the 1980s—and all to no purpose. It is no wonder that the Chancellor declined to take any interventions today, especially from his hon. Friends. He knows that, however cogent the arguments and no matter how scathing the criticism of him by the Opposition, it is nothing to the criticisms coming from his own side. He knows that when his right hon. Friend, the former Prime Minister, criticised the Chancellor's "insensitivity to other members of the Community", he was referring to the EEC, but it is equally true that the Chancellor is insensitive to the needs of our own community.

The nine increases in interest rates since the March Budget have made it impossible for the business community to finance investment by borrowing. The millions of men and women languishing on the dole know the real price of the Government's economic failure.

The Chancellor has recently received some bad news and some very bad news. The bad news came in the widespread criticism of his policies by his right hon. Friends the Members for Guildford (Mr. Howell) and for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe). The very bad news is that he now has some support from the City—from those very people who less than a month ago he was castigating as making forecasts that were even more inaccurate than his own.

Today, the Chancellor had two opportunities. One was to announce an investment programme for training and for industry, to stop almost limitless credit eroding our home economy, to take action to reduce interest and mortgage rates and to help businesses and people. The other was for the Chancellor to help himself by giving a convincing defence of his financial strategy. He has failed, and the country is paying for his failure.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): The hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) said that Conservative Members were sitting sullen faced and were fair-weather friends to the Chancellor. I wish to place on record the fact that I support the Chancellor in what he is doing now, as I did in March. I do not believe that the Chancellor has it wrong in having to temper the economy slightly because of the large balance of payments deficit. Some of us are determined to defend the Government's record, believe that we have it right, and that the economy is still strong.

Of course, the Labour party has a considerable problem. My hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) said that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) knew no economics. He certainly knows no economic history, because those Conservative Members who remember the last Labour Government will recall the appalling record left to us in 1979. We will take no lectures from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East or from his right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey, who has been noticeable by his absence from every economic debate since he left office as Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1979.

All the indicators as to the prosperity of our economy show just how well off people are. Since 1979 the man on average earnings has had a 27 per cent. increase in his take-home pay, after taking account of price rises. A man on half average earnings is 20 per cent. better off in real terms and pensioners, whom the Opposition often use as a pawn in their campaigns, are 25 per cent. better off.

One has only to look around Britain today to see the prosperity. Some 67 per cent. of people own their own homes, which is a larger percentage than in any other European country. That is the mark of wealth creation and the wealth of interest in home ownership that ordinary people have. I am delighted that this party has been the party for a home-owning democracy in spite of the objections from the Opposition, who when we started to sell council houses objected and said that the tenants would not buy them. Yet eight or nine years later 1 million tenants own their own homes and have a stake in our society.

The Opposition have complained about the increase in mortgage rates, but only a few weeks ago they were complaining about the increases in house prices. They should make sure that they look at both sides of the coin. Of course mortgage rate increases are not welcome to any of us who own our homes and who know about the problems of our constituents.

Labour Members have complained about the north-south divide and the fact that house prices in the north are cheaper than in the south. They then complained, however, when house prices started to go up. Now that we are taking measures to ensure that house price increases slow down, as they are doing, they complain about that.

The Opposition have also complained that, in recent months, working people have had a certain amount of money taken from their pockets. Of course everyone regrets that mortgage rates have gone up, but we should also remember that the Labour party has voted against every tax cut since 1979. If it had had its way, we would have a tax rate of 34p in the pound. For Opposition Members to complain about people having to pay extra in mortgage interest is rich when they have objected to any cut in people's income tax rate since 1979. Those cuts have put money in people's pockets. I find it astonishing that Opposition Members can look us straight in the face.

The Opposition have complained about inflation. I concede that the inflation rate has run between 6 and 7 per cent. and that is unacceptably high, but there is not one month in this Parliament when it has come within a mile of the Labour party's record when it was 9 per cent. at its lowest rate. How dare the Opposition lecture us about inflation when, in five years, the Labour Government never got the inflation rate down to anywhere near what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has achieved.

Concern has been expressed about the effect of interest rates on small businesses. I have grave concern for the small businesses of my constituency and the family farms which suffer when mortgage and interest rates increase. The Labour party has failed to recognise, however, that 80 per cent. of the increase in the balance of payments deficit has been caused by demand from the consumer. Therefore, it is obvious that if interest rates, which affect the mortgage rate, are increased, that has a quicker and more effective dampening effect on consumer demand than any other measure.

Today business liquidity means that industry is much better able to stand up to an increase in interest rates than it ever was when the Labour party was in office. Opposition Members should consider their party's record before they lecture us.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East called for top taxpayers to have their tax cuts taken away. That policy equals cutting off one's nose to spite one's face. Opposition Members have not noticed that all the evidence, international and national, suggests that, when taxes are cut, the tax yield increases. That is true in this country where the top taxpayers, instead of paying 24 per cent. of the total tax yield, now pay 29 per cent. That is true of the far east, Japan, and the United States, and of every country where taxes have been cut. Conversely, in Belgium and Ireland where taxes have been increased, the tax yield has fallen. That is a recipe for disaster.

A tax-cutting policy has been successful, but tax increases would have the opposite effect. It is strange that, even after all the international evidence, Opposition Members continue to believe that theirs is the right policy.

I believe that tax cuts are a moral imperative. We are talking about the earnings of individual people. The state does not own people's earnings. The Opposition believe that the public are only entitled to pocket money which can be taken away from them at the whim of the state. In 1947, Douglas Jay put it better than anybody else in the "Socialist Case" when he said that the men in Whitehall knew best. Some 40 years on, the Opposition still believe that, despite nationalisation and all the disasters of state control. They still believe that the Government can put their hands into people's pockets and control their money. It is no accident that it is in those countries where the state controls people's earnings, their jobs and their homes that political freedom is largely negated. Contrast this with countries where people keep their own money and they have democratic freedom as well.

We must remember that we have a problem with the balance of payments—2·75 per cent. of gross domestic product. But I remember that, under the Government led by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and the previous Labour Government, it was 3·8 per cent. of GDP in 1974. In fact, in four out of the five years of the previous Labour Government, there was a balance of payments deficit at a far higher percentage of GDP than there has ever been under this Government. Let us remember that. When we consider the Government's record, we should contrast it with the alternatives that have been put forward in the past few years and support the policy of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

9.11 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): This debate has now lasted for nearly 40 hours and no fewer than 137 right hon. and hon. Members have taken part. With due deference to the brilliant contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), it is fair to say that no speech exceeded in wit and wisdom that of the hon. Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw), at the beginning of the debate.

The debate has been long and, at times, interesting. It has been so long that when it began the words "last month's trade deficit" meant only £500 million and the Chancellor's pallid features were attributed to a night on the tiles which, by coincidence, was in my constituency. He did not tell me that he was visiting Camden Town, but I suppose that he can claim that a 1960s night at the Camden Palace scarcely counts as an official visit by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Whatever the original causes of the Chancellor's pallor, we can be sure that when he heard the latest trade figures, in the words of Procul Harum's 1967 hit,

> "His face at first just ghosty turned a whiter shade of pale."

The Chancellor could scarcely listen to the other chart-topping hits of 1967 without an uncanny feeling that they were predicting what has happened to him this year, starting with "I'm a Believer", moving on to "Puppet on a String", then—I assume a reference to the tapes—"Silence is Golden" and ending the year with "Let the Heartaches Begin".

On the strength of the ministerial contributions to this debate—not many of the contributors are present—I have increasing sympathy with the Prime Minister's view—she is not present either—that no one in the Cabinet is fit to be Prime Minister. Unfortunately for the right hon. Lady, to judge by her speech, that goes for her as well. If we look at the Treasury Bench, which is finally adorned by the Chancellor, it is easy to discern—or would be if they were here—several examples of the saddest of all Cabinet creatures—former next leaders of the Tory party. It is hard to see who is still left in the race. If I were asked where the smart money should go, I would suggest that Catford dog track any Monday, Wednesday or Saturday was a better bet than any of the Tories present.

The Secretary of State for Social Security, who is a television voice-over made flesh, was tipped as a likely successor to the Prime Minister just 18 months ago. Now, ravaged by circumstance and by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), he seems only half the man he was and the Prime Minister has made certain that he is only half the Secretary of State he was.

Next, we should consider the new half of the Department of Health and Social Security job-share, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). As many hon. Members know, it is not difficult to be an unpopular Minister if one is strapped for cash, but it takes real genius to give the nurses what he claims is an almost £1,000 million pay increase and to be even more unpopular. One of his hon. Friends told me that he is being tough with the nurses to promote his chances of becoming Prime Minister. What an illustration of the state of mind of Tory Back Benchers!

We are told that the Secretary of State for Education and Science has ambitions in the direction of 10 Downing street. His friends told him that if he really wanted to get there, he would have to make the supreme sacrifice. Nothing daunted, he did. He sacrificed the education of a generation of children to the turmoil of competitive tests for seven-year-olds, open enrolment and opting out. To add insult to injury, he then asserts that progressive education authorities, such as the Inner London education authority, are spending too much money educating each secondary school child—that is despite spending at least twice as much himself on the education of each of his children.

I turn now to the Secretary of State for the Environment, who is also not gracing us with his presence tonight. Even his best friend would not dream of suggesting him as a suitable leader for the Tory party—at least not since the passage of the Reform Act 1832. He is a man so arrogant that he was once accurately described by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) as the only man in the world who can strut sitting down.

The right hon. Gentleman does not let his principles get in the way of his seat in the Cabinet. We remember him of yore as deregulator Ridley, the bonfire of controls, who said that everything should be left to market forces. He presents an unconvincing face as the Lord Protector of the Environment and purveyor of sweet water to the lower classes. He is the man who produced a White Paper on housing without mentioning the homeless—the people most in need of a home of their own. That may have been carelessness but his omission of another word is criminal negligence.

In 1985, the right hon. Gentleman set the priorities for London Transport in an 838-word letter. The one word that he never mentioned was safety. The fire at King's Cross killed 31 people because, like him, London Transport did not think that safety was important. Many more would have died but for the presence of mind of the station staff, police, fire fighters ambulance staff, doctors and nurses. Anyone who reads the Fennell report will know that deeds were done that night that went far beyond the call of duty.

Later, to their credit, the chairmen of London Regional Transport and of London Underground accepted their share of the blame and resigned. Why did the buck stop there? What about the man who set their priorities and fixed their budgets, and who told the House that he would be accountable to this House? If he has a shred of the honour that right hon. and hon. Members are supposed to have, he would join the other Ridley and resign.

Another who should resign, but will not, is the Chancellor. Virtually everybody would agree that his last Budget was unfair—rewarding the rich and penalising the poor. However, at the time, many people including those wonderful youthful experts in the City described it as brilliant. They proclaimed the Chancellor "Man of the Year" and "Chancellor of the Century". A century is a long time in politics. Just last year the Chancellor was chosen as "Parliamentarian of the Year" by the Spectator. This year, I believe that he was not even invited to the lunch—[Interruption.] I had the pleasure of sitting next to the Chancellor's son and found him infinitely more charming than his father.

Last month's trade deficit of £2,400 million has been exceeded only twice in this country's history in a whole year. One of those years was last year, for which the Chancellor was also responsible. The only previous occasion was in 1974 as a result of the oil price increases and I shall return to the subject of oil in a minute.

Why is our balance of trade so bad? It is partly because, for electoral reasons, the Chancellor created the biggest credit boom in history. On top of that, his tax changes poured money into the pockets of the best-off and increased their spending power. What has happened to all that credit and all that extra disposable income in handbags and pockets? Most of it has been spent on buying houses and goods. The record amount of credit combined with the low number of houses being built has led to record house prices.

The record amount of credit has also led to our shops being filled with goods from abroad. Why is that? The main answer is that a lot of the goods that people want to buy are not made in this country any more. That is because 2 million fewer people are now employed in manufacturing industry than when the Tories first came to office. There are now 2 million fewer people making things for others to wear or use. People ask why they cannot buy British any more. The answer is that the Government deliberately shut down large parts of British industry.

In Scotland, 200,000 fewer people are making things, and there are 150,000 fewer making things in the north. But it is not just there—500,000 manufacturing jobs in the midlands and another 500,000 here in the relatively prosperous south-east have gone.

Labour warned what would happen. We said that a country with a large population cannot get by without a prosperous manufacturing base. We said that Britain could not prosper just by selling one another hamburgers, insurance policies and pension schemes.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): No-tech.

Mr. Dobson: I have got that.

We said that the money spent had to be earned. We said that we should devote the one-off bonus of North sea oil to tooling up our industry and training our people. When we said that, we were laughed to scorn by people who should have known better, and by the Chancellor. In February 1984, he told the House that he was at a loss to understand the selective importance attached by Labour and, to be fair, by some Tories to the manufacturing sector. In Washington later that year, the Chancellor warned that the world should not > "be seduced by the wonders of high-tech into overlooking the fact that many of the jobs of the future will be in labour-intensive service industries which are not so much low-tech as no-tech."

With iron resolve hitherto unknown outside a nunnery, his Cabinet colleagues joined him in resisting the seductions of high technology. Not for them the primrose path of dalliance with high-tech investment, high-quality training and high quality research. No, they left that to Japan, Korea and Taiwan.

During the period of this Government, our imports from Japan have risen by 267 per cent., imports from Korea have risen by 247 per cent., and imports from Taiwan have risen by no less than 362 per cent., to replace the goods that 2 million British workers used to make. The goods that we are importing are not no-tech.

Mr. Tebbit: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No, I shall not give way. The right hon. Gentleman can make a telephone call later. No doubt he will get it at a cheap rate from his employers.

Mr. Tebbit: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When an hon. Member makes an untrue assertion about the personal conduct of another hon. Member, that hon. Member is entitled to some redress. If the hon. Gentleman does not have the guts to allow me to intervene, he should at least have the guts to put things right when he says things that are untrue. The hon. Gentleman is gutless and he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Dobson: I am sorry. If British Telecom charges the right hon. Gentleman for his calls, he suffers as much as we do, no doubt.

Mr. Tebbit rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Is the right hon. Gentleman seeking to raise a point of order—[Interruption.]

Mr. Tebbit: I cannot hear above the noise, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) seeking to raise a point of order?

Mr. Tebbit: Yes, Sir. Is it in order for an hon. Member to make an assertion that there is an improper financial motive in the conduct of another hon. Member? That was the burden of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, and they were made because he did not have the guts to give way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is contrary to our conventions for any right hon. or hon. Member to reflect adversely on the conduct, character or integrity of another hon. Member, but I did not hear any such remark.

Mr. Dobson: The goods that we are importing are not no-tech. Some are low-tech, but most are high-tech products produced on equipment more up-to-date than ours and by a work force increasingly better trained than ours. Those imports are the products of the deliberate policies of the Chancellor which he outlined so succinctly in Washington four years ago.

The next question that the Chancellor has to answer is: where would he be without North sea oil? If we discount oil exports from the trade figures of last month the deficit would be £2,800 million instead of the already record-breaking £2,400 million. If we make a proper comparison with the period before North sea oil and add our oil consumption for last month to our import total, the total trade deficit for last month would be £3,200 million. That would give a January to October trade deficit, not of £12,000 million but of £21,000 million and shows what a catastrophe the Government's policies have been for the non-oil economy.

To pay for this incompetence house buyers now face enormous increases in the costs of their mortgages. I heard that the Chancellor was "relaxed" about the impact of the interest rate increases on the cost of mortgages. Relaxed, is he? The real rate of interest, the difference between the inflation rate and interest rate, is now 6·5 per cent. If he is relaxed about that, he must have been delirious in 1965 when he obtained a famous mortgage. You may recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the right hon. Gentleman got a £20,000 council mortgage from Kensington and Chelsea at 6·5 per cent. The rate of inflation then was 3·9 per cent., giving a real interest of 2·6 per cent. No wonder he went to the Camden Palace last week to celebrate the 1960s. Most young couples would celebrate with him if they could get a mortgage at a real interest of 2·6 per cent. I note in passing from an article that he penned with his own fair hand for The Spectator at the time that he justified his borrowing from the public sector because "the private sector is failing the nation."

Times have changed almost as much as the views of the Chancellor. In London last year, before things got half as bad as they are now, no less than 54 per cent. of would-be first-time buyers could not afford what the Association of District Councils called the cheapest common type of house. In Surrey the figure was 64 per cent., in Essex 56 per cent. and in Hertfordshire 49 per cent.

Is it fair to blame the Chancellor or the rest of the Cabinet for all this? We all know who takes the decisions —the Prime Minister. Nobody writing a book these days on British Government would come up with the idea that the Prime Minister is primus inter pares or, for the non-classical scholars opposite, first among equals. No, she got rid of the equals and got in the yes men, giving our language a new collective noun—a cringe of Cabinet Ministers. These days she does not communicate through the House. We have heard from her only 13 speeches in five and a half years. She feeds out information through a Mr. Bernard Ingham, the Official Deceiver. This extra-parliamentary functionary is no longer content to authorise leaks of confidential legal advice from the Law Officers of the Crown. Apparently he now has the authority of his mistress at 10 Downing street to embarrass the Queen, announcing off the record that the Queen would not be allowed to visit the Soviet Union. It is about time that the Prime Minister remembered that she swears an oath of allegiance to the Queen. It is not yet the other way round.

Before the right hon. Lady became Prime Minister and could use public officials for party purposes, the Tory party put out a press release in April 1979 giving her attitude to manufacturing industry. I hope that Conservative Members will listen to her pearls of wisdom. She said:

"We are going to do it by creating the conditions for real jobs, not artificial ones, so that once again the products stream from our factories and workshops while the customers of the world scramble over each other to buy them."

That was what she said when she was Leader of the Opposition. A likely trade deficit of more than £15,000 million suggests to me that few customers of the world are getting killed in the scramble to buy British. No wonder, with all the obstacles that her Government have put in the way of exporters—British exporters.

Much attention has been paid to the Prime Minister's trips abroad. Her favourite venue seems to be Washington. She is very popular there. It would be the grossest ingratitude on the part of the United States Government if she was not popular there. It is not just that she will go along with any aspect of American foreign policy as long as they promise her Trident. Like her, the American Government have a balance of trade problem. The Prime Minister has been very generous to President Reagan. She had done more to solve his trade problems than she has done to solve ours. During the period of her Government, United States exports to Britain have almost doubled. By those standards, she should be even more welcome in West Germany, whose exports to Britain have increased by 172 per cent., or in Italy and France, whose exports to us have more than doubled. There is a rumour that the Prime Minister will be offered the post of honorary president of the Japanese chamber of trade for services to exports—Japanese exports.

We are told that when the Prime Minister goes abroad she is batting for Britain—Mr. Bernard Ingham again, I believe. But a glance at the scoreboard shows that the bowling is usually too good for her. She may sneak a few export orders, but the people whom she meets end up exporting far more to us. To take Turkey as an example, the Prime Minister said that she visited that country to build bridges. Since she came to office, Turkey's exports to Britain have increased by 767 per cent. Other countries to benefit from such visits are China, at 187 per cent., Singapore at 155 per cent. and Hong Kong at 122 per cent. It appears from the figures that one visit from our Prime Minister and their goods come flooding into Britain. Under her Government, whatever else we have done, we have become brilliant at—how did she put it?— "scrambling over each other" to buy foreign people's goods.

All that was predictable, and it was predicted not just by the Labour party but in 1985 by the House of Lords Select Committee on Overseas Trade. It feared a current account deficit of £13,000 million a year by 1990. It said that the position was not self-correcting and would not come right on its own. It called for the manufacturing base to be enlarged, import penetration to be combated and manufacturing exports to be stimulated. Like us, the Committee was derided and ignored.

The Prime Minister ignored all that, preferring the seductive attractions of guards of honour mounted by foreign Heads of Government who know that Britain is becoming the export pushover of the world. They are happy to nod when she tells them that our economy is strong. But what else does she tell them about our country? More important, what does she leave out of all those speeches spattered with the royal "we"? I have not heard it reported that she has told any Heads of Government that within two miles of her official residence whole families of her fellow citizens made homeless by her housing policies live, eat, drink, wash and sleep in single, squalid, insanitary rooms in rundown bed-and-breakfast hotels. She does not tell them that those hotel children, who cannot sleep at night, cannot get exercise, cannot relax and cannot develop must attend schools where the Government have cut funds to help those children, and whose teachers are accused of incompetence and worse by her Secretary of State for Education and Science, who paid to make damn sure that his children did not share their classrooms with the children of the homeless.

It is not just that recent events have shown the shortsighted incompetence of the Government. They also show the Government's arrogant unconcern for the unemployed and the underpaid.

Recent events have also shown the eroding of ancient rights and liberties and the concentration of power in the hands of Government and, within the Government, the concentration of power in the hands of the Prime Minister. As far as I can see—and this is to the Prime Minister's credit—she displays little personal vanity, certainly less than many of her predecessors. But she is puffed up with political vanity. She has laid claim to credit for anything in our country that seemed worthwhile or that appeared to be doing well. There is no point in her pretending when things are going wrong that it is not her fault. The responsibility is hers. The Gracious Speech is hers. If put into practice it will hurt the weak, punish the caring and reward the rich and selfish. It truly epitomises all that the Prime Minister stands for. Both she and it are a national disgrace.

9.35 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): I shall begin by reminding the House of the way in which this debate started last Tuesday with excellent speeches from my hon. Friends the Members for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) and for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples). It is not their fault if the debate did not always live up to the start that they gave to it. They both spoke with humour and insight about their constituencies. Their speeches will have enhanced the already high regard in which they are held in all parts of the House.

I should also like to mention the nearest thing that we had to a maiden speech in the debate, the retread speech by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars). His speech was characteristic and Conservative Members look forward to hearing from him again even if Labour Members are not so keen to do so.

Today's debate on the economy has been much heralded, but very little in the way of constructive alternative policies emerged from the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen. The right hon. Members for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) showed the whizz kids on the Opposition Front Bench what opposition should be about. They made constructive speeches, although I disagreed with most of what they said.

I intend to devote the second half of my speech to dealing with economic questions. As Leader of the House winding up this six-day debate, there are three things that I should like to mention first. The House may wish to reflect on the fact that we are completing what may be the last untelevised debate on the Loyal Address. The Select Committee on the Televising of Proceedings of the House is making progress as fast as it reasonably can, but the House will appreciate that there are complex issues with wide-ranging implications to be addressed. In this context, I note the report from the Procedure Committee on the implications for procedure of televising the House. That report will, no doubt, be relevant to tomorrow's debate, but I shall just say that I am sure that the Committee is right not to suggest any premature changes, and that any changes that may be made should be for the convenience of the House rather than the convenience of the broadcasters.

Secondly, my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) raised the question of the organisation and functions of Select Committees as a result of the splitting of the old DHSS into the Department of Health and the Department of Social Security, and the increasing effect of Europe on the work of our Select Committees. I agree with my right hon. Friend's logic about the split into two Select Committees—one to deal with health and one to deal with social security. We have to consider the timing of such a change, and that needs to be discussed.

My right hon. Friend was right to raise the issue of the best way to deal with European questions, but that is something that I should like to discuss with him, as Chairman of the Liaison Committee, after I have heard the views of the House in tomorrow's procedure debate.

I must now say something about the forthcoming legislative programme in this Session, which will occupy most of our time until next summer. The programme for this Session is deliberately a balanced one. It contains measures and policies covering four areas of concern both to the House and to the general public. The first theme is that of continued economic progress through the pursuit of policies to control inflation, foster enterprise and promote employment. In that connection, I would mention the Bills relating to the employment of women and young people and to training, the Social Security Bill, the Bill relating to company law and the law on mergers. Above all, there are three privatisation measures.

Secondly, there are measures that concern the application of the criminal law to maintain security and order while protecting individual liberty. In that context, let me mention our plans to replace section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 with provisions which prohibit only those disclosures of information that would be harmful to the public interest. It is a civil liberties measure which greatly limits the present scope of the criminal law and is also—and unashamedly—a measure which protects the vital interests of a democratic Government in a free society.

There are also measures relating to terrorism: the replacement with permanent arrangements of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act, which has saved so many lives and which—to its shame—the Labour party has consistently refused to support. I draw the House's attention, in particular, to the provisions aimed at intercepting the flow of funds to terrorist organisations. The courts will have the power to order forfeiture of money or property. Similar provisions have been applied to the funds of drug traffickers and—in the Criminal Justice Act—to the loot from other crimes. The level of remission for terrorist offences is also being reduced. We are introducing other measures, too, relating to Northern Ireland to secure fair employment there and to require from local government candidates declarations against terrorism.

Another important measure is designed to deal with football hooligans. We are proposing a national membership scheme of clubs to control admission to football matches. The scheme will deter troublemakers, both inside and outside the grounds. That will release police manpower and effort to deal with other offences.

The third theme of our proposals is the care of those in need. That applies particularly to the protection of children and the rights of parents. The present child care law both inadequately safeguards the welfare of children at risk and is unfair to parents. The widespread concern at the handling of the Cleveland child abuse cases, shared on both sides of the House, should make these proposals particularly welcome. My right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor has also issued a consultation document on the proposal for an office of child protection to be established within the courts system.

This Session will also see decisions announced following the Government's Health Service review.

The final theme is the continuation of our policies for progress on arms control achieved from a position of strength and for continued good relations with both the super powers. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has already met President-elect Bush and reaffirmed our strong commitment to NATO and our American partners. Relations with the Soviet Union will, we hope, be further enhanced by the visit of Mr. Gorbachev.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Which of her two personalities will the Prime Minister adopt when President Gorbachev comes here? Will she be the person who says, "We can do business with this man" or will she show the other side of her personality when she starts making up fanciful and ridiculous demands—for example, when, as the Queen's minder, she is liable to say that the Queen cannot go to Moscow unless President Gorbachev reinstates a Cossack regiment in the Red Army? Is she going to be Mrs. Nice or Mrs. Nasty?

Mr. Wakeham: My right hon. Friend will do what she has done all the while she has been Prime Minister. She will negotiate on behalf of Britain and will produce for this country the best agreements available which will be substantially better than anything that the Labour party could dream of producing.

I turn now to the three privatisation measures in this Session's programme. The House well knows that privatisation is a key element in our economic strategy. Industry operates better if it is freed from political interference and is subject to the competitive pressures of the market. Eighteen major companies have now been privatised. Almost 40 per cent. of the state sector that we inherited has been returned to private ownership.

In 1979, state-owned industries accounted for 11·5 per cent. of Britain's GDP and employed some 7 per cent. of the total work force. Many of those industries were grossly inefficient and losing vast sums of taxpayers' money. In 1979, the nationalised industries were costing taxpayers £4·5 billion a year at today's prices.

Since privatisation, industries which drained the public purse are now filling it by making large contributions to the Exchequer through taxation. British Telecom, for example, is now contributing far more to the Government through corporation tax than it ever did when it was state-run. Since 1979, the Exchequer has benefited by more than £22 billion from privatisation.

However, the case for privatisation is emphatically not about raising money but about making industry work better. The balance of reasons may be different for complete or near monopolies from what it is for businesses which operate in a free market. That applies to the three industries mentioned in the Queen's Speech.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): If, among a list of past and projected privatisation issues, Jaguar is still considered the paradigm by the Government, will the right hon. Gentleman explain the benefits of private ownership which have now led to 1,200 workers at that company being declared surplus to requirements in the next two and a half years and, in a six-week period before Christmas last year, to 17 shop-floor workers at Jaguar dying of strokes and stress-induced illnesses because of the speed-ups of the track? Where are the benefits of privatisation in car industries such as Jaguar?

Mr. Wakeham: One of the major problems of British industry over many years has been the car industry, but, since privatisation, Jaguar has at least shown a lead on how a car company can operate in this country, and it should have the full support of all hon. Members.

The Scottish Bus Group should never have been publicly owned to begin with. The 10 private companies that will be formed from the Scottish Bus Group will improve still further the competition which has already come from deregulation.

The case for privatising the water industry is different. It is not mainly based on competition, as the water authorities are natural monopolies. Instead, the case for privatisation is based on the need to free the industry from political control. The water industry has a turnover of £3 billion a year. There is no reason for this huge undertaking to be Government owned. Above all, the industry should be able to make its own decisions and set its own priorities as regards investment and borrowing. Privatisation will allow it to do so.

The Water Bill is not just about privatisation. It is also a major environmental measure. Privatisation of natural monopolies can be combined with tough regulation to protect consumers and improve the quality of life.

Mr. Beith: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wakeham: I have given way rather more than Opposition Front-Bench Members did and I ought to get on.

The Bill to privatise the electricity supply industry will bring about the largest privatisation ever. The principles behind the Government's proposals were set out by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy in February and are contained in the White Paper. The case for privatising electricity is based fundamentally on the arguments for competition. The distribution and transmission of electricity are largely natural monopolies, but there is no such monopoly in electricity generation. And so the CEGB, under our proposals, will be split into two competing generating companies.

All three privatisations will make the industries work better. All three—but especially those of the water and electricity industries—will spread share ownership, the wider ownership of property, shares, pensions and savings. In short, the creation of a property-owning and capital-owning democracy is not merely an economic but a social policy of immense benefit to the British people.

Most of the debate today has been focused on the economy. Since the beginning of the previous Session, Britain's dynamic economy has produced more jobs—[Interruption.] Opposition Members may not like this, but they will get it. It has produced more jobs, more investment and more growth. Prudent financial policies have allowed us to cut tax rates, repay debt and increase spending on priority programmes.

The Opposition parties spend a great deal of time talking about inflation and the balance of payments deficit. So let me deal with those issues.

Mr. Kinnock: Do.

Mr. Wakeham: Yes. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will listen.

Inflation has risen and we need to reduce it. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has raised interest rates to do just that. It should fall again in the fourth quarter of next year. Let there be no doubt that the control of inflation remains the Government's top priority. That is why we have brought it down to less than one quarter of the peak that it reached under the irresponsible policies of the Labour Government. That is why, even though it is still too high, it is lower now than at any time during the term of the Labour Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) was right to bring some balance into our discussions. Unlike the Labour party, the Conservative party carries credibility when it pledges lower inflation. In 1985, inflation rose a little and we took swift action. It touched 7 per cent. before falling back to just over 2 per cent. We tackled inflationary pressures then and we shall tackle them now with the same instrument—interest rates. We stuck to our policies then and we shall stick to them now. They are policies that have brought success that the Labour party can only envy.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and others have called for what might be referred to as the golf club solution. That is for some instruments to be used, as well as interest rates, to slow down the economy and to reduce inflation. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made clear on several occasions, no such instruments exist. Credit controls, for instance, would create inefficiencies and distortions in the market while acting as a disincentive to borrowers and savers alike. They did not work properly even in the 1970s, when we had a battery of restrictions to back them up, and they would be still less effective today. To the extent that they did work, they would be unfair. Respectable lenders would charge cheaper credit to the safest borrowers while less well-placed borrowers would have to pay more, and would be driven to the loan sharks.

Some hon. Members have suggested the use of fiscal policy. The proper role of that policy is to create a stable medium-term framework for business. It is not a short-term measure to fight inflation. During the 1960s and 1970s Governments tried to use fiscal policy for short-term demand management, and the lesson to be drawn from the failures of that period is clear. Moreover, fiscal policy is already tight. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor budgets for a surplus £3·25 billion and that is now expected to turn out at some £10 billion.

I reiterate what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has said. The control of inflation is a job for monetary policy, which means interest rates. Eighty per cent. of all household borrowing is on mortgages and my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) was right: credit cards represent only 5 per cent. of total credit. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) was also correct to state that many people, including himself, do not pay interest on their credit cards because they pay on time. I agree with that view.

We are told that the balance of payments deficit is too big. Again, that is rich coming from the Labour party. Labour Governments usually had deficits which rocked the markets. Furthermore, their trade deficits were fuelled by a huge budget deficit which reached 9·25 per cent. of GDP. There could not be a bigger contrast now. Public finances are stronger now than at any time in living memory.

The standard of living of our people has continued to rise. The real take-home pay of the average family with two children has risen by well over a quarter since we took office. A similar family on half-average income has seen it rise by 23 per cent.

Those are the facts, and the achievements reflect the sound economic policies which we shall continue. Ten years of hard work have brought those rewards. The last five years have seen some of the most astonishing successes and achievements for the British economy in living memory, but it has not been easy.

We have faced a miners' strike aimed at nothing less than the overthrow of the elected Government. We have also seen the turbulence in the world's currency markets, with first a surge and then a collapse in the dollar. Only a year ago we faced a spectacular stock market crash which many thought was the prelude to a return to the depression of the 1930s.

None the less, the past five years have brought record increases in productivity; record falls in the level of unemployment; record growth; record levels of investment; and record increases in living standards. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer passes his 2,000th day in office this week, he is the longest serving post-war Chancellor. He has a brilliant record of achievement which few Chancellors could match and which no Labour Chancellor could more than dream about.

The measures this Session will carry forward our radical programme for change. They will improve our economic performance and widen ownership. They will protect the environment and improve the quality of life. They will be underpinned by a vibrant, strong, sound economy which will pay for pensions and benefits and a more efficient Health Service. There are measures to combat violence, particularly the scourge of terrorism.

That is a programme which bears the mark of a Government who retain the confidence of the people and the respect of our neighbours. It is a businesslike programme for a Government who mean business and are know to do so, and as such I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Amendment proposed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 32 (Calling of amendments at end of debate), at the end of the Question to add:

"But humbly regret that the Gracious Speech did not contain any proposal to combat the environmental crisis; call on the Government to take immediate action to join the 30 per cent. club, control the transport and disposal of hazardous wastes, develop a coherent planning strategy to protect green field sites, promote the use of unleaded petrol and improve energy efficiency; further regret the absence from the Gracious Speech of any measures to tackle rising homelessness and poverty or measures to correct the mistakes of the March budget which are leading to rising inflation and a record payments deficit; believe that the Government's negative aproach to European co-operation is damaging the United Kingdom's best interests; further believe that measures outlined in the Gracious Speech for the privatisation of the water and electricity industries will lead to lower environmental standards, inadequate competition and higher prices for the consumer; further call for a Government sponsored Charter of Rights for the consumer in the market place; regret the absence from the Gracious Speech of a Freedom of Information Bill; and call for a programme of constitutional and electoral reform, including Parliaments for the nations of Scotland and Wales, which would protect the liberties of the citizen in the face of further restrictions proposed in the Gracious Speech."—[Mr. Wallace.]

Mr. Alan Howarth.

Question accordingly negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as follows:—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

To be presented by Privy Councillors or Members of Her Majesty's Household.

PETITIONS

Settle-Carlisle Railway

10.29 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): More than 2,000 of my —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Will hon. Members wishing to leave the Chamber please do so quietly?

Mrs. Mahon: More than 2,000 of my constituents have asked me to present a petition to save the beautiful and historic Settle-Carlisle railway. [Interruption.]

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is an important petition but I cannot hear it. Could you please ask hon. Members to leave quietly or to listen to the petition?

Mr. Speaker: I have already made that request, but I will make it again. Will hon. Members please leave the Chamber quietly?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Let my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) speak with sophistication.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry about that.

Mrs. Mahon: This petition has been presented to me by over 2,000 of my constituents to try to bring pressure to bear on the Government to save this historic and beautiful line.

Many people who live in the area value it as an essential transport system and many people wishing to visit the area use it as an amenity. For people travelling between the midlands, Yorkshire and Scotland, it is an excellent line both for communications and for historic beauty.

Therefore, I present this petition gladly on behalf of my constituents in the hope that it will do some good. It contains 2,000 names, and I understand that some 8,000 names will be presented this week.

To lie upon the Table.

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): I wish to present a similar petition on behalf of Mrs. Patricia Ashton, Mr. John Ashton and over 2,000 people living in the Dewsbury area of west Yorkshire who are concerned about the future of the Settle-Carlisle railway line. They believe that the railway line should have a future, not only as a tourist attraction and not only because it opens up an important and beautiful area of the country but because it should also form an essential part of this country's rail network and could have a use as an important freight line if British Rail were to exploit its full potential.

Many people in the north of England understand the full significance of the line—its historic significance, its engineering significance, and the way in which it opens up beautiful parts of the north of England to serve the many people who can appreciate its beauty.

We believe that British Rail has not taken the line seriously. Contrary to the views of Conservative Members who do not seem interested in this matter, we believe that this is an important issue. It is a significant achievement that over 2,000 people in my constituency and, I understand, over 80,000 people in all have signed petitions about the future of the Settle-Carlisle railway. I hope that those who are seriously concerned about the future of railways in this country, and in particular about the future of this Settle-Carlisle line, will urge the Government to reconsider their position on this matter. This line has great significance to the whole of the north of England and to this country's railway network.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was hoping to present a petition tonight but do not know whether it appears on your list.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, it is on my sheet.

Mr. Jopling: I too wish to present a petition in support of the Settle-Carlisle railway line. However, unlike the hon. Members for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) and for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), the Settle-Carlisle railway line passes through my constituency and is a matter of great importance to many of my constituents. This petition has been signed by about 3,000 people, many of whom are constituents of mine.

I have expressed my views on this line previously in the House. Indeed, I expressed them a few months ago when the disappointing announcement was made that the line had to pass out of British Rail's hands. I hope that it will be possible to find a way to keep the line open in the future. It is a famous line which has justifiably received a great deal of publicity. Its features have become widely known and understood.

The petition is in the name of Mrs. Rosalind Templeman of 7 Railway Cottages, Garsdale, Sedbergh, Cumbria. I have great pleasure in presenting it to the House.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): I also have the honour to present a petition regarding the Settle to Carlisle railway and the associated Blackburn to Hellifield branch line. It contains approximately 2,050 signatures, and states that the petitioners pray that the Settle-Carlisle railway and the associated Blackburn to Hellifield railway will be retained as an integral part of the national railway network.

To lie upon the Table.

Wakefield (European Regional Funds)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Howarth.]

10.35 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I am grateful for the opportunity of initiating this Adjournment debate. The Minister and his predecessors will be aware that, for many years, representations have been made by members of the Wakefield metropolitan district council and, in particular, by representatives of the Castleford area, but we have not yet been able to persuade the Government to give the district any aid or to include it in the zone for assisted area status.

The case that I put tonight is supported by my hon. Friends the Members for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and for Hemsworth (Mr. Buckley), who are present.

I am pleased to have the opportunity of raising the issue tonight. It may seem to some hon. Members to be a small, parochial issue. However, behind Wakefield district's elegibility for European regional funds lies the economic regeneration of an area that has been devastated by the decline of the coal industry.

The district has had no support or assistance from the Government. The Government took away the area's intermediate area status. It has had no support from the urban programme, yet today the problems of the district are far worse than those of many assisted areas. I do not intend to take up my time with a bad-news story. Instead, I ask the Minister for good news about reviving the Wakefield economy.

Pontefract and Castleford is one of four constituencies in the Wakefield metropolitan district. My hon. Friends will join me in congratulating the district council on its hard work in developing a programme for revitalising the local economy. The programme is summarised in a brochure entitled "Ideas for Action". The Minister has seen a copy of it. I am pleased to see that he has a copy of it.

The ideas for action programme was developed in conjunction with the local business community and has created a partnership between the council and the private sector. The partnership approach has been adopted in implementing the programme. I hope that the Minister has read the summary of the ideas for action programme. He will know that it involves the investment of about £88 million to provide the infrastructure needed to trigger further investment by the private sector. If the Minister has not read the document, he should do so. It makes an unanswerable case. I should like the Minister to acknowledge, either by nodding his head or otherwise, to acknowledge whether he has read it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): I have read parts of it.

Mr. Lofthouse: I recommend that the Minister reads the rest of it. I am sure that then he will be convinced that our argument cannot be disputed.

To meet the costs of the ideas for action programme, the district council and the business community approached the Government and the European Commission. It is hoped that the district will be recognised as an objective 2 area under the new rules for the European regional fund.

In May of this year, a delegation from Wakefield met both the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment and officials from other Departments. The district was represented by the chamber of commerce, local employers, industrialists and district councillors. Both the council leader and Conservative group leader were on that delegation.

In July, in reply to a debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry stated:

> "It is possible that Wakefield might be eligible for assistance from the European regional development fund, which is currently being restructured . . . I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will keep the interests of Wakefield closely in mind during the negotiations."—[Official Report, 28 July 1988; Vol 138, c. 660.]

That was good news. I understand that the Government have submitted to Brussels a list of areas which they wish to be recognised under objective 2 and that Wakefield is on that list. I am grateful that at last the Government have acknowledged the strength of Wakefield's case. However, it is possible that the European Commission will not agree to the whole of the British list, so some areas may fall off. Can the Minister tell me how the list has been ranked and how near the top or bottom of the list Wakefield metropolitan district is?

In a letter on 14 November to Mr. P. G. Thompson, honorary secretary of the Yorkshire and Humberside regional association, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State referred to the selection of objective 2 areas in west Yorkshire, south Yorkshire and Humberside, and said:

> "We hope that all the assisted areas in these counties will be selected; some non-assisted ones too."

Can the Minister tell me whether the Government are giving priority to the selection of assisted areas over non-assisted areas?

The Wakefield metropolitan district lacks assisted area status and does not have support from the urban programme. There is a danger that the European Commission may accept only assisted areas under objective 2. Can the Minister reassure me that the European Commission has stated positively that non-assisted areas can be selected under objective 2?

The European regional development fund provides finance for two main types of measure: infrastructure and investment subsidies. Investment subsidies operate only in assisted areas. Is the Commission happy to see objective 2 areas which can use only the infrastructure part, not the investment subsidy part? Have the Government explored that issue with the Commission? If not, why submit non-assisted areas which the Commission will have to refuse?

I am aware that assisted area status is not included in the criteria laid down in the new regulations for selecting objective 2 areas. At one stage it was suggested, but dropped after some countries objected. Article 9 of the Council regulation EEC 2052/88 states:

> "In establishing the list . . . the Commission shall seek to ensure that assistance is genuinely concentrated on the areas most seriously affected at the most appropriate geographical level, taking into account the particular situation of the area concerned."

The letter that I quoted earlier makes it clear that the most seriously affected parts of west Yorkshire will be selected. By any honest criterion that must mean Wakefield metropolitan district.

West Yorkshire is covered by seven travel-to-work areas. Over the past three years Castleford and Pontefract have suffered from the highest unemployment rate with Wakefield and Dewsbury in second place. Wakefield metropolitan district has suffered from the sharpest industrial decline. Only four years ago, coal mining was the largest single industry in the district. Some 15,000 miners worked at 16 pits. Today 4,000 miners work at five pits, one of which is already earmarked for closure. Mine closures have a knock-on effect on the engineering and service sectors. Since the beginning of the year, there have been almost 1,400 notified redundancies in the district, 327 of which have been in mining engineering or mining-related firms. There have been major redundancies in British Jeffrey Diamond, Fletcher Sutcliffe and Wild and in Thyssen. The food and drink sector has also been badly hit, with 673 notified redundancies in food and drink firms.

The loss of 12,000 miners' wage packets has taken millions of pounds out of the local economy. The figure that I have been given shows that in Castleford £104 million a year has been taken out of earning capacity. During the past four years, £460 million has been taken from the earning capacity of miners working for British Coal. Very few jobs have been created in their place.

Unemployment takes its toll in other ways. People's health declines when they are without work. A recent report in the journal of the Royal College of General Practitioners shows that jobless people are twice as likely to go to hospital. Unemployment causes strains on families and in communities. In pit towns where the pit has closed young single people are moving out, leaving behind the old and those with young children. The latest unemployment figures for Castleford travel-to-work area show that 42 per cent. of unemployed people are aged under 24.

Wakefield metropolitan district is the most seriously affected part of west Yorkshire. I hope that the Minister will confirm that. His colleagues in the Department said in a written answer on 25 November that Wakefield was one of the worst areas. I suggest that it is the worst.

Unemployment is much higher in Wakefield than in many assisted areas. The latest figures show that only three intermediate areas in England have higher unemployment than Pontefract and Castleford. In England as a whole, 21 intermediate areas have lower unemployment than Pontefract and Castleford, and 13 have lower unemployment than Wakefield and Dewsbury. The Minister's answer to another written question on 25 November shows that the position is even worse, with a total of 41 areas having unemployment lower than that in Pontefract and Castleford. The Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), knows all about that. The intermediate area with the lowest unemployment is Accrington and Rossendale. The other constituency in Accrington and Rossendale is Hyndburn, which is a marginal Tory seat. I say nothing more about that.

Selecting only assisted areas is clearly incompatible with the regulation, which demands the selection of areas most seriously affected. Much effort has gone into restructuring the European funds. It would be embarrassing for all concerned if an area such as Wakefield was not included while other areas with lesser problems were included. Wakefield metropolitan district is ready to use the funds. Its council and business community have the plans and the desire to reconstruct the local economy. Its case for recognition is unanswerable. I hope that the Minister has good news for us on the attitude of the Government and the European Commission to Wakefield's case.

Wakefield is not sitting back and not helping itself. The district council and West Yorkshire passenger transport authority are working to reopen the Pontefract-Wakefield railway line for passenger services. The proposal includes the building of new railway stations at Pontefract, Featherstone, Streethouse, Sharlston and Crofton. That will enable people from those areas of high unemployment to commute to larger cities such as Leeds and Sheffield.

I have already given the Minister notice of my questions to him tonight. I shall repeat them as briefly as possible. It is possible that the European Commission will not agree to the whole British list, so some areas may be taken off. Can the Minister tell me how the list has been ranked and how near to the top or bottom of the list is the Wakefield metropolitan district?

In a letter to Mr. P. G. Thompson, honorary secretary of Yorkshire and Humberside regional association on 14 November, the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry spoke about the selection of objective 2 areas in west Yorkshire, south Yorkshire and Humberside. He said:

> "We hope that all the assisted areas in these counties will be selected: some non-assisted ones too."

Does that imply that the Government are giving priority to the selection of assisted areas over non-assisted areas? Can the Minister assure me that the Commission has positively said that non-assisted areas can be selected under objective 2? Is the Commission happy to see objective 2 areas that can use only the infrastructure part but not the investment subsidies part of the European regional development fund?

Have the Government explored this issue with the Commission? If they have not, why submit non-assisted areas which the Commission will have to refuse? Can the Minister confirm that Wakefield metropolitan district is the most seriously affected part of west Yorkshire? I should be grateful to the Minister for answers to those questions.

10.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): It is a measure of the respect in which the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) is held in the House that he has been able to encourage his hon. Friends to support him in a debate about his constituency and the immediately surrounding area. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on being able to talk about his constituency in the way that he has.

As I expected of the hon. Gentleman, he has also been courteous enough to talk to the people in my office this morning and to tell them and me of the questions that he wished to raise. I shall endeavour to cover all the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised, but if I miss any of them, or if we run out of time, I shall be more than happy to write to the hon. Gentleman and take-up the points that may be missed.

I have been approached by representatives of Wakefield, not only from the majority side—which is quite substantial—but also by Conservative councillors and their supporters. That is a measure of the support across the party divide for the case that the hon. Gentleman has presented.

I am glad to take this opportunity to recognise Wakefield's interest in the European regional development fund and to explain in more general terms how things stand on eligibility for the fund and what we hope to obtain from it in future. Even though Wakefield district has not in recent years been an assisted area, the north-western part of it has already benefited from the regional fund. The fund has been supporting the business improvement services scheme for small firms in the west Yorkshire textile closure area, which includes most of Ossett and parts of Dewsbury.

I am well aware of the vigour and diligence with which the district council has pursued the case for future regional fund eligibility for the whole area. I shall come to that in a moment. The hon. Gentleman spoke about the document that he waved about. I have read most, if not all, of that. I congratulate his constituents and the council, as one or two European Commissioners have done, on the quality of the document. Its authors have not made the mistake of knocking their area which, I think the hon. Gentleman would agree, is not necessarily helpful to the future of such areas. They have intelligently and carefully highlighted the problems as they perceive them. Despite the colour of the document, it is extremely ably put together.

Wakefield is showing a welcome adaption to change. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that more needs to be done, and I hope that the European regional fund will be able to help. As he knows, there is to be a new regime for all the European Community structural funds and new criteria for eligibility under them. The Single European Act calls for the amending of the rules of the funds, including the regional fund, so as to strengthen the Community's economic and social cohesion and to address its principal regional imbalances. The funds are to be doubled by 1993 for this purpose.

The bulk of the funds will go to the less developed regions that are to be found in the southern part of the Community. The framework regulation for the reformed funds which was adopted in June contains five objectives for their use. The precise point at issue tonight is how much of Britain, and of west Yorkshire, the European Commission will select as qualifying for the fund's new objective 2.

Objective 2 will, from the beginning of 1989, confer eligibility for the European regional development fund and a certain priority for the European social fund. At present, European regional development fund eligibility essentially depends on assisted area status, so Wakefield has not been eligible recently, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said—except for the special BIS measures that I mentioned. In future, there will be no necessary exact correspondence between the assisted areas and those eligible for the fund. I know that there has been some confusion about aspects of this eligibility, so it is worth while spelling out the situation.

An early draft of the structured fund's framework regulation proposed that objective 2 support should be confined to nationally aided areas, but the Commission later withdrew this proposal and the final regulation does not include it. The hon. Gentleman has done his homework, and is perfectly well aware of that. It does not mention nationally aided areas at all. It was the will of the Council that that should not be so, and the British Government's recommendations for the objective 2 list was based on this clear understanding.

Therefore, I am disturbed to hear from Brussels that there should be some suggestion that the Commission may, after all, decide to exclude all areas that are not nationally aided areas. By overturning the previous clear understanding, this would be wasting our own representations, the hon. Member's and those of all others concerned with the inclusion of areas like Wakefield. We are making urgent attempts to clarify that, although I have every expectation what was originally intended will be the case.

As the hon. Gentleman has pointed out, objective 2 is of major importance to the United Kingdom. It calls for the conversion of the regions, including inner city communities, that are seriously affected by industrial decline, and the Government have made it clear in Brussels that we expect continuing recognition of the needs of those of our regions that have still not overcome the problems of conversion away from some, mainly traditional, manufacturing industries. We continue to need that regional fund.

We accordingly secured criteria for objective 2 that would pick out those regions and areas where industrial activity has been strongly based, although declining, and where unemployent is above the Community average. The outcome, incorporated in the framework regulation, is three criteria that are applied at county level, and three others to apply to adjacent areas, inner cities, and other industrial areas. The regulation goes on to say that assistance in the counties that qualify as counties is to be concentrated on the most seriously affected parts of them.

The hon. Gentleman has raised three questions, and I shall deal with them as he raised them with me. He asked about the ranking of Wakefield metropolitan district. As far as we are aware, there is no ranking. If the Commission should say that among our suggestions some are eligible and some are not, we would want to know the basis for that decision and would consider our further response. As of today, there is no ranking.

The second question was about the letter I wrote to Mr. P. Thompson, the honorary secretary of the Yorkshire and Humberside regional association.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): I am intrigued about the question of ranking. How does the Commission describe the first, second and third, up to the 10th or whatever? Where is the cut-off point, and how does it arrive at that if there is no ranking?

Mr. Atkins: We have no sign as to what that ranking may be. Clearly, when the matter eventually comes out, when the decisions are finally taken, they may establish the criteria on which it has ranked. As from now, there is no ranking, and no suggestion of ranking and there is no ranking in the submissions that we have made. We have put in all the assisted areas that we could find of which there are others like Wakefield. There is no ranking as far as we are concerned, and as of now there is no ranking as far as the Commission is concerned. We await developments, and, as the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues will know, the mills of the Commission grind exceedingly slow, and until it produces something we shall not be able to make a judgment.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): Bearing in mind the confusion about this issue of assisted area status in relation to objective 2 and Wakefield's strong case for assistance under that objective, would it not be simpler for the Government to accord Wakefield assisted area status now, given that there are many areas in this country with far better employment figures than Wakefield has at present?

Mr. Atkins: Bearing in mind that time is limited, I do not want to get drawn into a regional discussion, but we have always made it clear that we do not want to change immediately the assisted areas map, which took four or five years to establish and culminated in the decisions of 1984, largely because of the requirement for stability and planning in the future. We have said that we will not review that map this side of a general election, although some areas come up and others go down. When that review takes place, we shall then have to make a rejudgment on the basis of those submissions.

As it stands at the moment, Wakefield is not an assisted area and will not be so within the foreseeable future. However, we are pushing with the Commission the case put so eloquently by the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford.

In my letter to Mr. Thompson of the Yorkshire and Humberside regional association, I said:

> "We hope that all Assisted Areas in these counties will be selected; some non-Assisted ones may too."

Every possible assisted area is being included. The hon. Gentleman asked me whether I could assure him that the Commission has stated positively that the non-assisted areas can be selected under objective 2. We are exploring that point further and we shall endeavour to let him know as soon as we know exactly what the position is.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me whether I could confirm whether Wakefield is the most seriously affected part of west Yorkshire. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs said earlier, it is one of the most important areas, but, as the hon. Gentleman will know, there are others, including Bradford city urban programme area, Kirklees borough urban programme area and Leeds city urban programme area, which go side by side with Wakefield in our suggestions to the Commission. Although Wakefield's case is important, there are other cases of concern which Opposition Members who represent nearby constituencies will understand also have merit.

We are endeavouring to push the case wherever we can for the Commission to consider what assistance it may give under any of the objectives, but, in this context, under objective 2. In those circumstances, we hope—we cannot predict the results at this stage—that the hon. Gentleman will find acceptable the results that we obtain.

Mr. Lofthouse: Will the Minister assure us that, after the investigation, when the Commission finally reaches its conclusions, the Government will push Wakefield's case?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman is quite rightly pushing the case for his area, and that is understandable. I would do exactly the same in his circumstances. I am faced with the prospect of having to deal with a wide variety of submissions from all over the country, all of which are argued to have equal merit. I shall do my best to ensure that Wakefield gets a fair crack of the whip, largely because it has a case to make in view of the document to which I have referred and in view of the hon. Gentleman's comments. That case will be put as strongly as possible. However, as the hon. Gentleman is a fair man, he will realise that there are other areas represented by both his hon. Friends and my hon. Friends which also reckon that they have a pretty good case to put.

Mr. Lofthouse: Especially west Yorkshire.

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman makes his point. He understands the situation as well as anyone. In the circumstances, I can assure him that we will press the case for Wakefield. He is pushing against an open door in that respect, but we must balance the relative importance of all the areas concerned.

Time is running out. There may well be other aspects of this matter with which I have not dealt. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will understand that. If he wishes to come back to me, perhaps in correspondence, I will be more than happy to pursue the matter. I reiterate that Wakefield has a case and that we will continue to pursue it. I hope that the results will be to the satisfaction of the House and of the hon. Gentleman.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes past Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chemical Weapons

1. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to his Iraqi counterpart on the use of chemical weapons against its Kurdish population.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): We have repeatedly condemned Iraq for its use of chemical weapons. I made that absolutely clear to the Iraqi Minister of State for Foreign Affairs on 21 September, as did my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster at the highest level in Baghdad earlier this month. We noted with concern last week's television documentary containing further reports of Iraqi CW use in August. It underlines the importance of the international conference to be held in Paris in January to reaffirm the authority of the 1925 Geneva protocol banning CW use.

Mr. Atkinson: As it is now clear that Iraq has perpetrated the most appalling atrocities on its Kurdish population by using poisonous gas, does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that to seek better relations with Iraq at this time is to send a mixed message, namely, that Iraq can get away with genocide in violation of the Geneva protocol to which it is a party? Will my right hon. and learned Friend raise the matter with our European colleagues at the forthcoming Rhodes conference?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have certainly been appalled by the suffering inflicted as a result of the large-scale displacement of Kurds from their homes in Iraq. We have proclaimed the evidence of CW use as compelling but not conclusive. It is clear that Iraq has a case to answer, and we have been in the forefront of pressing that case in respect of those barbaric weapons. We want a total ban—that is the importance of the Paris conference.

As to the second part of my hon. Friend's question, there is no way that the Iraqis could have misunderstood the firmness of our position on chemical weapons. As I said, it was underlined by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he was in Iraq a short time ago.

In such a situation, one can do one of two things. One can isolate Iraq and make its unacceptable behaviour more likely, or one can try to establish and maintain a working relationship, to make clear our very strong views on that aspect of Iraq's behaviour. This matter is one of constant concern. Last week I told the House that it will be permanently on the international agenda, so it may be discussed in one form or another at the Rhodes summit.

Mrs. Clwyd: Why does the Foreign Secretary not follow the lead of the United States Congress, which, when it reconvenes in January, will impose economic sanctions against Iraq? Why will the British Government not do the same? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not see any inconsistency between the Foreign and Commonwealth Office condemning violations of human rights in Iraq, and the Department of Trade and Industry stitching up massive trade agreements with that country without once mentioning the subject of human rights?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: In the last part of her question the hon. Lady misses the central point of my main answer. During the course of my right hon. Friend's visit to Baghdad he took the opportunity to emphasise how strongly we feel about the use of chemical weapons and the importance that we attach to the matter. The hon. Lady is wrong to believe that the United States Congress has passed sanctions legislation. It has not done so. The American Administration are opposed to sanctions, and we believe that that is entirely consistent. It is not likely that any effective consequence will follow from the unilateral imposition of economic sanctions in this case. It would not prevent the use of chemical weapons by Iraq. We shall continue pressing the case as vigorously and energetically as we have done already, being in the forefront of those pressing it, we shall continue in that fashion.

Mr. Bowis: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, apart from a stop to this hideous practice, what the Kurdish people need most is humanitarian aid from the world community? Will he make a commitment on behalf of Her Majesty's Government that that will be forthcoming as a matter of urgency?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The exodus that has taken place has created a major humanitarian problem. We have already contributed some £250,000 for humanitarian assistance, and we have told the Turkish authorities that we are prepared to consider applications for an extension of that in the ordinary way.

Mr. Robertson: The Foreign Secretary says that evidence of Iraq's use of chemical weapons is "compelling but not conclusive"— a grand new phrase to hide the Government's increasingly fudging position. Did he see the programme on Channel 4 last Wednesday night, which brought forward conclusive proof both of the slaughter of the Kurds in northern Iraq and of the use of deadly poisons in those attacks?

Surely there is something indecent in the sight of the Foreign Office condemning the use of chemical weapons, followed by that of a Cabinet Minister going to Baghdad touting for trade and business and doubling trade credits to Iraq, without any linked condition that Iraq desist from the vile slaughter of so many people in the northern provinces.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I entirely understand the deep concern of the House at the allegations of the use of chemical weapons, but I deny absolutely any impression that the United Kingdom has not been in the van of those pressing this case. In fact, we have been simultaneously denounced by many people in the Arab world for being so far in the forefront of the attack. We have sustained our position. It was we who took the matter up in the United Nations and pressed for an authoritative independent investigation, and we should still like such an investigationas c to take place, but we have received insufficient support from our colleagues in the United Nations. We were ready to welcome Iraq's undertaking not to use chemical weapons either inside or outside the country, given as a result of our representations, and we shall continue to press the case. But it would be wholly foolish, when the rest of the world is continuing to maintain trading relations with a large and important country, for us single-handed and unilaterally to make such a protest.

The House must understand that we are maintaining contact with Iraq and pressing the case against chemical weapons. We are looking at any evidence that is forthcoming, and we are acting more energetically and effectively than any other country.

United Nations

2. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what subjects were discussed at recent meetings between Her Majesty's ambassador at the United Nations and the new President of the General Assembly.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No such meeting has yet taken place. However, Dr. Caputo, in his capacity as Chairman of the United Nations General Assembly, has asked to see our permanent representative to the United Nations, Sir Crispin Tickell. The invitation has been accepted, but no date has yet been fixed.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Are we warming to the Argentines?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have been pressing on the Argentines initiative after initiative for movements towards the re-establishment of more normal relations. As I have said many times, the table of my opposite number is groaning with the weight of fresh proposals. For example, as long ago as 1982 we removed all financial and trading discrimination, but the Argentines' response has been disappointing. They are continuing to discriminate against British goods and firms despite all that we have tried to do to press them in the opposite direction.

We are still trying—as I told the House that we were in 1986—to see whether it is possible to establish a multilateral framework for the management of fisheries disputes. We have been looking constantly for a way of normalising relations, but sadly there has been an insufficient response.

Sir Peter Blaker: Will my right hon. and learned Friend convey to the President of the General Assembly and to the United States Administration the dismay of many hon. Members on both sides of the House who are well disposed towards the United Nations at the refusal of a visa to Mr. Yasser Arafat? The Palestine National Council in Algiers went a long way towards accepting the existence of the state of Israel and United Nations resolutions 242 and 338, and this decision is likely to make the task of the moderates in the PLO more difficult.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My right hon. Friend has made an important point very clearly and effectively. We took the opportunity during yesterday's debate to make entirely clear our view that Mr. Arafat should have been allowed to address the General Assembly, and that that was the legal obligation of the United States under the headquarters agreement. We should have liked to hear him confirm there the very point made by my right hon. Friend —that the PLO supports an international conference on the basis of Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 and rejects terrorism.

The additional point that is vexing Opposition Members is this. We want a positive response from the United States on this matter. We pressed the substance of the resolution in our own statement and we supported the statement that was made by the Twelve to achieve it, but we did not think that we were likely to bring about a change in the United States attitude by supporting a resolution couched in intemperate language. We have made our position absolutely clear. There is a mutuality of obligation in the United Nations. The host country owes an obligation to the Establishment, and the Establishment owes a duty to the United States. I invite the House to acknowledge that we have pressed this case and that we shall continue to do so as vigorously as is required.

Mr. Steel: Surely the Secretary of State accepts that intemperate action is worse in foreign affairs than intemperate language. That is what we have seen by the United States in its refusal of the visa. Those of us who have had contact with the PLO over the years have urged the recognition of United Nation resolutions such as No. 242. Now that that recognition is forthcoming, it is lamentable that the visa has been refused. The British ambassador should be given more robust instructions than simply to abstain from voting.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have made absolutely clear the extent to which we regret the refusal of the visa, and so did our spokesman in New York yesterday in concert with the representatives of the other member states. Mr. Arafat should have been allowed to address the General Assembly, but the question is how we can best move forward in the future. I am prepared to assure the House that the United Kingdom's credit with our friends in the Arab world and in the United States is substantial enough and strong enough for it to be understood when we say that Mr. Arafat should have been heard, and we say it in language that is more likely to produce a positive response from the United States.

Mr. Lawrence: Is it not patently obvious that if Mr. Arafat and the PLO were serious about peace with Israel they would explicitly recognise the existence of the state of Israel, rather than just hint at it, that they would explicitly renounce violence—which they do not even hint at—and that they would not explicitly demand that the capital of the Palestinian state should be Jerusalem?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. and learned Friend is right to remind the House of the familiar conditions for the debate to go forward, but it is also right to acknowledge, as we have, that the statements that have emerged from the Palestine National Council meeting in Algiers are important moves in a positive direction and should be acknowledged as such. It is for that reason that we left the United Nations in no doubt, and now leave the House in no doubt, that we think that Mr. Arafat should have been heard. It would have been an opportunity for him to make clear to the United Nations the PLO's explicit acceptance of my hon. and learned Friend's points. We want progress to be made in that direction and we should like action to be taken by both sides. We think that yesterday the United Nations reached the right judgment on the substance but that the language used was not best calculated to produce the change of heart in the United States that we want. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) interrupts. We proposed a series of alternative wordings that we think would have been more likely to allow the United States to reach the right conclusion. However, the House should be in no doubt that the case to be made by Mr. Arafat on behalf of the PLO ought to have been heard, because the concessions and the movements that have been made in Algiers are important.

Mr. Kaufman: What a wriggling, snivelling response we have had from the Foreign Secretary. How can he offer any justification for the pusillanimous abstention by Britain yesterday in the Legal Committee when 129 nations voted in favour of a modest, sensible resolution which simply asked the United States to reconsider what it had done? Would it not have been a good idea to give Mr. Arafat the opportunity to state before the General Assembly what was implicit and clear in the Algiers declaration—that the PLO recognises resolutions 242 and 338—and also what Mr. Faisal Awaida of the PLO said explicitly in London yesterday—that the PLO is ready to recognise the state of Israel? Is it not an abuse by the United States of its position as host to the United Nations that it should decide on domestic grounds who should be allowed to address the General Assembly of the United Nations? If indeed a past association with terrorism is a disqualification from being allowed into the United States, how did Mr. Shamir—an acknowledged former terrorist —ever get in?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman must come back to the point that I have made repeatedly this afternoon. What the representative of Her Majesty's Government said in the United Nations yesterday is precisely as follows:

> "I wish to make clear that in the view of the British Government Mr. Yasser Arafat, chairman of the executive committee of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, should have been allowed to come to the United Nations headquarters in New York. This is the legal obligation of the United States. My delegation endorses the opinion given on this matter by the United Nations legal council"——[Hon. Members: But——]"but just as we believe that the United States should show respect for the United Nations, so we believe that the United Nations should show respect for the United States. This mutual respect should have been reflected in the language of the resolution."

If the House wants to get effective action by the United States, which is not just an important ally but a most important actor in the Arab-Israel dispute, it makes sense for us to set about the matter in a fashion likely to produce that result.

Caribbean

3. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last visited states in the Caribbean region.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): My right hon. and learned Friend was last in the Caribbean in January 1987, when he visited Barbados for discussions with the then Prime Minister and members of his Government. I will be attending the Miami conference later this week and also visiting Jamaica, Anguilla and Montserrat.

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: What progress, if any, has been made in co-ordinating efforts to combat the appalling problem of drug trafficking in the region? Will my hon. Friend make representations on that subject during his forthcoming visit?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend is right. There is a significant problem both of domestic drug growing and of trafficking, the latter being from South America through to the United States and Europe. With the United States, we initiated a joint survey of the problem. We have made a number of recommendations to Caribbean Governments. They have been followed through with a meeting in Barbados. I shall have discussions with Prime Ministers and others in the next few days about increasing co-operation even further.

There has been one setback, in that it appears that hurricane Gilbert managed to destroy almost all agricultural crops in Jamaica except the ganja crop.

Mrs. Mahon: During his visit, will the Minister consider visiting the Atlantic city of Bluefields, which has been completely destroyed by hurricane Joe? The world service recently reported that there was a major ecological disaster there. Will the Minister consider giving Bluefields aid, through the agency of the garrison at Belize, on the same scale as that provided for Jamaica?

Mr. Eggar: As the hon. Lady is aware, the Government have made well over £250,000 available to Nicaragua to assist with emergency relief. A great deal of that money has gone to the Bluefields area.

Chile

4. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the steps he is taking to assist a smooth transition to democracy in Chile.

Mr. Eggar: Both we and our partners in the Twelve fully support the transition to democracy in Chile. We will continue to encourage an orderly and peaceful restoration of democracy in that country.

Mr. Macdonald: I welcome the Minister's expression of support—however subdued—for the plebiscite in Chile. He must be aware that Amnesty International has reported several trangressions of human rights in Chile since the plebiscite. That makes it clear that all Governments must give their full support to the progress of democracy in Chile. What practical steps is the Minister taking, independently of the EEC, to achieve such progress?

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman must be aware that we welcomed the result of the plebiscite in unequivocal terms, and we welcome the measures that have been taken to return to democracy in Chile. We welcome in particular the responsible attitude taken by the democratic Opposition during the run-up to the plebiscite and subsequent to it. The hon. Gentleman referred to human rights in Chile. We have urged privately and publicly for the Chilean Government to respect human rights. I did so most recently when I met the Chilean Foreign Minister in Quito in August. Our ambassador in Chile does so as well and I welcome in particular the Chilean Government's decision to ratify important international agreements, which they did on 15 September.

Mr. Foulkes: Does the Minister accept that the excellent plebiscite result was just a first step towards democracy? Will he confirm that when he met Ricardo Lagos, the leader of the Partido por la Democracia yesterday, he was urged that the British Government should join other European Governments, particularly at the Rhodes summit, to support further the process of the restoration of democracy and to prepare actively for co-operation with the new democratic Government in Chile? Will the Minister answer the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) and say what practical steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take over the next 12 months to support the new democracy in Chile, because it is vitally important that Britain is seen as the friend of the new democracy in Chile and not as an ally of the old, discredited dictatorship?

Mr. Eggar: It must be up to the Chileans to decide how they wish to return to democracy. That was the message that Mr. Lagos gave to me yesterday and which other democratic opposition leaders have given. We shall continue, as we have in the past, to do everything that we can to assist the return to democracy in Chile, but the primary responsibility must continue to lie with the Chilean people.

Mr. Wilkinson: Is it not noteworthy that the plebiscite was conducted fairly and that the Chilean Government intend to implement in full the provisions of the 1980 constitution, leading to elections for the national assembly and the presidency in December this year and for the transfer of power in March next year? Is the situation in Chile not markedly different from that in Peru, where there is widespread guerrilla warfare and chaos, in Brazil and Argentina, where there is hyper-inflation, and in Columbia, where the drug barons rule?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend is right. Every undertaking in the 1980 constitution has been carried out to the letter by the Chilean Government and it is right that the House should recognise that.

Palestine National Council

5. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the Palestine National Council's recent declaration in Algiers.

12. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been his response to the recent Palestine National Council declaration.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We do not believe that the declaration of a Palestinian state helps to carry matters forward. But the other decisions taken by the Palestine National Council represent a positive and potentially important step towards a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israel conflict.

Mr. Nicholson: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that there is gratitude and good will from the middle east for Her Majesty's Government's balanced and positive attitude on the question—unlike that of some others that I could mention—and will he pledge that the Government will continue to pursue this matter on its merits, irrespective of external threats and blackmail, and of internal political lobbying?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend accurately sums up the position of Her Majesty's Government. We certainly seek to maintain a balanced, energetic and effective approach. We shall continue to press the case for progress on the peace process at every possible opportunity.

Mr. Marlow: While supporting totally my right hon. and learned Friend in his answer to Qn 2, at this important time when results are important and rhetoric is not, may I ask whether my right hon. and learned Friend will help to bring about those results by seeking to encourage still further the courageous initiative by the moderate Palestinians in the face of extreme Israeli provocation by seeking out an early meeting with Palestinian representatives at the highest level?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sure the House will wish to record the important conclusion of my hon. Friend on results and rhetoric—that is certainly our preference. He knows that we engage in regular dialogue at official levels with the PLO. It is important for the PLO to continue to clarify its position if further and wider contact is to be possible. That is one reason why we would have welcomed an opportunity for Mr. Arafat to be able to address the United Nations General Assembly.

Mr. Janner: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the purpose of our policy in the middle east must be to encourage the promotion of peace, and that, if there is to be peace, the involvement of both sides is required? Does he further agree that if Her Majesty's Government are regarded as being entirely on one side their prospects of being of assistance in the peace process are gravely reduced? Whatever Government may result from Israel's recent turbulent election, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise that neither major party there is prepared to deal with the PLO unless and until it renounces terrorism now?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As the hon. and learned Gentleman knows, progress in the central Arab-Israeli problem depends on the response from both sides. That is why unhelpful unilateral actions by either side do not carry the matter forward. That relates to a number of actions that have been taken unilaterally by the Israeli Government. If action is to be taken by both sides, I urge the Israeli Government to echo the view of the entire House and respond positively to the steps taken by the Palestine National Council. We now look to Israel to make a parallel commitment to the peace process to match the forward movement made by the PNC in Algiers.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Surely the Foreign Secretary cannot ignore the fact that the conditions for Britain moving forward in our relationship with the PLO were laid down by his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister when she said that the PLO would have to renounce terrorism and accept resolutions 242 and 338. The Palestinians have now done that and, we understand, have done so democratically, with the minority who lost the vote accepting it publicly and completely— with no abstentions. In an earlier reply the Foreign Secretary said that the Arab world well understands our position, but our position will not be well understood if we now start to move the goal posts. The Foreign Secretary must do something now to respond to the initiative taken by the Palestinians in Algiers.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The position is entirely clear. For a long time we and many other people have been pressing the PLO to forward movement on the points mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. We have secured an explicit rejection of terrorism—that is important. We have secured acceptance of resolutions 242 and 338 as the basis for an international conference—that is important. However, there is not yet an explicit recognition of Israel, nor is there yet a renunciation of violence in Israel and the occupied territories. We want to see those ambiguities cleared up if further progress is to be made. In response to the progress that has already been made, and which I have described as positive, we are entitled to look—and we do look—to the Government of Israel for a matching and positive response.

Mr. Cormack: If the representative of the PLO has continued difficulties in presenting his case to the United Nations, will my right hon. and learned Friend bear in mind that there is a most admirable building across the river that would provide excellent headquarters for the General Assembly, if only for a temporary session?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The suggestion has not so far been made by anybody else, but it is certainly right that Mr. Arafat should have the opportunity to be heard. The suggestion has been canvassed of a General Assembly meeting perhaps in Geneva, and depending on the resolution there for discussion we shall determine our position. As I say, Mr. Arafat should be given the opportunity to be heard on behalf of the PLO, if only to resolve the remaining ambiguities in PLO policy.

Mr. Sillars: Am I right in saying that the Secretary of State said earlier that the dialogue will continue with the PLO at official level? Given the implications of the acceptance in the Algerian declaration, why does the Secretary of State not personally meet Yasser Arafat now?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The qualifications that are relevant in that have been clear for a long time. They include recognition of Israel's right to a secure existence and a renunciation of violence in Israel, in the occupied territories. As I have said, significant progress was made in the discussions in Algiers, but ambiguities remain, so the same considerations have to be taken into account.

Mr. Speaker: No. 6.

Mr. Faulds: Really. This is disgraceful. Two major questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is disgraceful behaviour.

Angola

6. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the agreement reached in Geneva on a timetable for Cuban troops' withdrawal from Angola.

Mrs. Chalker: We have lent our full support to the United States-led negotiations. We warmly welcome the recent agreement on a timetable for Cuban troop withdrawal from Angola. We urge the parties to move forward to implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibian independence.

Mr. Tredinnick: Does my right hon. Friend agree that this agreement and the reprieve of the Sharpeville Six show that talking forcefully to the South African Government is rather more effective than sanctions or boycotts? Could she tell the House the Government's view about the possibility of a pre-independence conference about Namibia?

Mrs. Chalker: We have always advocated that dialogue and negotiations will produce the best outcomes. The tenacious advocacy of Dr. Chester Crocker and his leadership of the quadripartite talks have brought us to this successful position in respect of the Angola agreement between South Africa, Angola and Cuba. We warmly welcome the news that the Sharpeville Six have been reprieved. Hon. Members will know that we have made repeated representations on behalf of the Six, including the Prime Minister's own appeal. On the question of the future of Namibia, it is right that we should proceed on the United Nations plan, which has been agreed by all, and which will be impartially monitored by the United Nations. There is nothing to be gained and much might be lost if we were now to reopen the principles of the Security Council resolution 435. We welcome the recent direct contacts between SWAPO and leading Namibians.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Hughes, on a point of order.

Mr. Robert Hughes: I could hardly hear the Minister's answer.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Member wish to ask a question?

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

While I think we all welcome some progress in the discussions in southern Africa about Namibia, and while we welcome in addition to the Sharpeville Six reprieve the release of Harry Gwala and Zephia Mothopeng, may I ask the Minister of State whether she realises that South Africa is already prevaricating on the agreement that it purports to have reached? It is demanding that it should be part of the monitoring operation on Cuban withdrawal. It is suggesting a much later timetable and introducing fresh discussions by saying that UNITA must by involved in some discussions with the Angolan Government before Namibia is free. That has nothing to do with resolution 435 on Namibia. Will the Minister ensure that the utmost pressure, including sanctions, is maintained until South Africa can show that it can keep its word?

Mrs. Chalker: I hope that the hon. Gentleman's head is all right following the earlier incident.

On the more serious matter, we believe that the agreement will pave the way for an early implementation of the UN plan for Namibian independence. We also believe that the South Africans will act in good faith, but we shall judge them by their deeds. They have compelling reasons—economic, military and political—to sign the settlement that they have reached, and I believe that the terms will be acceptable. As to the creation of internal peace in Angola, there cannot be a lasting peace unless people come together. I do not believe that it is for Britain or other outside countries to prescribe how that internal peace should be brought about. I know that many African Heads of Government are seeking to help, and we sincerely hope that they will be successful in bringing about peace in Angola between all the parties.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Is it not surprising that, in these welcome results from the Geneva talks, no mention was made of Jonas Savimbi and UNITA, which is an important force in Angola? Will my right hon. Friend accept that, unless there is reconciliation between UNITA and the MPLA, there will be no lasting peace and stability in Southern Africa? If reconciliation can be achieved in that country, elections in Namibia can be free and fair, and following elections there, further progress and accommodation can be achieved in the Republic of South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: Of course I believe that all parties must come together, and as one African leader said to me earlier this month, it would be difficult to negotiate with a body without a head. Therefore, it seems sensible that the process of creating international peace will require all parties to come together.

Mr. Anderson: Naturally, like the Minister, we warmly welcome the signs of movement in southern Africa, but should not the South African moves be seen in the context of the South Africans' economic difficulties? Is not their current diplomatic offensive essentially to buy time and divert opinion from their internal problems? Therefore, will the right hon. Lady assure the House that the Foreign Office will try to restrain the Prime Minister from visiting South Africa and giving a royal blessing on that country until there are real signs of movement on apartheid?

Mrs. Chalker: We are absolutely at one in wishing to see the agreements over Angola and Namibia concluded successfully and peacefully, and the progression towards achieving internal peace in Angola. As I said to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes), there are compelling reasons, which should not be underestimated because they happen to be economic and political. We must judge the South African Government by their deeds. As to the speculation about the travels of my right hon. Friend, they remain that—just speculation.

Council of Ministers

7. Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will next attend a meeting of the European Community Council of Ministers; and what subjects he expects to discuss.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The next Foreign Affairs Council will be held on 19 and 20 December. Subjects currently on the agenda are GATT, New Zealand butter and sheepmeat, hormones, Community and EFTA relations and steel tariffs.

Mrs. Ewing: Given that today is St. Andrew's day, if not every Andrew's day, can the Foreign Secretary tell us on how many occasions he has been accompanied to the Council of Ministers by the Secretary of State for Scotland?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have not had the pleasure of that experience. At meetings of the Council, representatives of the United Kingdom speak for the United Kingdom as a whole and the policies of Her Majesty's Government make sure that the interests of every part of the kingdom are taken into account.

Mr. Soames: In the course of those busy meetings, will my right hon. and learned Friend see whether he can raise with our partners in the EEC the pressing difficulties relating to European air traffic control? Is he aware of the tremendous inconvenience to which enormous numbers of people were put last summer? Will he do his best to try to put the matter at the top of the agenda?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As my hon. Friend and I share the privilege of being neighbours of Gatwick airport, I share his concern about the point that he has raised. There was an effective meeting of Euro control last week at which those issues were advanced. We shall continue to press the case that he has put forward.

Rev. Martin Smyth: When the Foreign Secretary speaks to his fellow Ministers, will he underline the perhaps naive view of people in Northern Ireland that Governments are there to protect law-abiding people and to punish evildoers? Will he therefore support his right hon. Friend's comment that high-sounding declarations are not sufficient when dealing with terrorists, unless they are backed by deeds?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall certainly emphasise the point made by the hon. Gentleman. It is of the utmost importance that, when correct legal procedures are followed, extradition requests are prepared in consultation with another Government and no grounds are given for believing that they are incomplete or insufficient, the necessary will should be forthcoming to ensure that people who should be brought to trial do face trial.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Will my right hon. and learned Friend take the opportunity on St. Andrew's day, which also happens to be the 114th anniversary of the birth of Winston Churchill, to remind the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) that, if her dream of secession of North Britain from Great Britain is achieved, she will also have achieved the secession of North Britain from Europe and that it will require to get over the veto of Great Britain to get back in there?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No one could put the point as effectively as my hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Alton: Does the Foreign Secretary accept that there is concern among many hon. Members about the failure to extradite Mr. Ryan? When he raises the matter with the Belgian and Irish Governments, will he also bear in mind that this does at least present us now with the opportunity to press for European Community-wide legislation to combat terrorism? Does he agree that, in accord with the concept of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, it would be far better to underpin our joint determination to fight terrorism if that legislation were jointly enacted by the House and the Dail?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I can understand the force of the general case made by the hon. Gentleman, but no part of the law has so far been more carefully preserved for national enactment and consideration than the criminal codes. There are wide variations between the countries of the Community in respect of criminal law, so it is all the more important for us to secure effective, sustained and workable co-operation in arrangements for extradition and matters of that kind. It is important that both partners to the Anglo-Irish Agreement should recognise that we have a joint, sustained and important interest in achieving effective action in the courts against terrorism.

Sir John Stokes: Will my right hon. and learned Friend ask the Council of Ministers if it could forcefully instruct the Commission against interfering in petty and stupid details? Is he aware, for instance, that English sterling silver, which is unequalled throughout the world, has recently had its hallmark stopped by some faceless EEC bureaucrat and an EEC number substituted?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is our constant purpose to diminish the number of regulations applying throughout Europe. It is for that reason that we recognise the case, in certain examples, for having a single common European standard rather than 12 diverse different ones. I shall consider the point raised by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Mullin: Is not the main obstacle in persuading other European Governments to help us with effective extradition the widespread belief that an Irish person charged with a terrorist offence cannot hope to receive a fair trial in this country? Is that not boosted by the conviction of the six innocent people for the Birmingham pub bombing and the 11 innocent people held in connection with the Guildford and Woolwich pub bombings? If we wish to occupy the moral high ground and to work out effective extradition procedures, would it not be best to face the fact that, in those cases, we have made a terrible mistake?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It cannot be stated too clearly and too often that all sides and all nations that are concerned with the intensely difficult struggle against well-organised terrorism have an equally important interest in the effectiveness of action to bring terrorists to trial, and in the justice of the trial proceedings when they take place. There is no doubt about that. One of the purposes of the exchanges that we have throughout Europe and through the Anglo-Irish Agreement is to promote progress on both those fronts. The patterns for scrutiny of decisions of the courts in this country, subject as they are, in due course, to the European Commission on Human Rights, will stand comparison with those anywhere in the world. If we are seeking to enhance confidence in the British system of justice, the hon. Gentleman should think twice before advancing some of the allegations that he has put forward this afternoon.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that in matters concerning the European Community, as in other matters of foreign policy, he enjoys a degree of admiration and support that extends well beyond Conservative Benches? Does he agree that there is no need to set up another body to give my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister the sort of foreign policy advice that Sir Horace Wilson gave to Neville Chamberlain?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I do not think that any such body is in contemplation.

Ms. Short: The Foreign Secretary will know that there has been speculation that the EEC might take an initiative to back a two-stage solution in the middle east. What is the Government's view about that? There is a real chance now of peace between the Palestinians and Israel, but his remarks earlier this afternoon were incredibly biased. The degree of terror that Israel is using in the Lebanon, the West Bank and Gaza should be denounced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, just as he has denounced the acts in which Palestinian individuals have engaged. There is a chance for peace. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman take a lead? Will Europe take a lead?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Lady should recall that last week in Brussels, at the end of a long discussion on the subject by the Foreign Ministers of the Community, not only yesterday in New York, we all recorded our unanimous view that what has happened in Algiers represents a positive step forward, to which there should be an Israeli response. We recorded our continuing concern, which we have expressed many times, at the implications of the violence that is committed by the Israeli Government and Israeli forces in the occupied territories. We deplore violence of whatever sort that is committed by either side. We look for a positive response from both sides to get a conference working through which it will be possible to arrive at a solution.

United States of America

8. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last visited the United States of America; and what matters were discussed.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I last visited the United States to attend the United Nations General Assembly in September. A range of issues were discussed with those I saw there.

Mr. Rowe: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is enormously important, at the start of a new presidency, that relations between western Europe and the United States should be as warm as possible? If it is true that there is a 1:3 imbalance between the conventional forces of the Warsaw pact and those of NATO, should not the contributions of the Americans to NATO be recognised? Should not that prove something of a spur to western European countries to make greater contributions themselves?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend is entirely right to say that, in the context of our continued maintenance of the Atlantic Alliance for our effective defence, burden-sharing is the most important item on the agenda. I have no doubt that the new President of the United States will address himself to the American aspect of that. It is important that the European partners should be ready to play their full part to sustain the strength of the Alliance.

Mr. Grocott: Does the Foreign Secretary share my relief at the fact that the deeply embarrassing client relationship between the Prime Minister and President Reagan is coming to an end? Does he share my hope that under the new President—I hope that he will use his influence to ensure this—we shall start again to pursue an independent foreign policy of our own and cease to be a satellite state of the United States?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman lives in a land of illusion. One of the most important features of British foreign policy in the past decade has been the growing influence of Her Majesty's Government under the leadership of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in the United States as well as in the European Community. I hope very much that that effective relationship will continue with the new President.

Persian Gulf

9. Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the prospects for peace in the Persian Gulf area.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. William Waldegrave): We welcome the continuation of the ceasefire and of talks between Iran and Iraq under the auspices of the United Nations Secretary-General, who enjoys our full support. Our objective remains a just and comprehensive settlement through full implementation of Security Council resolution 598.

Mr. Arbuthnot: Does my hon. Friend agree that in spite of the major difficulties that we have had with both the countries involved it is important that Britain should try to maintain a balanced relationship with Iraq and Iran?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right. Neither country conducts its affairs in ways that would meet with the approval of this House, but both are important regional powers and we cannot ignore their existence or their importance in their regions.

Mr. Cohen: Will the Minister investigate the claim that Iran has started a new wave of killings of political prisoners in Kerman prison and others? It is reported that 50 leading members of the Tudeh party and a total of 5,000 political prisoners have been killed recently. Will he investigate that matter urgently?

Mr. Waldegrave: I have seen the reports to which the hon. Gentleman refers. There are serious human rights problems in Iran still. We have our own problems as Mr. Cooper and Mr. Nichola are prisoners there who should be released or brought to trial. They should be released.

South Africa

10. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to visit South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend has no present plans to do so.

Mr. Bellingham: When the Minister visits South Africa, she will have a chance to enter our embassy in either Cape Town or Pretoria. When she visits it, she will be able to come and go in peace, in stark contrast to South Africa House, where diplomats and visitors are verbally abused, jostled and harassed by hooligans with loudhailers. Surely it is time to remove the picket. Will she have urgent discussions with the Home Secretary about that?

Mrs. Chalker: I regret all demonstrations that disrupt law and order on our streets. However, my hon. Friend is absolutely right. The issue of demonstrators outside embassies is a matter for the Metropolitan police and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I will bring my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Flannery: When the Minister goes to South Africa again, will she raise the issue of the number of black people who are jostled and harassed in South Africa by the Botha Government and by the incoming Tory Government in South Africa? Will she mention the number of people still being hanged every morning in South Africa? Will she raise all the issues which a whole number of people on the Government Benches who travel to South Africa, paid for by the South African Government, never raise at all and clearly agree with?

Mrs. Chalker: I think that the hon. Gentleman knows me well enough to realise that I will take every opportunity provided to me to raise those cases which we believe, and have consistently believed, should be raised with the South African Government. In fact, I did that during a private weekend visit when I spent most of that weekend in the three townships of Soweto, Mamelodi and Alexandra, when I saw the conditions for myself. I also saw the help that the British Government are giving to black people in South Africa in health, education, housing and training. Where cases involve internal matters in South Africa, we can raise those with Ministers, but we cannot direct them in what to do. The people have elected that Government, even though it is a minority white Government.

Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress of, and the present position on, the Vienna review conference on security and co-operation in Europe.

Mr. Waldegrave: Provisional agreement has been reached on a large number of issues at the Vienna CSCE meeting, including useful new commitments in human rights. We hope that it can be concluded soon, but we continue to believe that the right result is more important than an early result.

Mr. Chapman: In welcoming the further progress that has been made, may I ask my hon. Friend to confirm that there are still some basic human rights issues outstanding and that until the Warsaw pact countries unambiguously accept some of those basic human rights, not least the freedoms of religion, travel and visiting, no meaningful purpose can be served by starting the conventional stability talks? Does he agree that there is an opportunity to make that point precisely within the next fortnight during the very welcome visit by President Gorbachev to this country?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is quite right. My right hon. Friend will be making those points when President Gorbachev visits Britain. There has been progress in the Soviet Union, but there is still much more to be made. As my hon. Friend knows, in other Warsaw pact countries, such as Romania, no progress is being made—as many hon. Members on both sides of the House have written to me to emphasise—and there have been important steps backwards in human rights.

Mr. Lamond: Are the Government maintaining their determination not to agree to a third meeting of the committee on human relations, which is proposed to be held in Moscow? Are we maintaining resistance to that on the grounds that, although in eastern Europe they are extending human rights quite a lot, and certainly will have done so by 1991, we in Britain are moving in the opposite direction?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman is free to experiment in Romania if he considers that is preferable. We have the greatest scepticism about the Moscow human rights conference. Many groups of people concerned with human rights on both sides of the Iron Curtain have written to us to urge caution. On the other hand, as Mr. Sakharov said, if it is accompanied by the right conditions it might well be an opportunity for further progress. We shall look at the conditions on offer, and we shall make up our minds then. Until the last minute before that conference takes place, if things go backwards we shall reserve the right to withdraw from it.

Scottish Transport Group

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the future of the Scottish Transport Group.

In my statements to the House on 27 January and 24 May, I said that I had decided to privatise the Scottish Bus Group and to do so in about 10 units. I also said that I would give further careful consideration to the implications for the future of Caledonian MacBrayne. As the House will know, it was announced in the Queen's Speech that legislation to privatise the Scottish Bus Group and make arrangements for the future of Caledonian MacBrayne would be introduced this Session. The Transport (Scotland) Bill is being laid before the House today.

I will deal first with Caledonian MacBrayne, which provides a wide range of shipping services on the west coast of Scotland. Many of these services provide a lifeline to the islands they serve. It is essential that these services should be maintained together with the greatly improved standards which we have built up since we came to office, with new ships and new piers. With this background very much in mind, we have looked carefully at a range of options in considering the future of Caledonian MacBrayne. Certain quite distinctive types of service are provided and different solutions might well be appropriate in the interests of both customers and taxpayers.

First, there are the services provided within the relatively sheltered waters of the Clyde; secondly, the services provided by major ships on the more difficult waters of the west coast; and thirdly, the short crossings to individual islands provided by smaller vessels. In the upper Clyde there is a clear anomaly in the case of the Gourock-Dunoon route, where Caledonian MacBrayne is running a subsidised service on a similar route to a commercial operation provided by Western Ferries. This route should be able to operate satisfactorily on the basis of private funding, as could CalMac's Wemyss Bay-Rothesay route which is provided by the same group of vessels. However, we fully recognise that for the remaining services operated by Caledonian MacBrayne, significant subsidies will for the most part continue to be needed in order to maintain the present level of service. Our examination of the present structure and methods of operation of CalMac, however, has led me to conclude that there is considerable scope for getting better value for the money which we—and the passengers—spend on these services.

In the light of the early dissolution of the Scottish Transport Group, of our examination of the options, and taking account of the many views expressed to us, I have decided that the best arrangement for Caledonian MacBrayne is that it should become a company owned in the first instance by the Secretary of State. A new board for the company will be appointed and will contain some people with commercial expertise, including some with first-hand knowledge of the islands served and their needs. I believe it is right for the headquarters of the new company to be nearer the centre of the area which it serves, and consider that Oban would be likely to prove the most suitable place from which to operate.

I will ask the new board to explore the possibility of transferring to the private sector the Gourock-Dunoon and Wemyss Bay-Rothesay routes. For the remaining services, I will ask it to examine existing practices carefully in order to find more efficient and cost-effective ways of delivering the present standard of service. No options for the longer term will be excluded, subject to the overriding proviso that they must ensure at least the present quality of service to the islands.

As far as the Scottish Bus Group is concerned, I have, with my financial advisers, Quayle Munro, given further consideration to the pattern of privatisation. I have decided that the Scottish Bus Group should be offered for sale as 11 units. Nine of those units are existing subsidiaries of the Scottish Bus Group. They are the seven existing geographical operating subsidiaries—Lowland, Eastern, Strathtay, Highland, Fife, Northern and Midland, the coaching firm Scottish Citylink, and the engineering subsidiary, SBG Engineering.

The other two units for privatisation will be created by the combination of two pairs of existing geographical subsidiaries, Western and Clydeside, which will be privatised as one unit, as will Central and Kelvin. That pattern of privatisation is designed to create viable companies and the basis for sustained and balanced competition within the Scottish bus market to the benefit of bus travellers. The combination of subsidiaries round Glasgow takes account of the competitive situation in that city.

I am keen that this privatisation should increase employee participation. I know that there is already considerable interest among employees in taking part in the privatisation. I welcome that. It will be encouraged by the provision of financial assistance to management-employee teams wanting to bid for their companies and offering the prospect of locally based management with real employee participation.

The arrangements that I am announcing today for both CalMac and the Scottish Bus Group will provide the basis for maintaining and improving services to the Scottish public, for creating vigorous new Scottish companies, with which local communities will identify, and for getting better value for money where public subsidy will still be required.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): The statement on Caledonian MacBrayne represents a major retreat by the Secretary of State and a tacit recognition by even this prejudiced Government that privatisation is not a universal remedy, and certainly not the best way to provide essential public services. The decision is a tribute to the coherent case argued by the communities that depend on those services and by my hon. Friends who have taken a particular interest in the matter.

I welcome the retreat but, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman will recognise, many questions remain unanswered. We have been told that the bulk of Caledonian MacBrayne's operations will be transferred, in the first instance, to a company owned by the Secretary of State. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman end the uncertainty and recognise the logic of his decision by ruling out the possibility of further asset stripping? Will he give an assurance that the board of the new company will be genuinely representative of the areas it serves and will not be burdened with a remit to sell out as and when possible?

The right hon. and learned Gentleman's statement struggled painfully to reconcile reality with his ideology. He knows that he cannot deliver what he wanted, so we are left with interference to very little purpose. Is he satisfied that the arrangements for Caledonian MacBrayne will allow the present level of European assistance to continue?

The Secretary of State referred to the new board exploring the possibility of the transfer of the Gourock-Dunoon and Wemyss Bay-Rothesay service. Does that mean that the company, having examined the options, can refuse? Will the board have the independence of action that will allow such a refusal?

Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that there is no need to fragment Caledonian MacBrayne services in that way? Does he recall the last time that the Government tried to hand the Gourock-Dunoon route to the private sector in the form of Western Ferries? He should, because he was the Minister in charge of that disaster. In the light of that experience, will he guarantee that public opinion will be consulted on this occasion?

Many interests will regret that the Scottish Bus Group is to be split in the way described. However, I welcome the emphasis on employee participation. I hope that the financial support to which the Minister referred will be realistic. Does he recall that, of the 72 component companies of the National Bus Group in England, only two went to employee participation buy-outs? That underlines the need for financial help to be more than cosmetic—more than mere window dressing—if it is to be a success.

What protection will there be against predators from south of the border or, indeed, of the home-grown variety, of which Stagecoach is the most feared? Our interests will be to ensure that the conditions of service and the pensions of employees are secured and that the level of service for the travelling public is protected, especially in rural areas and during off-peak hours. The whole exercise is a political manoeuvre which has no public support. The Secretary of State should recognise that the realities that forced the Caledonian MacBrayne retreat apply, too, to the Scottish Bus Group as a whole. A further retreat would be very much in the public interest.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman never ceases to entertain the House. In response to my comments on Caledonian MacBrayne, he began by describing the statement as a triumph for the Opposition—and then proceeded to criticise every detail in it. He must make up his mind how he interprets the statement.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the simple fact is that, when I spoke about Caledonian MacBrayne some months ago, I made it clear that the Government had no preconception as to whether the privatisation of Caledonian MacBrayne would be a realistic option. I challenge the hon. Gentleman or any of his hon. Friends to quote any statement, phrase or suggestion to the contrary. What I said was that the Government's overriding priority since 1979 has been to maintain—indeed improve—the quality of service to the islands. We have allowed the resources needed to improve that service to be provided. Where there are services, such as Gourock-Dunoon and Wemyss Bay-Rothesay, where a subsidy is not needed, then it is inappropriate for subsidy to continue.

The hon. Gentleman asked me whether the Caledonian MacBrayne company, having investigated the matter, would be free to conclude that it did not wish to privatise those routes. It would be a curious line of argument that said that it would be appropriate to continue with one route being subsidised by the taxpayer in order to compete with another company which requires no subsidy and can make a profit on that basis. That is the basis upon which these proposals are put forward.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether European assistance will continue to be available to Caledonian MacBrayne. I understand that there is no reason why it should not be.

In reply to the hon. Gentleman's comments about the Scottish Bus Group, I welcome his rather late-in-the-day endorsement of employee buy-outs of public sector companies. It is not an issue with which he has been identified in the past. I was especially interested when he concluded his sterling comments by saying that the whole issue of the privatisation of bus services was "a political manoeuvre with no public support". If the hon. Gentleman believes that, will he explain why Grampian regional council—with the support of the Labour group on that council—is at present proposing to the Scottish Office that it should be allowed to privatise its bus service? I am informed that that has the support of all political parties on Grampian regional council.

Why is it that the Labour party in the Grampian region believes that the privatisation of its bus service is in the public interest, but the Labour party in the House believes that the privatisation of the Scottish Bus Group is somehow a completely different matter? I advise the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends to visit their Labour colleagues on Grampian regional council. They may not come away any wiser, but they will come away better informed.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): I join my right hon. and learned Friend in congratulating the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) on at least a small step towards Damascus. I welcome, too, what he has said about the assistance to be offered to employee management buy-outs. Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm the details of the assistance that may be available?

I shall ask my right hon. and learned Friend a more detailed question about the proposals for Western and Clydeside. My right hon. and learned Friend will know that I have made previous representations on behalf of a number of people in the industry, who considered that it would be better for those two companies to be privatised separately. Will he assure the House that those representations were taken seriously? Does he agree that it is important that the privatised companies should be able to compete fairly and effectively with Strathclyde Buses? Does he agree that the most effective way of ensuring that would be to privatise Strathclyde Buses?

Mr. Rifkind: I hope that Strathclyde regional council will follow the good precedent set by Grampian regional council, and do what is in the public interest.

We gave serious consideration to the flotation of Clydeside as an individual company, but the advice that we received suggested that the best prospect for the economic viability of Clydeside would be to combine it with Western. That is something that appeared to be in the interests both of those who work in Clydeside and those who use the bus services in that locality.

[Mr. Rifkind]

I am glad of my hon. Friend's welcome for employee participation. We shall be happy not only to give advice and assistance to those employees or those in management wishing to acquire their company, but, in line with similar previous privatisations, we hope that there will be some preference for a management or employee buy-out when this matter is finally dealt with after the passage of the necessary legislation.

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): It is appropriate that, on St. Andrew's day, I am able to welcome most of the Secretary of State's statement on Caledonian MacBrayne.

The fact that the Government have listened to representations made, have seen the light and have decided to back off on the privatisations is welcome. Will the Secretary of State also accept my thanks for arranging, at short notice, for his colleague the Minister of State to meet a delegation of islanders to hear their views. I am delighted that he was prepared to listen.

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman also accept that I fully endorse his idea that the management and headquarters should be moved to Oban?

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Why did the hon. Lady not think of that?

Mrs. Michie: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I suggested it several times. I am delighted that the Secretary of State agrees that the headquarters should be moved to the centre of its operations.

Will the Secretary of State guarantee that, if anything is done in the future about Caledonian MacBrayne, any proposals will be referred first to the House? We must have primary legislation. [Interruption.] I just want to ensure that the Secretary of State will guarantee the future of Caledonian MacBrayne.

As for the Dunoon and Rothesay routes, will the Secretary of State promise that the board will listen carefully to the representations of the local people, remembering the anger and frustration expressed the last time the Government tried to interfere?

Briefly, if the Scottish Bus Group is to be privatised, we are glad that the Government are considering a staff-management buy-out. I hope that the Secretary of State will be able to guarantee the service——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Briefly, please.

Mrs. Michie: —the service in the rural areas.

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful for the hon. Lady's welcome for the statement. It is important that, just as we often want the centre of corporate activities moved to the north of England, Scotland or Wales, so too, within Scotland, it is desirable, where appropriate, for companies' headquarters to be moved to the communities they serve. Hence the decision to move the headquarters to Oban.

We shall encourage a management and employee buy-out of the Scottish Bus Group, but we cannot guarantee that that will be the end result, because that will depend on the proposals eventually put before us for the flotation of the individual companies.

There is an anomaly that needs to be resolved regarding Gourock-Dunoon. It should be unnecessary to use taxpayers' money to subsidise a service to compete with another service that does not require a subsidy. Therefore, it would be proper and sensible to explore a way in which we can continue to ensure a proper service for those who use the route without the unnecessary subsidies of recent years.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): To cure the dementia of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), after he has spoken to the Socialist members of the Grampian region council perhaps he should, on his way south, call on those who run Strathtay Buses. Some 60 per cent. of that work force, to demonstrate that there is no public demand or interest, are presently putting £7,500 a week into a bank account to fund a management and employee buy-out. Will he ensure that their enthusiasm not only for running a successful bus group but for ridding themselves of the shackles of Socialism and union domination for ever is rewarded?

Mr. Rifkind: Not only do the employees of the Strathtay company think that way, but bus drivers in Bannockburn—that well-known centre of Scottish Conservatism—have appealed to the Government to allow employee participation in the acquisition of companies. In a survey of Scottish Bus Group employees in April, no fewer than 72 per cent. stated that, given the opportunity to invest in the company for which they work, they would like to do so. That is a splendid situation and one that flies in the face of Opposition attempts to deny them that opportunity.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The so-called desirable shifting of Caledonian MacBrayne's headquarters may not be considered so desirable by those of my constituents working in Gourock. The Secretary of State may laugh at this moment, but it is a deeply worrying concept for many of those constituents and I should like him to show some seriousness. What is to happen to those people? Will some of them be made redundant? If the headquarters moves to Oban, will employees receive financial assistance towards the cost of transferring to Oban or some such place?

Given that the company will be owned by the Secretary of State, can we safely assume that any replacement orders for vessels will be placed with Scottish yards?

Mr. Rifkind: I have said that Oban seems to be the likely and sensible place for Caledonian MacBrayne's headquarters, and that seemed to have the general approval of the House as a whole. I have no doubt that the company will be responsive in a sensible and sensitive way to the questions that the hon. Gentleman has legitimately raised about the interests of those currently working for the company. I certainly hope that arrangements will be made to meet his points.

As to his final question, whether the company is formally owned by the Secretary of State or is part of the Scottish Transport Group, as it has been for the past few years, will not in itself influence the decision on where contracts for the construction of new ships will be awarded. Those matters will continue to be determined on the same basis as in the past.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): As to real employee participation on the privatisation of the Scottish Bus Group, the Secretary of State must know that attempts by his opposite number in England were a singular failure and that employee participation did not come into existence when privatisation took place there. The only way of achieving it in Scotland will be by imposing such financial conditions as will allow employee participation.

The hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) mentioned that Strathtay is well advanced in the matter of employee participation proposals. He must also know that a whole host of predators made a very fast buck from English privatisation and have already clearly stated that they will come into the Scottish market. How does the Secretary of State intend ensuring that there will be genuine employee participation by Scottish employees of the Scottish Bus Group?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is correct to say that experience south of the border was that, while there was great success with management buy-outs of individual companies, the number in which employees were fully involved was far fewer. We hope to see a different pattern, with a much larger proportion of employee as well as management interest in the acquisition of Scottish companies. I cannot predict the outcome today, because a guarantee cannot be given to any one potential purchaser that they will be bound to succeed irrespective of the price offered. The companies are public assets, and Opposition Members would be the first to complain if they were disposed of for less than their true value. We must be sure that the ultimate purchasers of the bus companies pay a price commensurate with the value of the assets.

That having been said, of course we wish to give preference—as I have said—to management and employee proposals. The precise way in which that will operate has still to be concluded, but it is certainly our objective, and one with which I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would concur.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): This has been a memorable St. Andrew's day. Scottish Members have been entertained to lunch by a Scottish brewery, and my right hon. and learned Friend has made a welcome statement.

Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, because it is our intention to ensure maximum employee participation and hence to encourage ownership in Scotland, in the event of unsatisfactory proposals that cannot be reconciled, Scottish companies with employee share participation schemes will also be considered as possible owners of the new independent operations?

Mr. Rifkind: No one wishing to bid for these companies will be prohibited from doing so. We have said that we hope for successful bids from companies with management and employee schemes, and that we hope to be able to give them preference in considering applications. We cannot, however, give any guarantee to that effect, because we must be sure that we can account for the disposal of public assets in a way acceptable to the normal standards of the House.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): The House will recall that the right hon. and learned Gentleman refrained from answering the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) about preserving the public interest in rural areas. Will he tell us what proposals he will put to the House for ensuring that those in rural areas will not suffer as a consequence of privatisation? Or will they be left out of the Government's considerations, as usually happens when they decide to privatise?

Mr. Rifkind: As I told the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), the Labour party in Aberdeen does not seem to believe that privatisation will damage the interests of consumers. Many private sector bus companies operate very successfully in rural areas. The idea that a bus company will stop serving its rural populaces simply because it moves from the state to the private sector does not relate to the experience of the public as a whole.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke) rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a United Kingdom Parliament.

Mr. Bennett: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I could point out to Opposition Members that I am the secretary of the Back Bench Conservative transport committee.

When considering the privatisation of the Scottish Bus Group, will my right hon. and learned Friend bear in mind the comments of Opposition Members on privatisation of the National Bus Company some years ago, and the success of deregulation of bus services in Scotland, which has provided more independent operators there since 1986? When Opposition Members talk about predators coming to take over Scottish bus companies, should they not bear in mind the fact that the most successful takeovers of bus companies in this country have been by the Stagecoach group of Perth, which has taken over many companies in the south of England?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is quite correct to say that Opposition Members apply double standards. They seem to believe that it is right in principle for Scottish companies to be able to expand south of the border, but we hear squeals of righteous indignation whenever the reverse applies.

As Opposition Members realise, we are part of a united kingdom and a single economy. Attempts to produce barriers of the kind that one or two of the more emotional of them seem occasionally to suggest would be against the interests of the people of Scotland as a whole.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Mrs. Ewing.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): When the Secretary of State mentioned the possibility—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Carry on.

Mr. Ewing: Did I mistake what you said, Mr. Speaker? I thought you said, "Mr. Ewing." I should have known, with my record of being called, that that was a mistake.

When the Secretary of State refers to moving the headquarters of any organisation to the centre of activity, he ought to tell the House where it is now proposed to move the headquarters of the Scottish Conservative party. I am advised by the husband of a director of Grampian regional transport that, although the Grampian regional council is bitterly opposed to privatisation, it has entered into negotiations with its employees. Could I squeeze from the Secretary of State an absolute guarantee that he will not interfere in the negotiations? If Grampian regional council considers that it has no option, because of the Government's dogmatic approach, but to go ahead with privatisation, I hope that the Secretary of State will not sell the company to a private company instead of to the employees. Finally, could the Secretary of State tell me when he last travelled on a bus?

Mr. Rifkind: I understand the hon. Gentleman's embarrassment about the position of his party in the Grampian area. Grampian regional council is not legally obliged to privatise——

Mr. Ewing: Not yet.

Mr. Rifkind: The fact is that Grampian regional council, with the support of all political parties, made proposals to privatise its bus company. In doing so, it has responded to the clear wishes of the management and employees of that company. If the hon. Gentleman does not like it, he should at least not misrepresent what is happening.

If a local authority wishes to privatise its public transport company, the statutory position is that it has to apply to the Scottish Office——

Mr. Ewing: No.

Mr. Rifkind: That is what Parliament requires and has insisted upon. We must ensure, as with the disposal of any public asset, that that is done in an appropriate way. If Grampian regional council wishes to privatise its bus company, I have no power to insist that it should sell it to other than those that it chooses. However, I can ensure that the terms under which it seeks to privatise the company are consistent with proper financial responsibility.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I realise that it is St. Andrew's day, not necessarily St. Harry's day. I agree with the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), on the basis of my conversations with representatives of Grampian region, that a pragmatic decision has been taken and that Grampian is attempting to safeguard the livelihoods of those who are employed in the bus group.

What do the Government mean by "financial assistance"? Has the Secretary of State written a clear sum for next year into his budget? If he has, it would show how willing the Government are to support initiatives that will guarantee jobs for those employees. Is the Secretary of State able to assure me that the road equivalent tariff has not been ruled out for ever for the islands and that it will continue to be considered as a vital element in providing effective transport for the island communities?

Mr. Rifkind: I hope that the Grampian region's pragmatism is infectious and that Strathclyde, Lothian and Tayside will reach similarly pragmatic conclusions. The employees in the bus companies of those regions also seek a similar initiative from the local authorities. I assure the hon. Lady that resources will be provided for those who wish to contemplate employee or management buy-outs.

Mrs. Ewing: How much?

Mr. Rifkind: We shall discuss with those who put forward proposals what their requirements are in order to ensure that they have proper access to advice and assistance. If the hon. Lady consulted Mr. Donald Stewart, who was the Member of Parliament for the Western Isles, he would no doubt tell her what he told me about the road equivalent tariff: that he fully appreciated that it might be undesirable for the islands. It might lead to a reduction in fares on some routes but it would lead to an increase in fares on others. I assume that that is not a policy that the hon. Lady is encouraging me to adopt.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Many hon. Members on this side of the House very much regret the thrust of this privatisation measure and the destruction of a co-ordinating mechanism in Scotland. It will harm the interests of the rural communities and tourism. I do not welcome the Secretary of State's decision on Caledonian MacBrayne; he is confusing ships and routes, particularly in relation to the Clyde ferry service. What guarantee can he provide about safety of operations? What guarantee is there that ships of the proper design will be ordered? The real fear is that privatisation will mean that the part which remains in the public domain will be run down, to the detriment of the people who live in the Western Isles and in the other island communities.

Mr. Rifkind: The rules governing safety apply with equal force, irrespective of whether a vessel is in the private or the public sector. Island communities in other parts of Scotland are well served by the private sector. One thinks of P and O in Orkney and Shetland and of many other island communities where bulk carriers to those islands are provided by the private sector. The hon. Gentleman cannot sensibly reach the conclusion that there is a need for a state-owned company.

However, I acknowledge that, such is the nature of the economy of the Hebridean islands and the size of the population, it will continue to be necessary in the foreseeable future for a significant level of taxpayers' funds to be used to ensure that the islanders have a service, which for them is a lifeline of contact with the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): The Secretary of State used snide and mean words about considerable scope for increased value for money and for increased cost-efficiency, but did not praise the savings that have already been achieved by Caledonian MacBrayne. The Secretary of State is having to eat humble pie, but he ought to praise the work of the crews, the employees and the management of Caledonian MacBrayne for the services that they have provided. The Secretary of State's words were based on a half-baked report by the Planning, Industrial and Economic Development Advisers group. Will he undertake to publish the report so that the public and hon. Members can examine it and ask questions about it? Furthermore, how much did the PIEDA group report cost the Exchequer? If the Secretary of State had been looking for cost-efficiency, he would have abandoned this farcical exercise.

Mr. Rifkind: I am very conscious of the fact that in many respects Caledonian MacBrayne has provided a good service to the islands. However, I have received from islanders many comments which suggest that they believe that there is considerable scope for improvement. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman has not hesitated to make clear to Caledonian MacBrayne various ways in which its service could be improved. The hon. Gentleman parrots, "They need more resources." Is he aware that Caledonian MacBrayne has been the recipient of more resources under this Conservative Government than it received under any previous Labour Administration? I am referring not to EC funding but to the support given by the Scottish Office. Caledonian MacBrayne received £3·7 million to support its services in 1979. Today, it receives £6·5 million to support its services. Because of that extra help it has been able to increase its services to island communities quite significantly. During the past five years, the number of passengers carried has increased on virtually all routes, as has the number of commercial vehicles and cars.

We are conscious, however, of several ways in which the service can be improved. For example, Caledonian MacBrayne cannot interchange its crews between routes serving the Hebridean islands and those on the Clyde as they belong to different trade unions and have different restrictive practices. If the hon. Gentleman believes that such restrictive practices are in the interests of the company, I do not believe that his constituents agree with him.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Although I welcome the privatisation of Scottish Buses, will my right hon. and learned Friend pay particular attention to employee participation and the operational requirements of existing companies and their English counterparts? I have in mind Scottish Citylink and its closely integrated operational relationship with the Birmingham-based National Express Group.

Mr. Rifkind: There are many such links, and it is important that, to ensure the best quality of service for consumers, such an integrated approach is encouraged through co-operation between the companies involved.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Can the Secretary of State assure the House that the pension rights of current and past employees of the Scottish Transport Group will not be adversely affected by privatisation?

Mr. Rifkind: I anticipate that any acquisition of a company would involve the continuation of existing rights. There may be areas on which there are later negotiations if any changes are proposed, but it is the normal practice, on acquisition of a company, to inherit pension obligations towards those who work for it.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): The Secretary of State accuses us of employing double standards towards the flogging off of Scottish assets, but is he not in danger of being similarly accused when he gleefully sells off public housing, giving generous discounts to tenants who have occupied homes? It cannot be beyond his wit to devise a scheme under which workers, many of whom have given a lifetime's service to Scottish industry, get generous discounts and an opportunity to buy into the industries in which they work.

Mr. Rifkind: I am delighted to welcome the hon. Gentleman as a convert to the principle of encouraging share ownership among employees and privatisation leading to greater ownership by those who work in companies. The hon. Gentleman has until now been an unqualified opponent of all privatisation. He seems now to be saying that he is in favour of privatisation if it can lead to management-employee buy-outs. He is working in the right direction, and we happily acknowledge that.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I hope that the Secretary of State has noted that two potential recruits for the Scottish Select Committee have sprung up to take part this afternoon. The right hon. and learned Gentleman failed to answer my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), who asked how often he has travelled on a bus. How often has he struggled on to a bus with a collapsible pushchair, a toddler and an infant? [HON. MEMBERS: "Like Forsyth?"] Indeed. How often have any of his Front Bench colleagues done that?

What will be the consequences of privatisation for the safety and comfort of women and children passengers? Even when a family does have a car, the women and children of the household often have to use public transport because the husband uses the car for work. Did the safety and convenience of women and children passengers feature in the Secretary of State's discussions with Quayle Munro? If so, to what effect?

Mr. Rifkind: I have probably travelled on a bus as often as the Leader of the Opposition in the past six months. Although the other matters which the hon. Lady raised are important, I do not believe that the design of buses and their convenience for passengers with carry cots and other similar objects is likely to be affected significantly by ownership.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on managing to establish cross-party support for privatisation in the form that he has outlined—employee buy-outs and participation—but will he say something about how his plans will affect the growth of competition in the industry, which is vital to improve services for the customer?

Mr. Rifkind: Under existing arrangements, the Scottish Bus Group, which owns all the companies that we are to privatise, if not a monopoly, is in a very dominant position. The replacement of that group by no fewer than 10 or 11 separate companies, each of which will compete with existing private sector companies and public transport companies, including the soon to be privatised PTC in Grampian, will undoubtedly give a substantial boost to real choice and real competition, very much to the benefit of the travelling public.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): May we have—[HON. MEMBERS: "He is English."]

Mr. McKelvey: He is a Campbell.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Can we have an assurance that the highway hoodlum, Mr. Souter of Stagecoach, will not be allowed to buy any part of the Scottish Bus Group? Is the Secretary of State for Scotland aware that Mr. Souter dumped nearly 50 buses in the bus station in Keswick, having bought Cumberland Motor Services earlier this year? In effect, he blockaded the town to tourists and cost shopkeepers in my constituency millions of pounds because of his foolish actions, which he took only because the planning authorities refused to give him a planning permission? Is that the kind of man who will be allowed to run the Scottish bus industry in the future?

Mr. Rifkind: If Stagecoach makes proposals for the acquisition of any of these companies, they will be considered in the same way as proposals from any other applicant.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): What evidence does the Secretary of State have for his statement a few moments ago that employees of the Tayside public transport company support privatisation of that company? There is no such support among workers in the Strathtay company. There is simply a recognition that they would prefer a management-employee buy-out to a takeover by a cash-rich predator from the south. Will the Secretary of State help those workers by giving them an assurance that, if their management-employee bid is realistic and commensurate with the value of the public assets involved, he will accept it and not sell out to a higher bidder elsewhere?

Mr. Rifkind: I have already explained the basis on which bids will be considered. I have said that, subject to these general criteria, we want to give preference to employee and management buy-outs. I cannot at the moment anticipate what the difference might be between proposals from the management and employees and from other applicants. We will apply exactly the same criteria as the regional council of which the hon. Gentleman was once a member.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on this announcement. Does he agree that, by breaking down the 3,000 buses into 11 units, he has avoided the predatory pricing which could have arisen? The likely outcome of my right hon. and learned Friend's proposals is an increase in services to rural areas, not a decrease. What plans does he have for privatisation of depots?

Mr. Rifkind: Depots are part of the individual companies and will be privatised as part of the larger privatisation. There were some suggestions from certain quarters about whether it would be desirable to privatise individual depots. We have to bear in mind the likely viability of a depot. It is probably in the interests of employees and all who use these services for us to use the companies to which I have referred as the units on which privatisation is based.

Mr. Bob McTaggart (Glasgow, Central): The Secretary of State has said more than once that it is unacceptable for subsidised routes to be the same as unsubsidised ones. It is often the case, however—especially with the Scottish Bus Group—that subsidised routes are partly the same as unsubsidised ones. That fact has been reported to the traffic commissioners, who have found in favour of the private sector. Can we have an assurance that the same strict criteria will not apply to Caledonian MacBrayne or to any subsidised ferry routes to the islands, bearing in mind the severity of what could happen as a result?

Mr. Rifkind: As the hon. Gentleman knows, with regard to ferries, at Gourock-Dunoon there are two routes that are identical, for all practical purposes. The terminals are a few hundred yards apart on both sides of the route, and that is the point that I was making. I was saying not that there would be a law to prevent that, but that as a matter of policy it seemed an unnecessary use of public money to provide a subsidy so that such a situation could continue. The hon. Gentleman mentioned bus services. I share his view that it is not desirable in principle for a subsidy to be used to enable a company to compete effectively with another that is not subsidised. We shall have to find a way in which such abuses—if they are abuses—can be resolved properly.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the Secretary of State accept that his statement, insofar as it concerns the Borders region, will be warmly welcomed, for two reasons? First, Lowland Scottish will be offered for sale as a free-standing entity. Secondly, his comments about the provisions for employee participation will be welcomed. That reflects the broadly based representations that were made by the trade unions, the local authorities and my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel). Will the Secretary of State now return to the question of the financial assistance that will be available to management-employee teams? He would help them to prepare their bid better if he gave more explanation about the financial assistance involved.

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful for that welcome for the terms of my statement. In reply to the second part of the question, we envisage that we may be able to give—although we cannot quantify it—financial assistance to employees and managers who are contemplating a bid. That financial assistance will enable them to obtain professional advice on how to put together a proposal, what is required to make a credible proposal and what the parameters should be, to ensure that they are not disadvantaged through lack of experience in the necessary mechanics for competing with companies or others who may wish to put in a bid.

The second form of assistance will apply to the time when the bids are being considered from the various applicants. We have said, although we cannot yet quantify it, that we shall give preference to management-employee buy-outs. The scale of that preference has yet to be determined.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): When is the first unit of the Scottish Bus Group likely to be privatised? I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his emphasis on employee participation in the privatisation of the group. Does he accept that many regard that emphasis as the acceptable side of devolution in Scotland? As a former convener of Aberdeen municipal transport committee, I congratulate the Socialists of Aberdeen on securing the objective that I failed to achieve—privatisation of that service.

Mr. Rifkind: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's generous compliment to his one-time political opponents. I am sure that he never expected to live to see the day when the Socialists of Aberdeen would join those of other parties in support of privatising the local bus service.

I cannot give a specific timing for these disposals, but the Transport (Scotland) Bill, which provides for the flotation, is to be tabled today and, subject to Parliament's approval, we hope that the necessary legislation will be enacted during the current Session.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Does the Secretary of State recall his weasel words about rural routes at the time of deregulation? Is he aware that many communities in my constituency have lost services, particularly at the weekends and at off-peak times? It is no use for him to rabbit on about route mileage when all the buses are running on the same urban routes, with different operators. We want to talk about rural routes. Can the Secretary of State give any guarantee that services will not be decimated under privatisation as they were at the time of deregulation?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that there are two relevant points here. First, route mileage by bus services in Scotland has gone up since deregulation.

Mr. Foulkes: I said that.

Mr. Rifkind: There is no need for the hon. Gentleman to become apoplectic. The route mileage has gone up, not down. If the hon. Gentleman becomes upset when I agree with him, God knows what he will be like when I disagree with him.

As he knows, Strathclyde regional council is perfectly able to provide public funds to support the continuation of routes that individual companies do not want to provide. The regional council is the appropriate authority to decide whether there is a social need for a bus service on a particular route.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): As far as Caledonian MacBrayne is concerned, will the Secretary of State accept my welcome for 80 per cent. of his statement, which represents retreat? Perhaps in this context we can magnanimously and temporarily forgive him the 20 per cent. that is an ideological figleaf. Will he confirm that his rather patronising remarks about value for money do not suggest a further cut in the CalMac subsidy? Will he accept that a move to Oban should be a matter for debate rather than diktat?

Will the Secretary of State accept that, if the status quo is not an option for buses, an employee buy-out is the best means of common ownership, which will maintain jobs, standards and services? Will he assist that option with substance, rather than mere hope? Will he note our apprehension about predatory bids and will he note that there are plenty of Scottish cowboys, some of them on board stagecoaches?

Mr. Rifkind: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Dispatch Box for his maiden appearance. I am glad that he has used the occasion to welcome the Government's statement—or at least 80 per cent. of it. I hope that that is a useful precedent that he will follow in the weeks and months to come.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the level of subsidy for Caledonian MacBrayne. Naturally, we shall ensure that the subsidy is at the level required to ensure a lifeline to the islands and that the good quality of service that there has been—particularly in the past nine years—is maintained.

As for employee buy-outs, the hon. Gentleman heard what I had to say on the matter and I am glad that he too seems to be joining those who, under certain conditions, are delighted to welcome privatisation.

Prime Minister's Statement

4.26 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday afternoon the Prime Minister abused Question Time to make a statement on the extradition of Father Patrick Ryan. She said:

> "The failure to secure Ryan's arrest is a matter of very grave concern to the Government. It is no use Governments adopting great declarations and commitments about fighting terrorism if they then lack the resolve to put them into practice."—[Official Report, 29 November 1988; Vol. 142, c. 574.]

That is quite right. We wish that the Prime Minister would follow the example of her own words. The basis of the Prime Minister's claim is that the warrant was sent to Dublin, with additional documentation, on Friday night. We now know from the Crown Prosecution Service that that was not the case. The Prime Minister has misled the House.

The Prime Minister also failed to mention the dilatoriness of the Government in dealing with the Ryan case. Ryan was arrested on 30 June, but the Government failed to serve warrants until 5 September. On 25 November a decision was taken. [Interruption.] It is a point of order. The Government obviously do not like being taken to task when the Prime Minister misleads the House.

On 25 November the decision was taken that the Government would put forward demands to the Irish Government, and the Irish Government were expected to do in five minutes what the Belgian Government did not do in five months and for which the British Government were responsible because of the delay in issuing the warrants.

Mr. Speaker: With great respect, I cannot answer questions of that kind.

Mr. McNamara: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I am coming to a point of order. The matters that I am describing are the background to it. Has the Prime Minister asked you for an opportunity to come to the House to apologise for deliberately misleading it on the issue of the warrants and——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that he cannot allege that any hon. Member or right hon. Member has deliberately misled the House. He must withdraw that allegation. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] Withdraw the allegation, please—[Interruption.] Order. We had this unhappy business yesterday. I ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw that allegation, please.

Mr. McNamara: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, before I was interrupted by Conservative Members I was immediately going to withdraw that remark if you had said so, because I respect you and the Chair, which Conservative Members do not always seem to do.

I was going to ask you, Mr. Speaker, when we could expect the Prime Minister to apologise to the House and what arrangements would be made—this is relevant to what happened yesterday—to have the situation recorded properly in the Official Report.

Mr. Speaker: What the hon. Gentleman has raised with me is news to me. I am sure that what he has said will be noted on the Government Front Bench, but it is not a matter of order for me.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): Following the precedent set in the case of Patrick McVee, when I gave the Attorney-General my support, has the right hon. and learned Gentleman asked for leave to make a statement on the case of Patrick Ryan? Is not the Attorney-General's proper role to advise the Government and the House, rather than to brief the press through his minions? Would it not be more dignified for proper statements to be made to the House by responsible Ministers, rather than for the Prime Minister to abuse Question Time, so that we can have confirmation of what the Attorney-General said on 14 June—whether it still exists or not—namely, that there was a close and personal relationship between himself and his opposite number in the Republic?

Mr. Speaker: I cannot answer that. Again, it is a matter for the Attorney-General.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I shall take all points of order, on this matter together, because we have a busy day. I call Mr. Benn.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The point of order that I wish to raise arises out of the exchange yesterday, but is totally different in character. The hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates), whom I put on notice that I would raise this matter, said:

> "one of the most wanted terrorists has been let free".

In his question in relation to that case he then said:

> "many. . .still believe that the Irish Republic is a safe haven for some terrorists".

In response—I shall not quote it all—the Prime Minister said:

> "I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that, although the Government of the Republic of Ireland make fine-sounding speeches".—[Official Report, 29 November 1988; Vol. 142, c.574-75.]

That question and the assent given to it by the Prime Minister raise two points of order. First, legal proceedings have been taken by the Attorney-General in the case of Father Ryan. As he is abroad, the legal proceedings initiated here have been taken up in Belgium and the Republic. It has been a long practice of the House, which you have rigidly enforced in respect of "Spycatcher", where there was a case in Australia, and in the case of the miners' strike, where miners were coming before the courts, that it was not in order for Members of the House of Commons to confirm or to comment on cases that were sub judice, because the process of bringing the case before the court had begun . I hope——

Mr. Speaker: This case is not yet sub judice.

Mr. Benn: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I am not asking you to resolve today the case that I am putting to you, but legal proceedings have begun, and in this context they are legal proceedings with a view to bringing somebody before a court. If somebody was wanted by the police in this country and was named in the House as if he had already been convicted, I feel certain that you would interpret that as sub judice.

Secondly, it is clearly a misuse of privilege to use the protection of the House of Commons to make such an allegation. Father Ryan is wanted on a serious charge. It could hardly be more serious. It is in accordance with the practice of the British courts that anyone charged is presumed innocent until convicted. Therefore, when a senior Member of the House says, and it is confirmed by the Prime Minister, that that person is a terrorist, it is impossible from that moment on for that man to have a fair trial. The BBC broadcast those remarks and every newspaper has highlighted them.

The reason why I draw this to your attention, Mr. Speaker—I make no criticism of your conduct of business yesterday—is that the sub judice rule and the self-limitation on privilege are to prevent the House of Commons from becoming a lynch mob. In my submission, yesterday it became a lynch mob, headed by the Prime Minister, whose remarks are bound to prejudice any jury or judge if Father Ryan is brought to this country.

Finally, the reason why this is important is that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) said at Question Time, as a result of the Guildford, Woolwich and Birmingham bombings, many people abroad—this was confirmed by what the Prime Minister said yesterday—do not believe that Irish prisoners get justice in British courts.

Mr. Speaker: I advise the right hon. Gentleman that this case is not yet sub judice and I advise the House that every hon. Member must take responsibility for what he says. As I have said before, we have freedom of speech here, but it should be used with great caution. What the right hon. Gentleman has said about any man being innocent until proved guilty is absolutely correct.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that I should call the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates).

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) for the courtesy of telling me that he was going to raise this matter. I used the phrase yesterday solely in the context of my outrage at the fact that that person was not being brought here to face trial. It was not intended to be an intimation of guilt. Strictly, I should have said, "Ryan is the man the security forces most want in connection with serious terrorist offences." I am happy to make that plain.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe that yesterday the Prime Minister abused the proceedings of the House in the most disgraceful way imaginable. Essentially, she made a statement during Question Time. I believe that her motive was to grab the headlines from my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), who slaughtered the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government's economic policy. In her abuse of our proceedings the Prime Minister raised the question of the extradition of Father Ryan in the most politically insensitive way imaginable, because that is a matter for the Attorney-General. The Prime Minister also prevented hon. Members from properly questioning the Government on the mess that they have got into on the question of warrants.

My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is to inquire whether, if the Attorney-General asks to make a statement at 7 o'clock this evening, you will look at that sympathetically.

Mr. Speaker: Of course I will.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As we have a heavy day ahead of us, I ask hon. Gentlemen whether these are points of order that I can deal with, because so far, apart from that of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), they are not really points of order for which I have responsibility.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): This is a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The various points of order have raised what seems to us a potential abuse of Question Time by the Prime Minister, who incorporated into an answer what was, in effect, a statement. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope) launched an attack on two Governments—these are serious matters—and the Prime Minister replied in kind. There was no opportunity for Opposition Members to question her, as would be the case if a statement was made.

There is an alternative for you to consider, Mr. Speaker, because Standing Order No. 17 states:

> "No question shall be taken after half-past three o'clock, except . . . questions which have not appeared on the paper, but which are in Mr. Speaker's opinion of an urgent character, and relate either to matters of public importance or to the arrangement of business."

That Standing Order relates to private notice questions, but fits precisely the circumstances that you could use, Mr. Speaker, if, in your opinion, the Prime Minister or any other Minister abused his or her position. Ministers are in a powerful position, because the media report the comments of the Prime Minister carefully and closely. You know, Mr. Speaker, that if the Prime Minister is determined to draw the spotlight away from the economic disaster of the Chancellor and on to something else, she can do that.

As the Executive is accountable to the House, and you, as Mr. Speaker, are the Chairman of the House, it seems to me that by using that Standing Order you could state that because a matter is of an "urgent character" and relates as was clearly the case on this occasion, you could take questions about it after 3.30 pm. Your willingness to be prepared to look at this would be a useful reminder to the Government not to abuse this place as they so badly and blatantly did yesterday.

I realise that the Standing Order gives you that right, but, according to "Erskine May", precedents require you generally to receive an application for a private notice question before 12 o'clock. That is not part of our Standing Orders. It is simply a convention which, if you wished, you could change. I suggest that you reflect on my suggestion, Mr. Speaker, and make a statement—as is customary for the Speaker—so that Mr. Speaker is given a little more elbow room and a little more ability to make a decision when, in his judgment, the Government are seriously abusing this place. We should all be opposed to that.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for what he has said. The trouble with open questions at Prime Minister's Question Time is that nobody in the House, least of all the Speaker, knows the question that will be asked or the answer that will be given. I cannot divine that sort of thing. It is true that this matter was in the minds of many hon. Members yesterday. I shall certainly reflect on what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. So that we can put into context today's protests by Opposition Members, can you confirm that if, yesterday, the Leader of the Opposition had thought that this was an important subject and had stood up on Question No. 4, you would have called him?

Mr. Speaker: By tradition, when the Leader of the Opposition stands up he is called.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this afternoon the Press Association tapes were quoting Government sources as admitting that the warrants issued in respect of Father Ryan were defective. It seems extraordinary that in Dublin the Attorney-General is giving advice very freely indeed. The Attorney-General seems to be briefing the British media very freely. The Prime Minister is criticising the Belgians and the Government of the Republic of Ireland, and it seems that the guilty party is the bungling British Attorney-General, who cannot at this late stage get these warrants right. It is extraordinary that he is not even in the Chamber to listen to these points of order.

Could you arrange for the Attorney-General to report and account to the House on why he has been unable to issue correct warrants in respect of Father Ryan? That clearly lies at the heart of this matter. It is the Attorney-General's responsibility to account for the office that he holds, and he also has a responsibility to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I have not had the advantage of seeing the tapes, but I pick up the hon. Gentleman's general proposition. If it is true—I do not know whether it is—that the press has been briefed, in my judgment the House should also be briefed.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): May I proffer a suggestion, Mr. Speaker, which you may care to think about overnight on the matter of warrants and the sub judice rule? If the man has been accused and charged in this country, of course, the sub judice rule applies. A warrant is issued when a person is not within the jurisdiction of the court. If, after that, at any time he comes into the jurisdiction of the court he becomes the subject matter of the charge to which the warrant relates. Would it not be sensible, when you review these matters—I do not require an answer today, but perhaps a statement could be made—[Interruption.] I apologise for the bad manners of Conservative Members. When you, Mr. Speaker, and those who advise you have had time to consider my suggestion, perhaps a statement could be made, or the rules slightly changed so that they cover either the moment when the man is charged or when a warrant is issued against him in this country.

Mr. Speaker: A change in the sub judice rule would be a matter for the House, but if the hon. Gentleman thinks through what he and other hon. Members have been saying, he may feel that the House would wish further to debate the whole matter. At the moment the matter is not sub judice.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point is based on what you said a few moments ago. We appreciate your comment that if the press has been briefed the House should be briefed and, as you would expect, we go along with that. The Leader of the House is in the Chamber and the support that you will get from the Government will perhaps be demonstrated by the way in which they respond to the clear injunction from you that there should be a statement. May I, through you, ask the Leader of the House if he will talk to his colleagues to ensure that we have a statement at 7 o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Let us leave that matter, because I have a statement to make.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Proceedings of the House

Mr. Speaker: I have been reflecting upon yesterday's debate on the Queen's Speech. It has been represented to me by several right hon. and hon. Members that there was an attempt to disrupt the opening speeches by co-ordinated interruptions. I hope that that was not the case and that it will never be the case. I entirely accept that there should be cut and thrust in debate in the House and, on occasions, interventions, but not organised interruptions, which are a very different matter. Furthermore, I hope that personal allegations against hon. Members will not be raised again in the way that they were raised yesterday.

The House, in its wisdom, long ago laid down a proper procedure for pursuing complaints about these matters. In relation to what was alleged yesterday, and in order to clear up the matter without any equivocation, perhaps it would be right for me to read to the House once again what was said yesterday, because the letter read out by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) was not addressed to me. It was a letter to him, not to me.

The hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) drew attention to what he thought had been a "fiddling of the record". He asked me to confirm and that I had apologised. The hon. Gentleman said:

"that the record had in fact been changed"

> "The assurance that I now seek from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East is" whether it was or not. I said:

> "I subsequently looked into the matter and I had an assurance from the Editor of Hansard that no alteration was made at the specific request of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). It was a mistake in the Hansard reporting."

I went on to confirm:

> "The mistake was not the mistake of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East."—[Official Report, 29 November 1988; Vol. 142, c. 583.]

I hope that that puts the matter into its proper perspective.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): I am glad to have an opportunity of accepting unreservedly your guidance and ruling about the manner in which personal allegations should be made in the House.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would it be in any way impertinent to ask you, as you have understandably dealt very toughly and quickly with some of us on other matters, why yesterday, knowing the background, and with all the information that was available to you, you did not call to order the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Home Secretary? Some of us feel that if we had tried to do what the Home Secretary's PPS did we would have been shut up, with short shrift, and rightly, by you, Mr. Speaker. Why did that not happen yesterday?

Mr. Speaker: I am glad to have an opportunity to explain that. The matter that the hon. Gentleman raised took place a month ago. Good though my memory is, I did not immediately recollect it or appreciate what he was saying until later, when he made the allegation. I then recollected what had happened and I made the comments that are clearly on the record in Hansard.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I thank you for the clarification and the statement that you have made to the House, following, as you have said, representations made to you? Would it not have been better if the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) had made a proper statement to the House and cleared up this matter? Many of us feel that his conduct yesterday was outrageous. His standing has gone down in the minds of many people because of the way in which he conducted himself. While he refuses completely to withdraw his allegation, we can only hold him in contempt.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask for your guidance, because this is a serious matter. I hope that it is not being suggested that it is not possible, in a very important debate, for hon. Members on both sides of the House politely to ask an Opposition or Government spokesmen to give way—[Interruption.] May I make my point?—so that they can make an intervention. We all accept that organised barracking is wrong, and I was not aware that there had been such a thing by those on the Government Benches. [Interruption.] I am as entitled as anybody else to make my point.

This morning I read in Hansard the debates on the Queen's Speech for the past 20 years, and on every one of those occasions Opposition Front Bench spokesmen were prepared to give way on a number of occasions and discuss what they would do if they were in government. Yesterday the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) gave way on only two occasions and refused to give way to two of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have made a statement on this matter in order to clear it up. I do not think that we want to take it any further, except to say that we have a long tradition in the House that we resolve our disagreements by argument, not by any form of disruption, and I hope that that will always be the case.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: No, I shall not hear any more points of order on this matter.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: If it is a different point of order, I will hear it.

Mr. Ewing: It is not a different point of order. [HON. MEMBERS: "Sit down!"] No, I will not sit down, and I will not take lectures on morality from hon. Members who conduct themselves in the way that the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) has done. The reputation and integrity of my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) have been besmirched, and I say to you quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, that you have a responsibility to protect that reputation. I do not care about myself, but I care a great deal about the way in which the affairs of the House are conducted. I have a great love for the House of Commons, and I care a great deal about the image of the House in the country, and what happened yesterday at the behest of the hon. Member for Suffolk, South has done immeasurable damage to the standing of the House of Commons.

I am worried about two matters. First, my understanding—I apologise in advance if this is not true—is that the letter from the Editor of Hansard to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East was copied and sent to you. If that is true, it gives me the clear impression that you were not made aware of the contents of that letter and therefore you were caught in the position that you were yesterday, so there has been some breakdown.

The second point is that in successive news bulletins by the BBC yesterday information was given that the speech to be made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East was to be disrupted. That information was given out by the Government. My hon. Friends have said that the apology from the hon. Member for Suffolk, South is insufficient. We are asking too much from the hon. Gentleman. Having seen his conduct yesterday, I do not believe that he has the ability or the standing to apologise properly. I am quite content to leave him in the gutter, where he belongs.

Mr. Speaker: I have one final word to say on this matter, in answer to what the hon. Gentleman has said. I received a copy of that letter about a month ago. It was addressed to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) and not to me. I hope the House will accept that it is not my practice—nor, I hope, the practice of other hon. Members—to disclose letters addressed to other hon. Members.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The month is the point.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that the House is grateful to you for outlining the rules on this matter, and I am sure also that the House will take those rules to heart. In view of the significance of the letter from the Editor of Hansard to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), and the fact that you now have a copy of that letter and that it is rather central to the remarks made yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo), would it not be helpful to the House if that letter were placed in the official record, and perhaps you could make arrangements to do that?

Mr. Speaker: It is not for me to read the letter out. It was not addressed to me.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a matter that reflects on the integrity of the Chair. Hansard of yesterday shows that you asked the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) to withdraw his allegation against my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). The hon. Member for Suffolk, South said:

> "I gladly withdraw it, Mr. Speaker, if we have an assurance that no. . .Opposition Member will seek to tamper with today's record."

You, Mr. Speaker, said:

> "Order. No qualification please. The hon. Gentleman must withdraw the allegation absolutely."

The hon. Member for Suffolk, South said:

> "I withdraw the specific allegation that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East falsified the record."—[Official Report, 29 November 1988; Vol. 142, c. 584.]

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that that was a sheer defiance of your ruling. It is part of our rules that we do not cast aspersions on individuals, nor on hon. Members in general.

The public in general, not only in this country, but internationally, look to Hansard for an accurate record of our proceedings, and look to Hansard to understand our constitution and to understand the honour of Members. The fact that the hon. Member for Suffolk, South refused to withdraw such an unfounded and unwarranted allegation is a matter of great honour. He would do himself a great deal of credit, and it would reflect credit on the House of Commons, if you gave him one last opportunity to withdraw the allegation and apologise for this disgraceful calumny.

Mr. Yeo rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I accepted the hon. Gentleman's withdrawal yesterday. Is he seeking to say something more?

Mr. Yeo: I simply wanted to draw attention to the fact that yesterday I said:

> "I withdraw the specific allegation that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East falsified the record."—[Official Report, 29 November 1988; Vol. 142, c. 584.]

Today I have confirmed that I accept your ruling about the manner in which personal allegations should be made. A great deal of trouble would have been saved had the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East copied to me the letter that he received from the Editor of the Official Report.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that we should have any re-run of this matter.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It might be better if the House were reminded of what has happened on this matter over a long period. In the debate that my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) opened and concluded so brilliantly, to the disturbance of Conservative Members, he was asked, in an intervention, about certain matters. He replied that there was no such commitment, or that there were no such commitments. The difference was immaterial, as hon. Members will see if they look at the record. The hon. Member, as I am obliged to call him by the traditions of the House, for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) two days later asserted, without any justification, or without approaching my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East——

Mr. Yeo: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dobson: —had gone to the Official Report and requested a change in the words, and he said that he did not blame the Editor of the Official Report or the Reporters, who might not be entirely appreciative of the significance of the change. So he apparently knew what my hon. Friend had done, and knew that the Hansard reporters were not responsible. That was what he said. You—I regret to say this, Mr. Speaker—apparently without checking with my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East, gave the impression that he had in some way been party to what had happened.

Following that, very properly, the Editor of Hansard wrote and apologised to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East for what had happened and took the entire responsibility for what had gone wrong on his shoulders and said that it was one of the Hansard staff who had got it wrong. If anyone had to set the record straight, clearly it was not my hon. Friend.

Yesterday, the hon. Member for Suffolk, South raised this matter again and wholly falsely asserted that my hon. Friend had brought pressure to bear to falsify the record. Then he said that he had been fiddling the record and only after pressure from Opposition Members did you, Mr. Speaker, get him to make his partial withdrawal. We think that it is quite unsatisfactory for the House to be left in that position and that an apology from the hon. Gentleman would be proper.

Reverting to the beginning of your statement, Mr. Speaker, when you said that you did not like barracking and organised interruptions, you may recall that the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) raised a point of order about this letter. About half a minute later, when you were otherwise engaged, the Tory Chief Whip urged him to try to have another go at you and raise the point of order again. He is the source of all this trouble. The Tory Chief Whip is the person who organises this, and we could do with an apology from both of them.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have to say that I consider that to be a most disgraceful intervention by the hon. Gentleman. This is an important matter and I fully support the way in which you have sought to deal with this disagreeable incident. I fully support what you have done.

It seems to me that the letter from the Editor of Hansard to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) set out the facts. I therefore wonder whether you might consider what my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) said and see to it that the letter is published in the Official Report. That would then put an end to the matter.

Mr. Speaker: The letter was not addressed to me.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr) rose——

Mr. Speaker: We must now move on. The hon. Gentleman puts in jeopardy his hon. Friends who wish to speak in the next debate.

Mr. Rooker: This is a different point of order, Mr. Speaker, which is intended to be helpful. We have already spent a considerable amount of time on an important issue. As no hon. Member has made a personal statement, everyone else is fully entitled to raise the issue day after day. With respect, I put it to Conservative Front-Bench Members that they should suggest that the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) makes a personal statement. That could not be questioned. When that is done, that will be the end of the matter.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has heard that.

Ballot for Notices of Motions for Friday 16 December

The Members successful in the ballot were:

Mr. John Watts
Mr. Nicholas Bennett
Mr. Nicholas Bennett.

Mr. Speaker: I think that we should have a redraw. [Interruption.]

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I think that you may have misread the names, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps it was Nicholas Baker?

Mr. Speaker: It looks like Nicholas Bennett to me. I think that we should have a redraw for the final name. It is Mr. Kenneth Hind.

Later——

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You said that you would redraw the ballot, but all you did was redraw the third name. You left in the name of the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett), who had put in two names and had virtually cheated by doing so. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] I withdraw the phrase "virtually cheated".

If an hon. Member votes twice, his vote is cancelled. Whether by accident or not, the hon. Gentleman had two names in the ballot and, according to that ballot, he still has second place. That cannot be right. As you said that the ballot should be redrawn, the whole ballot should be redrawn.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): I have just had a word with the Clerks and discovered that, inadvertently, it was the same book that was in the Lobby. I was not aware of that and therefore apologise. I certainly had no intention of cheating and, if the House thinks that I should not have second place, I should be happy for you to draw the names again.

Mr. Speaker: I shall draw one more.

Mr. Cohen rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The final name is Mr. Robert G. Hughes.

BILLS PRESENTED

ELECTRICITY BILL

Mr. Secretary Parkinson, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Hurd, Mr. Secretary Walker, Mr. Secretary Fowler, Mr. Secretary Ridley, Mr. Secretary Rifkind, Mr. Secretary Channon, Mr. Tony Newton, Mr. Peter Morrison and Mr. Michael Spicer, presented a Bill to provide for the appointment and functions of a Director General of Electricity Supply and of consumers' committees for the electricity supply industry; to make new provision with respect to the supply of electricity through electric lines and the generation and transmission of electricity for such supply; to abolish the Electricity Consumers' Council and the Consultative Councils established under the Electricity Act 1947; to provide for the vesting of the property, rights and liabilities of the Electricity Boards and the Electricity Council in companies nominated by the Secretary of State and the subsequent dissolution of those Boards and that Council; to provide for the giving of financial assistance in connection with the storage and reprocessing of nuclear fuel, the treatment, storage and disposal of radioactive waste and the decommissioning of nuclear installations; to amend the Rights of Entry (Gas and Electricity Boards) Act 1954 and the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed [Bill 4].

OFFICIAL SECRETS BILL

Mr. Secretary Hurd, supported by the Prime Minister, Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe, Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Secretary King, Mr. Secretary Rifkind and Mr. John Patten, presented a Bill to replace section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 by provisions protecting more limited classes of official information: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed [Bill 9].

TRANSPORT (SCOTLAND) BILL

Mr. Secretary Rifkind, supported by Mr. Secretary Channon, Mr. Norman Lamont, Mr. Ian Lang and Lord James Douglas-Hamilton, presented a Bill to make provision for the transfer to the private sector of the operations of the Scottish Transport Group, other than its shipping operations; for the transfer of its shipping operations to the Secretary of State; to provide for the dissolution of the Group; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed [Bill 10].

EMPLOYMENT BILL

Mr. Secretary Fowler, supported by the Prime Minister, Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Hurd, Mr. Secretary Walker, Mr. Secretary King, Mr. Secretary Baker, Mr. Secretary Rifkind, Mr. Tony Newton and Mr. John Cope, presented a Bill to amend the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 in pursuance of the Directive of the Council of the European Communities, dated 9th February 1976, (No. 76/207/EEC) on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions; to repeal or amend prohibitions or requirements relating to the employment of young persons and other categories of employees; to make other amendments of the law relating to employment; to repeal section 1(1) (a) of the Celluloid and Cinematograph Film Act 1922; to dissolve the Training Commission; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed [Bill 8].

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Safety at Work Regulations) (Non-UK Ships) Regulations 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Agriculture Improvement (Variation) (No. 3) Scheme 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 2066) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Customs Duties (ECSC) (Amendment No. 3) Order 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 2055) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. John. M. Taylor.]

Orders of the Day

Petroleum Royalties (Relief) and Continental Shelf Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

5.7 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Peter Morrison): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I begin by welcoming the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) to the Opposition Front Bench. I congratulate him on his appointment. I know that he has a strong personal interest in North sea oil and gas activities, and the House will be more than aware that he has a strong constituency interest. Indeed, over the past 25 years, Aberdeen has played a vital part in the development of our North sea oil activities, which has not always been an easy task.

The Bill is short, and it has two specific purposes. Its first purpose is to end royalties for new fields in the southern basin of the North sea as well as onshore. That will implement the commitment that was given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement. The Bill's second purpose is to implement the agreement that the United Kingdom Government reached with the Republic of Ireland on the determination of the continental shelf.

Perhaps it would be sensible to put the Bill in the context of the North sea generally before I explain it in detail. It is fair to say that, when I came into office with my right hon. and hon. Friends 18 months ago, the situation in the North sea was a little bleak, and had been so for a while. That had been caused by a massive and entirely unpredicted fall in the price of oil. I am happy to say that the picture now is much better. I can paint an upbeat and optimistic picture, but it is not as upbeat and optimistic as I would like.

The House will recall what happened on the evening of 6 July. That was the night of the Piper Alpha disaster. When I went to Aberdeen in the early hours of 7 July, I was met by a stunned city and stunned citizens. I think that hon. Members in all parts of the House and the entire industry remain deeply upset by a disaster of such major proportions. Since then, the aim of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy and myself has been to ensure that everything is done to prevent such an accident in future. My right hon. Friend has said many times, as have I, that all the information available should be made public. As for the future, if there are lessons to be learned, they should be learned properly. Hence, immediately after 6 July, the technical investigation was set up by my right hon. Friend, to be carried out by the safety directorate of my Department. Its task was to produce an early report on what had happened. The House will know that the interim report was published on 29 September.

Within a week, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced that there would be a public inquiry under the chairmanship of Lord Cullen, with wide terms of reference. That inquiry will start on 19 January 1989 in Aberdeen. Before then, the technical investigation team will produce a further report, which will be made available to Lord Cullen. At the same time, the work of the safety directorate continues. The House will know that the information which has been obtained has already led to the directorate asking that the industry should consider better ways to improve the pipeline isolation systems. At the time of the publication of the interim report, we asked the industry to examine six further areas in the light of what we had learnt.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I wish to say publicly that I appreciate the work that has been done by the Minister of State and the Secretary of State in setting up the technical inquiry and the Cullen inquiry. The Cullen inquiry has begun in a way that shows that it will be an open and public hearing.

I ask the Minister to comment on the great unhappiness felt by those involved in the oil industry throughout the United Kingdom, and not in Aberdeen alone, about the way in which the debris from the Piper Alpha platform has been dealt with following the disaster. Many bodies are still missing. It is believed that there are technical lessons to be learned on the sea bed. Has the Minister reviewed his position on collapsing the platform on the sea bed?

Mr. Morrison: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, as is my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, for his remarks about our conduct since the disaster early in July. Secondly, if he will bear with me on the abandonment of the Piper Alpha platform and the evidence that is currently below the sea, I shall deal with those matters if, with the leave of the House, I have the opportunity to reply at the end of the debate.

These are technical matters and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend and I, along with the entire Department, have examined them extremely carefully. We have consulted outside experts. I think that the hon. Gentleman will be pleased that we have consulted other interests, especially the Scottish fishermen. He may be aware that I have had a meeting with the Scottish fishermen. There are important implications, and a decision will not be taken easily. If it is helpful to the hon. Gentleman and the House, I shall deal specifically with these matters at the end of the debate.

The areas covered by the interim report produced by the technical investigation team were permit-to-work systems, automatic initiation of fire-fighting systems, operability of life rafts, evacuation routes, the integrity of emergency systems and venting and explosions. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that safety has always been of paramount importance. That remains the Government's view. It is wrong to say that we are seeking to approach perfection when we examine safety. We do not believe that there is safety perfection, because that would imply that there is nothing more to do. I hope that no hon. Member will take that view.

As I have said, we shall want to learn everything that we can from the public inquiry. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear that, if Lord Cullen's report identifies improvements that could be made to the safety regime, the recommendations will be considered extremely seriously.

Piper Alpha must remain in our minds. Even so, it would be wrong not to recognise that the story of the North sea over the past 25 years has been one of tremendous success for the United Kingdom. It has come about thanks to the superb managerial and technical achievements of the international oil industry. It is a story of success, however, for everyone who has been involved. Too few of our constituents—I speak of those of us who represent constituencies that are not close to the North sea or that do not have a specific oil interest—understand what has been achieved and appreciate the enormous input of North sea oil activities to the United Kingdom as a whole. Even the optimists of 25 years ago could not have dreamt that we would come so far.

We have now entered a new phase. The largest discoveries have probably been made, and oil prices continue to fluctuate. Even so, the North sea oil industry continues to be both vigorous and successful. Given the circumstances, I believe that the industry is more vigorous now than it has ever been. I shall recite one or two facts to demonstrate what has been happening this year.

We in the Department have approved 24 projects so far. That is new investment of about £3·1 billion. It is the largest number of project approvals in any one year. In 1987, 13 projects were approved, amounting to new investment of £1·2 billion. These figures tell us that we are almost £2 billion ahead in terms of new investment. A further 13 projects are currently under discussion.

At the same time, drilling activity is high. So far this year, 121 exploration and appraisal wells have been started. That is a two-thirds improvement over the equivalent period last year. Four discoveries have been made, and a further five announcements have been made on tests on structures adjacent to existing finds. In addition, 135 development wells have been started, against 100 over the first nine months of 1987. That is only 10 short of the record year of 1985. These figures are a tribute to the initiative and determination of the oil industry—and when I say that, I mean everyone involved in it. It demonstrates their great adaptability and will to introduce new technology. It is those traits which lead me to believe that the North sea oil and gas industry has a continuing and exciting future.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): There is some confusion, at least among Conservative Members, as a result of the Committee deliberations in June on the Finance Bill, as it then was. Is my right hon. Friend satisfied that the oil allowance of 125,000 tonnes per chargeable period is fiscal neutrality? He will be aware that the producers' argument is that that figure is too low. His comments on these matters will help the development of the debate.

Mr. Morrison: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for potentially drawing me out of order. However, he anticipates remarks that I was about to make about the package as a whole—because this is part of a package, as my hon. Friend rightly said.

The purpose of the Bill is to contribute to the aim that I have outlined—to continue to create the right atmosphere so that further exploration and development can proceed. It has always been the Government's policy to keep the North sea fiscal regime under review and to make changes where that was desirable to ensure that the climate continues to be favourable to such initiatives. The abolition of royalty for new fields in the northern basin in 1983 was an example of that policy.

The Bill represents a further step in the same direction. There were a number of significant gas prospects in the southern basin of the North sea which were economic before tax, but which could have been inhibited by the fiscal regime. The greatest potential obstacle to their development was royalty, because its impact is relatively insensitive to field economics.

As I have said, the ending of royalty for new fields in the southern basin formed part of a package—to which my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) referred—of changes in the North sea fiscal regime which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget statement. Taken as a whole over the lives of the fields concerned, that change is expected to be revenue-neutral.

It would not be wholly appropriate for me to go into great detail about the discussions in Committee stage on the Finance Bill earlier this year. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke and other hon. Friends will have noticed that the original proposal was for an oil tax allowance of just 100,000 tonnes. After we had listened very carefully to the arguments from the oil industry and examined new evidence presented to us, that figure was increased to 125,000 tonnes. As I have said, that is intended to be revenue-neutral, and that is the intention of the new figure of 125,000 tonnes.

If the industry responds positively to the package, there is a real prospect that most, if not all, of Britain's gas requirements for the 1990s can be found from our own resources. In fact, there is already evidence that the industry is responding. As the House will know, earlier this year Hamilton Brothers announced a decision directly as a result of the Government's intention to abolish royalties in the southern basin to develop the Ravenspurn North field. That development represents an investment of £600 million in 1·25 trillion cu ft of gas reserves which would not otherwise have taken place.

The Bill will also end royalties for new onshore fields. That will provide a useful encouragement to onshore development. That aspect was also foreshadowed by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his Budget. While talking about onshore exploration, I want to raise another point. I am more than aware that other difficulties must be overcome to promote onshore exploration and development. Of course it is right that local authorities are and should be concerned about what is involved in onshore developments. However, it is also of the greatest importance that local debate should be well informed and should not be misled by the exaggerated fears and anxieties that sometimes arise.

As those hon. Members who have had the opportunity to visit British Petroleum's Wytch Farm development will know, a well run oilfield onshore can be a perfectly acceptable neighbour as far as environmental impact is concerned. One of our oldest onshore oilfields at Dukes Woods near Eakring, Newark has been recognised as an ideal environment for wild orchids, moths and butterflies which are rare in Nottinghamshire. In 1972, the area was notified as a site of special scientific interest and, through the collaboration of the industry and the Nottingham Trust for Conservation, the well sites have been preserved as a nature trail. I mention that because of the irony that, if the same development were proposed today, it would no doubt be the subject of great concern on environmental grounds.

The other elements of the package of the North sea fiscal changes which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced in his Budget statement have already been approved by the House and implemented through the Finance (No. 2) Act 1988. As Opposition Members will recall, in Committee on the Finance Bill the then Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), said that he believed that the Government were right in principle to remove the penalty of royalties.

[Mr. Morrison]

We must ensure that the momentum to which I have referred is maintained. It is no exaggeration to claim that the United Kingdom is becoming the offshore oil capital of the world. The North sea has created nearly 30,000 offshore jobs, and, according to the most recent reports that I can find, some 75,000 onshore jobs in Scotland alone. That represents a valuable part of our industrial base, which we must do our utmost to sustain.

Clause 1 will exempt new fields in the southern basin and on shore from royalties as from 1 July this year. Clause 2 is needed only to ensure that the similar exemption already granted for new fields elsewhere in the North sea will apply to licences issued in the 11th round and subsequently.

The Bill's second purpose, to which I referred earlier, is to enable the United Kingdom to implement the agreement negotiated recently with the Irish Republic on the delimitation of the continental shelf. That is dealt with in clause 3. The agreement resolves an issue which has been outstanding for 25 years. Agreeing boundaries will open up new opportunities for the oil and supply industries if exploration in the areas should prove successful. I hope that all hon. Members will agree that that represents an important step forward. As the House will be aware, copies of the agreement have been available in the Library since 8 November, when my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary informed the House that he had signed the agreement.

I want to explain a little more about the agreement. At present, we have powers to designate areas for offshore activity on our continental shelf, but we do not have powers to de-designate, and those are what the Bill is taking. When I was first told that, I must admit that it did not mean very much to me, and I suspect that it does not mean all that much to my hon. Friends or to Opposition Members. Let me try to make it a little clearer. There are areas off the west coast of Scotland which in the past have been claimed by both sides. After considerable negotiation, it has been agreed that the Republic of Ireland should give up some of its claim and so should we. However, we cannot give effect to that, because we do not have the necessary powers. That is the purpose of this small clause: it covers that agreement and that agreement alone. I assure the House that it would not permit the Government to do anything similar elsewhere. As the House will see, the Bill refers specifically to the agreement signed in Dublin on 7 November—no more and no less.

Some hon. Members may believe that the territory of Northern Ireland is being given up as part of the agreement. I give a categorical assurance that that is not so. The line in the north-west starts at latitude 55·28 north and longitude 6·45 west. That is well to the west of any conceivable boundary between the continental shelf of Northern Ireland and that of the Irish Republic.

In July this year, I invited applications for further offshore licences in the 11th round. Two hundred and twelve blocks are on offer, which makes it the biggest round for many years. One may ask why we have done this when the industry is facing such severe problems due to the low oil price. The answer is simply that there is an underlying buoyancy in the industry's outlook. The licences we are offering now will be the basis for the oil production that we need in the 21st century. No one in the industry doubts that there is a long-term future. That is why there is enthusiasm in the industry for the 11th round. I detect that that enthusiasm is spread among all sections of the industry. Our proposals are geared to interest every type of company—majors and independents alike.

There are further reasons for expecting the round to be successful. First, we have included in the 11th round some blocks which have never before been licensed in areas which are known to be of widespread interest. Secondly, exploration techniques have shown remarkable advances in the past five to ten years. Oil companies can now home in on small accumulations of oil and gas which previously went unnoticed. Thirdly, I have already referred to the industry's adaptability and willingness to introduce new technologies. That augurs well for the future prosperity of the industry and puts it in a strong position to compete for the licences that we are offering.

I know that even now companies are working hard on the proposals that they are due to put to us on 7 or 8 February, and I look forward eagerly to receiving their proposals.

The Bill may appear to be a small one, and, taken alone, it certainly is, but it is part of a large and important segment of Great Britain. Measures such as this will be needed to maintain the right climate for development. Without them, the success of the North sea would never have been possible. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, South): First, I thank the Minister for his kind opening remarks. I hope only that the attendance in the debate has nothing to do with my debut on the Front Bench—perhaps hon. Members would rather read what I have to say than listen to it.

I also thank the Minister for his kind remarks about Aberdeen. I represent Aberdeen, South, and the city of Aberdeen, the Grampian region and north-east Scotland have made a very significant contribution to the success which Britain enjoys in its oil industry. Of course, we should not forget that other regions send their workers there. Many of the workers in the oil industry are migrant workers from Glasgow, Dundee—my home town—Tyneside and Teesside. Nor should we forget the contribution of the southern sector by the people in and around east Anglia. It is a national contribution to a national asset. I thank the Minister for his kind remarks.

The Bill is very specific in its intention, but, as the Minister has already pointed out, it provides us with a welcome opportunity to debate the offshore oil and gas industry. Such opportunities do not occur often. Next year we celebrate the 25th anniversary of operations in the North sea. As the Minister has said, those years have seen a tremendous leap forward in technology and the ability to exploit further and improve on our oil and gas reserves. The oil industry has made an enormous contribution to the wealth of the country, and all those involved in that tremendous achievement are to be congratulated.

Oil and gas are extremely important to the economy. We produce about 2·5 million barrels of oil and gas a day, which is a tremendous boost to our balance of payments. We export 1 million barrels a day and save on imports to the tune of 1·5 million barrels a day. All in all, at current prices that is a benefit to the trade balance of £1 billion per month—a significant achievement on anyone's terms. It is a tragedy for the country that the positive input that we have enjoyed for a number of years is wasted on what Opposition Members regard as failed economic policies which rely more on dogma than economic reality.

Mr. Hunter: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Doran: No, I shall not give way on that point.

We used to get much more benefit from North sea oil and gas. As the Minister said, the price of oil collapsed in 1986. It is interesting to examine the position since then, and what the collapse meant for our economic position.

According to the Brown Book—the Department's annual statistics on oil and gas development—in 1985 the GNP arising within the oil and gas sector was £15·1 billion. That is a huge amount of money. The provisional figures for 1987, reported in the 1988 edition of the Brown Book, was £8·2 billion—a huge reduction. Tax and royalty revenues have gone down from the 1984-85 figure of just over £12 billion to the 1987-88 provisional figure of £4·7 billion—a significant drop. That is a direct result of the massive drop in the oil price in 1986. Since then, the oil price has fluctuated between just under $10 a barrel and about $20 a barrel. Today, it is just over $14 a barrel. Early hopes that this week's OPEC agreement would result in a substantial increase in the oil price have not been borne out. For understandable reasons, the markets have been cautious on pricing.

Currently, there are two major preoccupations in the oil industry—price and safety. I shall return to the question of safety. In this country, price has been left purely to market forces. The market is particularly sensitive, and that has hit my area of north-east Scotland. The oil price rises or falls in response to a whole range of factors, the most important of which is the level of production. It is quite clear that there is gross over-production and that there is a glut of oil on the world market.

Far from the controlled production levels and price stability sought by the OPEC countries, which would be of tremendous benefit to those countries and to our own industry, there is an international free-for-all on the world oil market. That has led directly to a fall in income in the United Kingdom and in other countries and to a severe depression in activity in the United Kingdom sector of the continental shelf. Only in the past year has there been a real recovery in activity. There has been an improvement in investment, but it is very cautious investment, certainly not at the levels expected in 1984 and 1985.

Britain and its oil industry have a vested interest in price stability, which would allow planned investment programmes and more planned depletion rates of existing fields and the development of new ones. Yet the Government have chosen to take no part in influencing the oil price. They are prepared to rely on market forces alone, and in doing so they isolate themselves from international discussion. None of us can say what influence the Government would have had had they been prepared to do what the Norwegian Government have done—simply to talk to OPEC and try to reach some agreement on production. None of us can say that that would have added to price stability, given the other international factors, but some sense needs to be brought into world oil markets, and the United Kingdom, as a major and influential producer, should be part of that process.

Of course, the price of oil and gas is not just the cost of getting it out of the ground or the cost per barrel. Overshadowing all North sea activity at the moment is the Piper Alpha tragedy. I thank the Minister for his comments and for his recognition of the severe and shocking effect of that disaster, particularly on the city of Aberdeen and the north-east of Scotland. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) will probably comment on the disaster later in the debate.

One hundred and sixty-seven men lost their lives in the Piper Alpha tragedy, which sent shock waves through the whole industry. Safety is now right at the top of the agenda. I never have a meeting with oil companies in which safety is not the major issue under discussion.

I commend the Secretary of State, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) commended the Minister, on the speed with which the Government reacted to the disaster. I know that, in the early hours of 7 July, the Minister immediately went to Aberdeen to be present at the command centre to lend whatever assistance he and his Department could offer. I commend them for the speed with which the judicial inquiry has been instructed. Hopefully, the inquiry under Lord Cullen will pinpoint the precise causes of the tragedy and make recommendations to prevent future occurrences.

It is important, however, that the Government do not shy away from making improvements in safety, where they are obviously required, now rather than waiting until Lord Cullen has reported. Parliamentary answers and the replies to the numerous letters that I have written to the Minister and to the Secretary of State suggest that to a certain extent they are hiding behind Lord Cullen and that everything is frozen until he has reported. We need, as emphatically as possible, to make the point that the biggest single contribution to safety in the North sea would be the establishment of a single, independent agency responsible for all safety matters. That was recommended by the Burgoyne committee in 1981, but despite the Secretary of State's public statements the Government have singularly failed to appoint that single agency.

There is still a multiplicity of agencies responsible for safety in the North sea. The petroleum engineering division, a section of the Department of Energy, is responsible for health and safety aspects, and the pipelines inspectorate is responsible for the integrity of pipelines. It is another section of the Department of Energy, but the two operate separately and distinctly, with quite different areas of responsibility.

There are approved certifying authorities—private companies are responsible for the integrity of platforms; the Department of Transport is responsible for fire-fighting and safety equipment and for supply boats; and the Civil Aviation Authority is responsible for helicopters. Where is the unity in that system? There is none. The Secretary of State was at pains to point out in his numerous interviews immediately following the Piper Alpha disaster that all of the recommendtions of the Burgoyne committee had been implemented, but that is not the case. The multiplicity of agencies is severely hampering the establishment of a proper safety system in the North sea.

[Mr. Doran]

In case hon. Members think that this is an academic argument about bureaucracies, I remind them of what was said in the technical report prepared by Mr. James Petrie of the Department of Energy. I commend him for the content of and the speed with which his report was produced. It confirms that the scale of death and destruction on the Piper Alpha platform was the result of ruptures in high-pressure gas pipelines. Burning gas was released on to the platform like a blowtorch, destroying everythind in its path. The integrity of the pipeline is the responsibility of the pipelines inspectorate, while the integrity of the platform is the responsibility of the certifying authority. No one has assumed responsibility for the interface between the pipeline and the platform, or, for example, considered what would be the effect of a breach of a pipeline.

That is not a novel thought. The Government are well aware of the problem, because the Burgoyne committee, way back in 1981, said in paragraph 5.64 of its report:

> "One of the 'grey' areas referred to above is the overlap in responsibility between the PED and the certifying authorities in respect of the pipeline riser and other pipeline equipment on the installation. Although forming an essential part of the pipeline system it clearly has a bearing on the integrity of the installation."

That was in 1981, and we know what happened on the Piper Alpha in 1988. That tragedy was a direct consequence of the failure to deal with that grey area.

The Department of Energy, through the Minister, has taken one positive step and announced a proces of consultation with the industry on fitting emergency shutdown valves. The failure to install such valves in Piper Alpha led to the scale of death and destruction. Will the Minister tell the House if and when he intends to introduce regulations to make the installation of emergency shutdown valves mandatory on all high-pressure gas and oil pipelines in the North sea? I recognise that there is not the same demand or need on low-pressure pipelines. Can he confirm that those regulations will be retrospective?

I want to deal with the southern sector and the relevant content in the Bill. As the Minister said, the package is intended to be tax-neutral. The first stage of the package was presented in the Budget and confirmed in the Finance Act earlier this year. Although the intention is to be tax-neutral, the Minister made it clear that some encouragement would be given to new development in the North sea, especially the smaller gasfields that have been identified but, at present, are considered uneconomic to develop.

That whole process was undertaken in the northern oilfields in 1983, and was vigorously opposed by the Opposition at the time. There are substantial differences between the two areas. The southern basin comprises mainly gasfields, which are cheaper to develop and have lower operating costs. We opposed the 1983 measures for good reasons that I believe still apply today. The first is the principle on which royalties are paid. Oil and gas in the United Kingdom are publicly owned, and have been since 1934. That public ownership is confirmed and emphasised by the payment of royalties.

Secondly, the Government already have sufficient powers to restrict the payment of royalties in appropriate cases. The powers are contained in existing legislation and are much more sensitive and sophisticated than the proposed measure. They enable the Government to take a field-by-field approach, which is much more satisfactory than the system installed in the northern section in 1983 and now proposed for the southern basin. The blunderbuss approach will mean that some operators will benefit, but many will lose. The two biggest losers are likely to be Britoil, in respect of its Amethyst field, and Conoco.

There is another, more worrying aspect about the Government's general approach, and it was not mentioned by the Minister. British Gas is a monopoly purchaser in the southern basin—it is a monopoly. It can virtually dictate its terms and it negotiates field by field. At the time of the Budget debate, a number of analysts commented on that. The "FT North Sea Letter" of March 1988 stated:

> "On this front, both Capel and Woodmac raise the possibility of BG using the improved economics on some new projects to force the price it offers down further, thus taking the benefit itself. Woodmac calculates that a 1p/therm cut could now be made on Anglia without affecting its rate of return. Capel suggests BG could cut the Ravenspurn North price by 0·9p, Barque/Clipper by 0·5p and Welland by 0·1p to leave sellers with the same pre-Budget economics."

Even with those advantages over the northern sector, development costs are still very high in the southern sector. No operator will become involved in development costs until he has a contract signed, sealed and delivered by British Gas. The whole pace of development in the southern sector is therefore dictated by British Gas and its willingness to negotiate. Of course, British Gas is now a private company. No company can afford——

Mr. Hunter: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that it is Labour party policy not to remove royalties from the northern and southern sectors? In Committee on the Finance Bill, the Labour party argued for an even lower level of oil production. Are we to understand that Labour party policy is now to increase significantly the taxation burden on the oil industry?

Mr. Doran: The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood what I said. Had he taken the trouble to read the report of the Finance Bill Committee, he would know the Labour party's position. At the time of the Finance Bill debates, the Labour party accepted some of the points made by the oil industry. In the original draft of the Bill, the Government had proposed a petroleum relief of 100,000 barrels, the oil industry argued for 160,000 and the Labour party tabled an amendment for 150,000. The Government compromised at 125,000 barrels, which we regarded as unsatisfactory. At that time, we also accepted that it was appropriate to remove the royalties as part of the package. However, we stand on the principle that the royalties are an expression and a confirmation of ownership of oil in the ground, and that is still the legal position. There is no question of supporting any increase in the level of taxation. I hope that that satisfies the hon. Gentleman.

The whole pace of development in the southern sector is dictated by British Gas, which is now, of course, a private company. Will the Minister tell the House what steps, if any, he proposes to take, first of all, to ensure that any fiscal benefits which accrued to the operator because of the measure now before us will be diverted to development and not simply negotiated into the pockets of British Gas? Secondly, is the Minister content to leave the pace of the development of the southern basin to a single monopoly private company, and, if so, in what way would the public interest be protected?

The second part of the Bill relates to an agreement between ourselves and the Irish Government. It must be put on the record—especially this week, when all the other debates about our relations with the Irish Government have been so difficult and fraught—that it is a pleasure to see that we can actually agree on something. Given the Prime Minister's statement yesterday, which today has been shown to be fairly ill-advised and misjudged, is the Minister satisfied that the agreement that was drawn up, presumably by those legal advisers to the Foreign Office, is safely signed, sealed and locked up in a safe of the Foreign Office and now inviolable?

5.50 pm

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): The Bill is not highly controversial, as the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) stated, and it should not place us in an adversarial position. However, it gives us the opportunity to discuss a vital and successful oil and gas industry. As we drive our cars, switch on our gas heaters or even purchase various manufactured items, which are derived from oil-based feedstock and from fossil reserves and resources which must be drawn from those reservoirs many thousands of feet below the surface of the earth, we often forget the hazardous human involvement until there is an occurrence, such as the recent Piper Alpha disaster.

If we study the fuel split in United Kingdom energy demand, we find that coal produces 13 per cent., electricity 14 per cent., gas 33 per cent. and oil 40 per cent. The domestic sector consumes only 30 per cent. of those resources, and the remainder is consumed by commerce, industry and transport. That is why it is vital to ensure that we get the pricing system right. If we look back at the late 1970s—during the period of the Labour Government—we find that the balance certainly was not right, because the domestic consumer of gas was being heavily subsidised by the industrial user. Recently British Gas has been called to account by Ofgas for leaning too heavily on the industrial consumer. I welcome the strong stand being taken by Ofgas and by James McKinnon, and I welcome, too, his determination to effect more control over this huge monopoly supplier.

It is in the context of our need to encourage further exploration and development of our oil and gas reserves that we should consider the Bill, which removes the royalties system for post-1982 oil and gas fields in the southern basin of the North sea. That abolition follows from the Finance Act 1983, when royalties in the northern and central North sea were abolished for future fields. At that time we were facing a downturn in activity in the offshore sector, so, in addition to the abolition of royalties in the northern and central sectors, the oil allowance from petroleum revenue tax was doubled to 500,000 tonnes. That produced a welcome increase in exploration and development. It was an act of faith on the part of the Government, and the results confirmed what those of us involved in energy matters had been pressing on the Treasury for some time before—that a tax regime cannot just be installed and then left indefinitely in the hope that, despite all the other factors, it will produce the desired result. In fact, we must have constant adjustments—which are especially necessary during a period of world instability in oil prices—if the free-enterprise companies are to be given incentives to make the huge investments which are inherent in exploration and development.

We must ask ourselves whether this year's reduction in the oil allowance—the question posed by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South—from 250,000 tonnes per chargeable period to 125,000 tonnes will truly balance out with the abolition of royalties and that we will have what the Treasury said would be a neutrally fiscal solution.

The original Budget proposal for an allowance of 100,000 tonnes for the southern basin would have had a deterrent effect. I believe that it was too low. The southern basin oil allowance would have been only one fifth of the level applied to new oil fields elsewhere and would have increased, rather than eliminated, the discrimination against the southern gas fields. I was, therefore, pleased when the Government upgraded the allowance to 125,000 tonnes, which I believe was the minimum figure.

Important oil companies, such as Conoco, have evaluated their positions. They are worried, and convinced, that they will lose about half of their post-1982 and future oil field valuations, because of the loss of the tax allowance. The problem in the oil industry is that every company has a different parameter within which to evaluate such matters, because of the nature of oil fields. However, we shall see the result. I stress how important it is for my right hon. Friend to monitor carefully the effects of any such changes on the level of activity and, if necessary—on behalf of this important industrial sector—to press the Treasury if and when the occasion arises.

We are fortunate to have these oil and gas reserves. As technology improves, the extent of the recoverable reserves will increase. We can now confidently expect to be self-sufficient in oil well into the 1990s—far beyond our expectations of a decade ago. In fact, since 1979 the estimates of initially recoverable reserves have risen by 13 per cent. The impact of that incredibly successful private enterprise industry on our economy is enormous—2·25 per cent. of our GDP in 1987, which is more than £4 billion in revenue from taxes and royalties, 85,000 jobs a year, and our United Kingdom offshore and onshore oil industry is winning a record 87 per cent. of the £2 billion orders for the North sea. Next year will signal the 25th year of this great endeavour in the North sea. We should congratulate all those who have made it possible.

At the same time, however, we must recognise the dangers inherent in a tough industrial environment; and, with the tragic Piper Alpha incident still fresh in our minds, it is right that Parliament should take every possible step to ensure that proper protection is given to those working in those hazardous conditions.

I would not want to prejudge the public inquiry, but I do not believe that the changes that the oil industry has been implementing in recent years have generally borne down on the safety standards on the rigs. It could not possibly be in the interests of a rig operator or an oil company to take short-cuts in safety. The huge losses of production that would result from an accident or a close-down would far outweigh the kind of cost reductions from such short-cuts. Safety and profitability inevitably go hand in hand, with safety always a step in front. That is the declared attitude in the oil industry, which I believe must generally be true. Nevertheless, the Piper Alpha disaster, on one of the oldest rigs in the North sea, requires the closest re-examination of training, safety procedures and equipment used on our rigs. The confidence of the work force and of the public must be fully restored by visible signs of the safest regime possible. I know that my right hon. Friend accepts the Government's role in ensuring that the most rigorous statutory system of safety standards is effected.

Some 12 years ago my wife came back from having her hair done—that oftens happens—and told me that her hairdresser's husband was a scientific journalist who was considering the effects on metal oil rigs of prolonged immersion in sea water. Because I had an interest in energy, she asked me if I would meet him to have a chat. He produced a lot of evidence that he had collated. He was worried about some of the forecasts made to him privately by scientists suggesting that some oil rigs would collapse much earlier than expected. At that time, I tabled some questions to the then Secretary of State for Energy and wrote to and met various oil company chairmen, board members and scientists. At the end of my inquiries I was reasonably satisfied that those worries had been appreciated by all involved.

However, with the recent disasters on some oil rigs I thought back to that journalist's queries. I would like my right hon. Friend to reassure me that safety is still a priority and that we are unlikely to face the unexpected collapse of rigs because of the chemical effects of sea submersion upon the steel supports.

I saw a report in The Scotsman recently of comments made by Mr. Allan Millar, the general secretary of the Association of British Professional Divers, who said that he and other divers had expected the Piper Alpha platform to be one of the first to go. I do not think that he was forecasting the collapse and disaster that occurred, but he and other divers knew that the structure was becoming outdated and antiquated. He said that it was held together by clamps which had been installed after cracks appeared on nodes—the part of a rig's leg where various members are joined together. It is obvious that the fears expressed to me a long time ago about the long-term strength of rigs still remain. Therefore, we must consider carefully the strength and viability of the older rigs and ensure that we have a system to effect the necessary checks to prevent disasters.

We cannot eliminate the risks in North sea oil operations altogether. However, given the proper safety training, full use of new technology, a strict statutory regime, full equipment checks and a responsible approach by the operators, I am confident that the overall downward trend in accidents and injuries will continue. With the welcome agreement on compensation that has now been reached, the tragic Piper Alpha accident may result in a safer industry, which is vital to us all.

As we are discussing the oil industry, it is worth mentioning the major issue of the decommissioning or dismantling of our installations and pipelines. Since 1967, 150 fixed platforms and 3,000 miles of major sub-sea pipeline have been installed in the North sea, and obviously their abandonment will present a major financial and physical problem in years to come.

Crucial decisions on tax regulations, environmental protection and forms of dismantling are still to be made. One thing is clear, however: the cost will be enormous. The figure of £3 billion has been bandied about. That is higher than our nuclear decommissioning costs for the same period.

Some years ago in a similar debate in the House the idea was floated that some rigs could be towed offshore and turned into holiday hotels. I suspect that that idea is no longer even remotely tenable, but no doubt there will be other ingenious ideas for the re-use of the rigs. Perhaps The House Magazine might like to test Members' ingenuity with a competition for ideas. Their future use will be an important aspect of our deliberations. Because of the vast number of rigs and pipelines, and the hazards that they present, we must concentrate our minds on how best and to what extent we require the dismantling of rigs.

I welcome this small but important measure and hope that the House will give it a fair wind this evening.

6.4 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): It has aleady been said that next year will be the 25th year of North sea activity. I was not in at the beginning, but I have had contacts with the industry for 17 of its 24 years. I have seen it go through price hikes and collapses, peaks of profitability and economic squeezes. I recall the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) visiting my office shortly after he lost the October 1974 election. He was somewhat startled to be told that he had left his concern for and interest in the North sea a few months too late and that, had he paid greater attention to what was going on a little earlier, he might not have lost the election.

It is true that, at that time, the knowledge and detailed hold of the Government on the North sea was not as it should have been. That must be true, as they even resorted to using me as a source of information when answering parliamentary questions.

Mr. Robert Hughes: That was unwise.

Mr. Bruce: That might be so, but I knew more than the Government, although our sum knowledge might not have amounted to much.

In the 1970s, I always supported the case for a flexible taxation regime that took proper account of price changes, the real rates of return and the variations from field to field. When the North sea was being developed, when the real rush was on, the OPEC cartel became strong and it was rightly argued that the super-normal profits that that cartel would create for those producing oil and gas should accrue to the nation rather than the oil and gas companies. It was right that the regime then established ensured that the super-normal profits were effectively creamed off for the Exchequer. Now that oil prices are relatively depressed and there is a shortage of orders for the fabrication yards in some parts of the north of Scotland, the converse is true.

The pressure on the margins is acute, although companies have shown considerable ingenuity in cutting costs. It is appropriate, however, to ensure that tax regime changes take account of the significantly changing circumstances so that we do not have a severe front-end deterrent on oil companies, which would depress exploration and development activities. That would have been the case if the recent changes made by the Government, which I fully supported, had not been introduced. The Bill is the last element of those changes.

My view is not incompatible with that expressed by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran)—that there has been a period of over-production in the North sea. It is a matter of judgment—and only judgment—that oil sold today at $11 or $12 is, by definition, not available to be sold or used at a later date when the price in real terms might be higher or lower. Of course, the resource cannot be used twice.

I have always believed that oil and gas reserves are a strategic asset that belong to the nation and not to the oil companies. The extraction process should be geared to meet national and strategic requirements. To do that, we must ensure that there are optimum levels of development and exploration and that we know what is available. We need to ensure, as has been crudely suggested, that the plumbing is in first. If we are to impose a regulation on production, we must do it when the taps are installed. I support the Government's measures. We need to ensure that the maximum encouragement, exploration and development of associated and marginal fields takes place. I know that the Government do not agree, but if there is to be any restraint on production, it ought to be directed at larger fields, and only after all capital write-offs and uplifts have been secured by the operators so that they receive a full return on their investment.

We should be encouraging research and development into reducing the costs of oil development and recovery. Those of us closely connected with the industry are impressed by the way in which oil companies and related contracting engineers have found ways of reducing costs by using their imagination and a variety of different techniques and developing technologies.

In relating commercial factors to safety, one enters a sensitive area, but one must inevitably do so—the Minister was right to address it. Fourteen of my constituents were killed in the Piper Alpha disaster. The inquiry will take place in my constituency, which is also the location of Occidental's North sea operational headquarters—so the disaster had a definite and traumatic impact on people in my area. As the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South pointed out, looking through the casualty list, one finds just how wide is the distribution of the victims' addresses, showing that the industry is truly national and draws its work force from all over the United Kingdom. It should be fully understood that Piper Alpha was not just a local tragedy.

There are one or two areas of concern that should properly be explored in the public inquiry. However, the Minister knows that I have made it clear that he has responsibilities aside from the inquiry, and that I shall continue pressing him directly on those other matters. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) alluded to the particular problem of Piper Alpha and other older platforms. It worries me that it was possible to install process modules under a platform's accommodation section, and how that came to happen has not yet been satisfactorily explained. We still need to know how that came about.

Ministers know that I strongly support the case for an independent safety inspectorate. More power and resources will be needed to carry out inspections and to lay down standards. Those who work offshore, and their dependants, deserve to be satisfied and to have their concerns allayed. I feel sure that hon. Members representing Aberdeen constituencies and others will all have received many letters from those working offshore —many of them written anonymously. Normally, I discount anonymous letters but it is a matter of real concern that such people are unwilling to identify themselves. The Minister knows we must reassure them that action is being taken on offshore inspection and control.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South mentioned helicopter safety. It is a separate matter, in the sense that the Minister, when replying, can legitimately argue that it is not his departmental responsibility. However, as the Minister responsible for oil and gas, and as someone who uses helicopters when visiting platforms, he surely accepts that they are an essential component—the lifeline and main transport vehicles for North sea personnel. Statistically, the record of North sea helicopter operations is good, but that is not to deny that there have been one or two major catastrophes or that many more alarming incidents have often been averted only by the pilots' skill and experience. There was one such incident only a couple of weeks ago.

I accept that the CAA has made several changes over a number of years, but it takes too long to review accidents and to make recommendations, partly because the CAA lacks competence and authority in dealing with helicopter operations. I partly draw that as a parallel with the reason why we need a stronger and more independent offshore inspectorate. Not enough expertise and personnel are available to deal with inspections. Also, there are costs involved in safety, which inevitably creates tension.

The hon. Member for Exeter rightly said that no operator willingly cuts corners, because the cost of a catastrophe such as Piper Alpha far outweighs any possible saving. That is true, but judgment must still be exercised, particularly at a time when profit margins are tight. Appropriate safety measures are a matter of judgment, and where costs are involved, they are another factor to be considered, according to how seriously one weighs the safety benefit that will accrue. That is why, as the Minister will surely acknowledge, we need an offshore safety inspectorate able to make decisions free of commercial pressure.

In circumstances where one is dealing with a marginal field, and where costs are crucial, corners may not be cut but measures that, on balance, should be taken might not be because they might tip the field over the balance of viability. That is an extreme example, but it illustrates my point that commercial factors cannot be wholly ignored.

Given that the Government have been flexible and responsive in meeting the industry's commercial needs, it is reasonable to maintain independent pressure on the industry to ensure the highest safety standards.

Mr. Hunter: On the hon. Gentleman's remark that companies might cut corners, is that speculation or does he know, from his far greater knowledge of North sea exploration than I have, that companies are doing so?

Mr. Bruce: That is a fair question. Other hon. Members may share my experience that people working offshore believe it to be the case and could quote chapter and verse. The problem is that they are not willing to testify against the companies for which they work, and those who have left risk being accused of having an axe to grind. The answer is that specific cases are quoted, but I am not in a position to judge their validity. However, I am entitled to say that concern exists and that we should take account of it.

It is that which convinces me that the inspectorate should be independent of the Department of Energy. Both the Secretary of State and the Minister of State have on occasion rebutted robustly, and with some chagrin, the implication that their inspectors are in some way compromised. I am sure that they are sincere, but Ministers must understand that they also are part of the commercial calculation, or are perceived to be so. That is because, first, the Government's revenue is affected by costs, profitability, and the ultimate level of taxation; secondly, their balance of trade figures are affected by production levels. I do not quarrel with the Minister's sincerity in commenting on his own Department, but it is a matter not just of justice being seen to be done and of independence being assured, but of the inspectorate being operated in such a way that it cannot be questioned and is recognised as something apart—in which those having any commercial interest are not directly involved.

The nuclear industry, where levels of concern about safety are much higher, has a shortfall of nuclear inspectors. If, despite pressure being applied, the nuclear industry has been left with a shortfall, is it not arguable that the oil industry has been left with one greater than it needs to be?

The hon. Members for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) and for Exeter also mentioned the toppling of Piper Alpha. The concern surrounding that disaster arises not least because not all the victims' bodies have been recovered. Here we enter the realm of personal distress, particularly since most bodies have been recovered. For many people, it is a psychological necessity that the body be returned and that there be a proper funeral so that, although tragedy has struck, at least it may be given a proper and final ending. For those who have not been given that opportunity, there is continuing, open-ended distress. The House will recognise that for those individuals the suggestion that the platform's remnants may be destroyed without the remaining bodies being recovered is unacceptable. The Minister said that he would comment on that, and I look forward to hearing what he has to say.

I served on the Standing Committee considering the preliminary enabling Bill that dealt with the abandoning of offshore platforms. We had many ingenious and rather light-hearted discussions about the possible options, but a general feeling emerged that the toppling of such installations—although relatively cheap—was not an acceptable final solution. First, we need an assurance that any action on Piper Alpha will not establish a precedent for any other field disposal.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I am sorry to interrupt—I have been trying not to do so—but I can give a categorical assurance that that is so.

Mr. Bruce: That is a helpful and welcome assurance.

There is some concern that the offshore industry may be dealt with differently from other industries in which it is in close competition. It is widely reported that the Electricity Bill, which was presented to the House today and will be published tomorrow, will contain a pretty open-ended taxpayers' indemnity of the nuclear industry for the decommissioning of nuclear power stations, the cost of which is estimated at £3 billion. That is comparable with the estimate of the cost of disposal of North sea platforms.

It would be unfair if oil and gas companies and their customers were forced to absorb their costs with no assistance, while the privatised nuclear power operators' costs were contributed in full by the taxpayer. It would also be unfair to fishermen and other seafarers if the cheaper option of toppling platforms were pursued on the ground that the oil and gas industries were not being treated as generously as other industries and could not afford to absorb their costs. Debate on that will continue, but I wish to put down a marker now: many of us are not at all happy about the balance.

Like others who have spoken, I am happy to support the Bill's relatively limited objectives. It is, as the Minister has said, part of a package, not all of which I agree with but which should ensure the continuation of a viable offshore oil and gas industry. I should, however, like to pick up two of the Minister's comments about onshore exploration.

I agree that the industry has a good record on environmental restoration, and has been able to harmonise its activities effectively. Nevertheless, at a time of North sea over-production, it is surely inappropriate to press for developments in areas of dense population where there is pressure on amenities. Local authorities, particularly in the south of England, are understandably sensitive to that.

We have yet to observe the final results, but we hope that the change will be fiscally neutral, which would help the continuing development of gasfields in the North sea. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) commented on the monopoly position of British Gas. I wonder whether the measure will have any effect on that company's wish to import gas from elsewhere. Does the Minister think that it will enable sufficient gas to be provided to meet our requirements for the foreseeable future? Personally, I doubt it.

This is a modest but sensible step, which tidies up matters. I think that we all agree that the future of the North sea industry is much greater than its past, and that, in spite of its difficulties, the industry will employ many people, using ingenuity and technology, for a long time to come. Hon. Members on both sides of the House are anxious to ensure that the industry continues to thrive.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): As the past few years have shown, the theme of North sea oil and gas production and exploration has not set the scene for major confrontation between the two sides of the House; and I do not intend to inject a note of confrontation tonight. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) for clarifying his party's concept of the ideal fiscal framework in which the industry should operate. I now understand that the party welcomes the withdrawal of royalties, but seeks a tax allowance of 150,000 tonnes per chargeable period.

I readily confess that I have come to the debate unprepared, because I thought that we had already had it. Those of us who sat through the 100 or so hours of the Committee stage of the Finance Bill were under the impression that all this was behind us, and I find myself enveloped by a sense of political déjà vu. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), who has just left the Chamber for an important engagement, would share both my hope that the debate will be short and my belief that it has already been well covered in Committee.

I think that the industry will say of the Bill, "About time too." As long ago as 1983, when royalties were removed from the northern and central fields, the industry said that the same should apply to the southern fields. The withdrawal of royalties from the northern and central fields was accompanied, under the Finance Act 1983, by a doubling of the oil allowance from 250,000 tonnes per chargeable period to 500,000. This Bill reduces the allowance. The Government accepted in 1983 that oil revenue could and should be reduced to further and promote exploration and investment. In my view, the financial and economic climate of 1983 was rather different from that of 1988, although Opposition Members may argue differently: the economy was less robust than it is now. But the Government were prepared to decrease North sea oil revenue, whereas in these healthier days they are making other demands.

That fount of all wisdom, Conservative central office, has reminded Conservative Members of the political perception for which my right hon. Friend the Minister is so renowned, and has drawn our attention to his departmental press release of 15 March, which stated:

> "It had become clear to the Government, in the light of our discussions with the industry, that the Southern Basin fiscal regime was becoming insensitive to the economic realities of more recent fields and could be an obstacle to the development of worthwhile projects. The incidence of royalty, a non-profit-related levy, was the most serious impediment."

I entirely accept that basic proposition.

We should bear in mind the principle, or maxim, that what is good for the United Kingdom offshore industry is good for the United Kingdom, and what is best for that industry is best for the United Kingdom. The objective of our policies must be to prolong the self-sufficiency of the North sea into the late 1990s—and, we hope, beyond—and to increase the estimates of resources that are economically recoverable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) drew attention to some of the basic statistics of the North sea industry: that oil contributes 2·25 per cent. to our gross domestic product and provides the Government with revenue in excess of £4 billion—very approximately the equivalent of 4p on the standard rate of income tax. The number of people who are directly employed in the industry was also mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter, as well as, if I remember correctly, by the hon. Member for Gordon—about 85,000. The oil industry has enormous repercussions on employment throughout the country and provides tremendous spin-offs. A recent manpower studies paper suggested that well over 500,000 jobs depend on the North sea oil and gas industry.

Last year, 132 offshore explorations and appraisals were started, besides 38 onshore appraisals. About eight wells are producing oil on shore. The second largest of those wells is partly in my constituency. Humbley Grove oil production straddles the parliamentary constituencies of Basingstoke, Winchester and Hampshire, East. We must not under-estimate the importance of the industry. We need to create the fiscal climate within which it will flourish.

There is one matter about which I begin to quarrel with the Government. The purpose behind the package, part of which was introduced in the Finance Act and part of which we have here, is to establish fiscal neutrality. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury is on record as saying:

> "we wanted to set the petroleum revenue tax oil allowance at a level that would leave the overall tax take unchanged over the life of the fields affected".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 16 June 1988; c. 512.]

Questions need to be asked about fiscal neutrality. First, has it been achieved? Secondly, is it necessary to achieve it? Thirdly—this is my own proposition—would it not be far better not to achieve it? As to whether fiscal neutrality is maintained by the Finance Act and this Bill, the industry is adamant that it is not. It persists in saying that the oil allowance should be 160,000 tonnes per chargeable unit. If that is not the allowance, operations that are marginally viable will no longer be viable. The industry says that the Treasury and the Department of Energy have got it wrong—that it should be 160,000 tonnes, not 125,000 tonnes.

As to whether fiscal neutrality has been achieved, there may well be a strong argument that it has not been. The next question is whether it is necessary to achieve fiscal neutrality. I am a staunch supporter of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I applaud all that he has achieved. We are told that last year there was a surplus of revenue over expenditure of £3·6 billion and that this year there is likely to be a surplus of revenue over expenditure of between £10 billion and £12 billion. If there is such a surplus of revenue over expenditure, and if North sea oil and gas are so important to us—as they are—we do not need to maintain fiscal neutrality. We can look for a genuine lowering of the tax burden on that vital part of our national economy.

My right hon. Friend the Member for the City of Chester (Mr. Morrison) and other hon. Members have acknowledged that the debate has provided an opportunity for wide discussion of North sea matters. I do not propose to repeat what has already been well expressed. Of course the priority is safety. We are totally united about that, and I echo the sentiments that have already been expressed. No hon. Member could take part in the debate without recalling the Piper Alpha incident and wishing to be identified with the sympathy that has been offered to those who suffered injury and to those families who suffered bereavement. I identify myself with those expressions of sympathy.

I hope that there will be a clear and unequivocal assurance that everything possible will be done in what remains a hazardous enterprise to ensure the maximum level of safety. The hon. Member for Gordon referred to the fact that North sea exploration began 25 years ago. We must acknowledge that achievement. It was pioneering work of the first order. Technological advances of that kind deserve the highest praise. They have been of the utmost benefit to our economy. A debate of this nature is an appropriate occasion to recall those achievements.

The hon. Member for Gordon and I were involved in the 1987 Standing Committee proceedings on the Petroleum Bill. On that occasion, we had to consider the abandonment of oilfields, which is becoming an even greater reality; the days of abandonment are drawing nearer. There was some objective, non-political controversy in the Standing Committee proceedings. I should like my right hon. Friend the Minister to take this opportunity to assure us again that he is convinced that the Government have sufficient powers to control the abandonment of platforms and pipelines.

The abolition of royalties is to be welcomed. It will enable marginal fields to remain economically viable. It is absolutely right that tax should be paid on profits rather than on production. I confess to having profound doubts about whether fiscal neutrality has been achieved. Heretic though it may make me, I happen to believe that we need not even seek fiscal neutrality.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I have privately as well as publicly congratulated my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) on his elevation to the Opposition Front Bench, but I want to take this first opportunity in the House to repeat my warm congratulations to him, especially on his debut, and to wish him much success in the future as an Opposition spokesperson and, I hope, as the years go by, as a Minister.

I have been involved, mainly as a Front-Bench representative, with two of the three major disasters of recent times: first, the Herald of Free Enterprise at Zeebrugge; secondly, the King's Cross fire disaster; and, thirdly, when I was involved as a constituency MP, the Piper Alpha disaster. In a strange kind of way—I take no comfort from this—we marvel that in all three major accidents more lives were not lost. The Herald of Free Enterprise keeled over 100 yd from shore. Everybody on board that ship could have been lost. Many more people could have been lost in the King's Cross disaster. Those who saw the dramatic photographs in the technical report that was published by the Department or who saw, admittedly from afar, the battered remains of the Piper Alpha platform cannot understand how anybody survived. It is a miracle that more people did not die, but we cannot take any comfort from that.

With all three incidents, there is a strong feeling that commerce and competition came before safety. With the Herald of Free Enterprise, there is no doubt that the drive of competition and to maximise profit led to quicker turn-rounds and sloppiness with regard to safety.

As for King's Cross, there is absolutely no doubt in my mind—I think that the Fennell report bears it out—that those who were in charge of London Underground were far more concerned with cash and cutting public subsidy than with safety. Again, sloppiness crept in. The day after the fire, I saw underneath the escalator. I was told that, on that one wooden escalator, there had already been 12 fires which had gone out without causing major loss of life. I incline towards the view that there is a correlation in the North sea between price stability and attention to safety. Everybody denies that. In discussions with the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association—other hon. Members have had similar discussions—and when we visited the Tartan Alpha platform, everybody assured us that safety was always paramount. If it were not true in the past, Piper Alpha has concentrated everybody's mind. I have no doubt that the issue has been considered afresh.

All of us who have been involved have been flooded with letters and inundated by people coming to see us to tell us about breaches of safety legislation and practice. They tell us that they felt that they were being driven to get on with their job because nobody wanted the platform to shut down. It is difficult to know how to judge hearsay evidence. I normally tell people who come to see me and those who give me their names and addresses to make their evidence public. I tell them to make it available to the Lord Cullen inquiry. Everybody owes it to the living and to the dead to ensure that no aspect of safety is overlooked.

I understand that Lord Cullen cannot look into every allegation and every possible aspect of safety in the North sea, nor would we want him to do so. We want a thorough examination, but we want fairly speedy conclusions. Perhaps the Minister can tell us what will happen at the end of the inquiry. What immunities have been given to the participants in the inquiry? To get the evidence at the Zeebrugge inquiry, a blanket immunity from prosecution was given to anybody who took part. Some qualified immunities have been given in regard to the Piper Alpha inquiry. I am not seeking vengeance any more than anyone else, but if clear knowledge of breaches of safety legislation emerges, the people concerned ought to be prosecuted further. I hope that, whatever qualified immunities might have been given, there is no blanket immunity from prosecution.

None of us wants to prejudge the outcome of the Cullen inquiry. I have already said publicly, and repeated it in the House, that I believe that Lord Cullen has begun his inquiry in a way which leads me to have confidence that we shall get a fair and reasonable result.

There is controversy about the independence of the safety inspectors. I have some doubt whether an independent safety commission would be as beneficial as is sometimes suggested. There is an incestuous relationship between the industry and the Department. It is neither here nor there whether that relationship is real or apparent; there is a close relationship, and people feel that it has got a bit too cosy and that perhaps the commission should be one step removed.

I know that some hon. Members feel very strongly about this issue, but my hesitation on the subject arises out of the fact that the commission cannot be entirely independent of the Government. Moreover, I do not believe that the Government's safety record is very good. I would not dare to cast aspersions on the Secretary of State or the Minister of State. I have already said that they have conducted themselves well since the Piper Alpha inquiry started, but some Ministers have departed and some may yet come in whose judgment I would not necessarily trust. We must approach the subject of independence carefully and seek an assurance, yet again, that the safety inspectors have the greatest possible independence.

I do not know why the oil industry is so hesitant. When the Opposition have demanded more trade union involvement in safety and organisation on the rigs, some people have thought that we are pursuing our natural political and industrial inclination to favour the trade unions. I am a Member sponsored by the Amalgamated Engineering Union. That union recruits members from among those working in the North sea, so people would expect me to say that we want strong trade union organisation, but it is not simply a matter of having trade union organisation because we have a vested interest in it.

I believe fervently that active trade unionists in any industry are concerned for members and colleagues, irrespective of whether their workmates are members of a trade union. I cannot understand why the oil industry has resisted proper trade union membership. The vast majority of the majors who operate in the North sea have onshore, downstream activities where for many years they have happily accommodated union safety representatives and even closed shops. Why can they not allow the same in the North sea? They say that they are perfectly happy to allow organisation. It cannot be contradicted, however, that when a trade union organiser applies to go to a platform his application is welcomed but it just happens that a place on a helicopter cannot be found for another six months.

It might be asked why organisers do not organise the lads when they come on shore. Having been offshore for a fortnight, men want to get home to their wives and families; they do not want to hang about at trade union meetings. It is entirely understandable that they want to get the first aeroplane south—because this is not a wholly Aberdeen-based industry.

When there has been some organisation, because half a dozen good trade unionists have got together, it is well documented that when they come up for their next tour of duty they are put on different ships or different platforms. The cohesion which has begun to be built up is therefore broken. Why is the oil industry not prepared to allow proper trade union organisation? I believe that such organisation is important.

I do not know how many other hon. Members wish to speak, but I apologise to the Minister as I may not be able to be present to hear his reply. It is not entirely satisfactory that he should deal with the debris of the platform in his winding-up speech because we do not know what he will say. That is a minor carp. I know that the Minister of State is hoping that I shall hurry up and finish.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I am keen to help the hon. Gentleman. However, I wanted first to be 100 per cent. sure that I should in no sense mislead the House. I have now discovered that I should not be misleading the House, so I shall tell the hon. Gentleman precisely what the position is.

It was only last night that a proposition was put in my box relating to the abandonment of Piper Alpha, which I approved. It is obviously a matter of great importance. The proposition then went to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. This morning, my right hon. Friend also approved that proposition. For the sake of accuracy, it may be helpful for me to spell out precisely what the proposition is.

Under section 4 of the Petroleum Act 1987, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has approved the abandonment programme for Piper Alpha, submitted by Occidental and its co-venturers. This proposes the use of explosive charges to topple the remains of the installation and to put them on to the sea bed, away from the existing pile of debris, leaving at least 75m of clear water above all remains.

The approval is not final. The proposed conditions to be attached to my right hon. Friend's approval include requirements for surveys of the toppled remains and surrounding sea bed to establish the position of debris and to monitor for leakage of oil and gas. They also require sediment samples to be obtained and examined for the presence of polychlorinated biphenyls and radioactivity. The conditions provide for repetition of these surveys and of sediment sampling at such times as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may subsequently direct. They also provide for debris to be moved, or removed, as my right hon. Friend may direct; for any leakage of oil or gas to be sealed to his satisfaction; and for steps to be taken to deal with any unacceptable levels of pollution.

All those proposals are subject to approval, and the operating company will have the opportunity to raise objections under the statute. The proposals have not yet been conveyed to anyone other than hon. Members in the House today, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, myself and one or two officials. I hope that that has been helpful.

Mr. Hughes: The Minister has been very helpful. If I made any charge of discourtesy in my speech, I acquit him of it.

There were two points with which the Minister did not deal. The first point concerns the bodies. I come from a seafaring family of generations back and I know from experience—although none of my family has been lost at sea—how seafaring families find it difficult to come to terms with death if no body is found. After the Zeebrugge and the Piper Alpha disasters, the relatives of those who died found it difficult to come to terms with the deaths. If the Piper Alpha platform is toppled, perhaps there will be a further search for bodies around the platform.

The other matter about which I am anxious is that the evidence that may be available about corrosion will be difficult to obtain. I said earlier that I did not expect Lord Cullen to go into every aspect of safety in the North sea, but I believe that corrosion is extremely important in relation to safety. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) mentioned corrosion and safety. As the Minister has made a final decision about the platform, I hope that he will assure us that there will be ample opportunity to study corrosion.

I believe that the oil industry is under an obligation to carry out a proper restitution of the immediate area of its operations in the North sea after abandonment. It should not have been allowed to say that it was starting a great programme, providing wealth for the nation and many jobs and that it would look after the area and then later say that it is too poor to make proper restitution.

I do not share the view that is held by some of my hon. Friends that these measures should be fiscally neutral. The oil industry generally has done pretty well out of the North sea and it should have provided more for the Government. The only comfort I take is that, although the oil industry did not produce as much for the Government as I should have liked, the Government have totally squandered the North sea revenues that they received. When North sea oil drilling began, the Opposition argued strongly that there should be a specific investment fund and that revenue should go to develop not only Aberdeen—although, of course, it needed development—but the infrastructure for the manufacturing capacity of this country. That was resisted because the Treasury dislikes hypothetical revenues, and that allowed the Government to waste the assets of the North sea. I hope that they will do better with those assets in future. I look forward to seeing the benefits from the North sea accruing to the people of this country —not only to the oil companies and those who have shares in the business.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I shall try to be as brief as possible.

The Bill has been warmly welcomed by Labour and Conservative Members and by the oil industry. The new fiscal regime will help to remove obstacles to the development of worthwhile and economically viable projects. The Government have recognised that royalty—a non-profit-related levy—was the most serious impediment to development. The abolition of royalty, coupled with tax changes, will give a new incentive for new gas developments and developments onshore. By removing the tax on wells and substituting a tax on profits, we now have a fairer system, which will encourage marginal projects to come forward and which should give a boost to the smaller and more independent oil companies. Despite a good record of new fields being developed and new wells being drilled, we should seek to exact the maximum return from this most valuable national asset.

I shall now deal with the question of undrilled acreage. The problem of the banking of acreage stems from the first four rounds of licensing. There is still a major incentive to the oil companies to develop that acreage. The licences end in the period 2010-18 and the Bill does not provide for the extension of those licences. The normal lifespan is 20 years, so the licensees may run out of time to complete extraction during the period of tenure of the licence. They are urged to come forward so that they do not fall foul of the time limit.

The Government believe that there are now good grounds for seeking to secure new impetus in the exploration of undrilled acreage. One obvious point is that the undrilled portion is an important potential addition to the United Kingdom's oil and gas reserves. Recent developments in recovery technology have improved the viability of smaller fields. The Department of Energy is encouraging licensees of undrilled plots to explore them more thoroughly. The Department has made it clear that the oil companies are expected to give details of plans to do just that.

I am delighted that the Minister made the clear point in a recent announcement that the new applications for the 11th round will be considered in the light of the existing licensees' plans on undrilled acreage. That is most welcome, and I urge my right hon. Friend to press that point whenever possible. Any measure that helps to avoid the banking of acreage is to be welcomed.

I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of the report from stockbrokers Gilbert Eliott who looked at the problem and made certain suggestions. Instead of the full United Kingdom continental shelf coming forward in a series of licensing rounds, the report proposed that the shelf should be divided into four regions and that all the available acreage should be offered once a year, by quarters in rotation. If any block remained undrilled for 10 years, the Department could demand its relinquishment.

The report claims that the scheme will have several advantages. First, there will be a constant work load for the industry and the Department of Energy, which is surely to be welcomed; secondly, sitting on undrilled acreage will cease; thirdly, regional geological assessments would become possible; fourthly, long-term exploration planning would be easier; fifthly—most important—there would be constant opportunity for new entrants.

Many new entrants are our own United Kingdom independent producers. They are an important group and their vital contributions have recently been acknowledged by the Minister. However, this year the number of United Kingdom independents has fallen by about a quarter. In February we had 40 companies; in August we had only 31. Such companies are facing several problems at present, such as the fact that their cash flows are not good and the oil price is depressed. The OPEC decision of the last few days may be of some encouragement to them.

Many United Kingdom independents are involved in onshore exploration. It is to be welcomed that the Bill gives a great step forward by having a royalties exemption clause for onshore exploration. However, problems still face those who wish to develop on shore: for example, the reserve sizes are questionable, the planning process is lengthy and there is no petroleum tax relief. I recently heard further evidence to the effect that the cost of drilling a well on shore to a depth of 6,000 ft. would cost about £750,000, whereas an offshore 15,000-ft. well would cost £2·7 million. However, when tax is taken into consideration, the net cost of the onshore well would be £480,000 compared with only £430,000 for the offshore well.

Managements involved in decision-making face competing demands on their costs. Often, the choice is made in favour of an offshore field, probably abroad, instead of encouraging the development of our United Kingdom potential to its full.

Finally, I turn to the southern basin—an area of the North sea that is important to my constituency and significant to the economy of East Anglia. The development of additional gas reserves will help preserve the production and infrastructure that is in place, and will keep jobs in my region. With electricity privatisation, there are serious possibilities of gas coming on shore for gas turbine stations. That would be a welcome addition to electricity generation in the area.

One cannot stress enough the importance of the fiscal changes in the Bill and their importance to investment decisions in the oil industry. However, there appears to be some difference in interpretation between the Government and the oil companies on the importance of internal rates of return on a field at the expense of concerns about the present value and pattern of cash flow.

I believe that when these matters were dealt with in Committee on the Finance Bill, the oil industry raised the question of the level of tonnes per chargeable period, which the Bill brings down from 250,000 to 125,000. Will the Minister give an assurance that he will monitor that regularly to ensure that it does not militate against development and that the necessary new fields come forward as we hope?

We have heard from the Minister this evening that we have a buoyant oil and gas industry. All who work in the industry deserve our greatest admiration and gratitude. Theirs is a dangerous occupation and since the Piper Alpha disaster, which has been referred to by many hon. Members, many families must be under considerable mental and emotional pressure as they await the return of their loved ones from tours of duty on the rigs. This House and those families are grateful for the Minister's categorical assurance that the highest safety standards are operated at present, and will be in the future.

Mr. Doran: This has been an extremely useful debate, although at some distance removed from the precise purpose of the Bill. However, it has highlighted some of the major problems and issues that are faced in the offshore oil and gas industries.

The points made by the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter), who is not in his place at the moment, seemed to be a plea on behalf of the oil industry, not just for the fiscal neutrality of the Bill, but for a lowering of tax rates. I certainly do not agree with that, and I am sure that none of my hon. Friends would agree either, unless the lowering of tax rates were related specifically to development proposals.

I take on board the points made by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) about the banking of acreage and our need to encourage development. Some of his points bear further scrutiny.

The major issue that we must deal with is that of safety. Several points have been put to the Minister, who has already responded favourably to one of them. I was pleased to hear his statement on the importance of the abandonment of the Piper Alpha platform. However, I should like him to be specific on one point. When I recently met the Secretary of State for Energy—if my memory serves me correctly I should also have met the Minister of State, but he was called away to Downing street for something which, unfortunately, appears not to have been noteworthy or important—the right hon. Gentleman was at pains to point out that what was intended at this stage was an interim measure in the interests of safety because there was serious concern that the remains of the Piper Alpha platform could topple in the bad winter weather. Despite the fact that supports are being manufactured for the remains of the platform, it is not likely that the platform will survive the winter. Therefore, I am a wee bit unsure about what the Minister said earlier in response to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes). I am not sure whether the Minister is now talking about an interim measure, or a more permanent arrangement. I should like him to clarify that if he can.

The question of safety in the North sea has been canvassed because it is the main issue at the moment and concerns us all. I have already said that the Government should not sit on their hands and wait until the report from Lord Cullen's inquiry is available before dealing with the obvious points that require action now. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response to that.

I hope that the Minister will take on board the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North about trade union rights. Again, at recent meetings with the Secretary of State it was made clear that the publication of the consultation document leading to regulations for safety committees and safety representatives in the North sea was likely. We shall continue to press our points on trade union representation. It is not just a question of establishing safety committees, because such committees require back-up. Onshore there is a well-established, well-tried system, involving trade unions on a statutory basis. Those committees have been shown to be enormously successful in improving the onshore safety record.

We want the same thing to happen offshore. We want the members of those safety committees and the safety representatives to have access to the independent information and advice that is provided by the trade unions' research staff. We want a genuine contribution to safety in the North sea through the establishment of such committees and safety representatives, not a muted or toothless talking shop.

The matter of the inquiry is coupled with the points made about the Piper Alpha platform. Will the Minister repeat the assurance given to me in a private discussion that every effort will be made to recover whatever evidence remains at the bottom of the sea? I understand the difficulty and the risk involved in recovering the various modules that still lie on the sea bed under this dangerous platform. I hope the Minister understands that there is still much uncertainty, for example, about where the original explosion occurred and how it occurred. Can he give us an assurance that no effort will be spared to recover vital evidence?

Mr. Peter Morrison: I agree with the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) that this has been a constructive debate. It has also given the House the opportunity to range more widely than the precise provisions in the Bill, and that is helpful, not least because for the last 18 months we have not had an opportunity to debate the oil and gas industries. Very important issues have been raised, some of which dealt with the tragedy in July on Piper Alpha. The debate has not been very political, and perhaps the industry is successful because politics and politicians do not interfere in it to any great extent.

I shall attempt quickly to answer the questions raised in the debate. The hon. Members for Aberdeen, South, for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) asked whether the work of the safety directorate would continue during Lord Cullen's public inquiry. I can give a categorical assurance that that is correct. I thought that I said earlier that that will be the case. I was also asked about the emergency shut-down valves. Proposals about those have been received by my Department from the industry, and in the light of those we are urgently considering what new regulations would be appropriate.

The point has been made to me in my office and elsewhere that there should be a separate safety directorate. The hon. Member for Gordon said that I rebutted that with chagrin and that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy was prone to doing the same. I do not think that I did it like that; but, of course, I accept that that is how my reaction may have been judged. I thought that I said, in as reasonable a way as possible, that Lord Cullen would look at that matter and that we would look carefully at the recommendations in Lord Cullen's report. If my reaction came across as chagrin, it was not meant as such.

As the Opposition know, we have followed the majority decision of the Burgoyne committee which was made at the beginning of this decade. That was assumed to be a satisfactory way of proceeding, and until that fateful evening in July not one parliamentary question had been put to me about the safety regime as such. Obviously hon. Members and outside bodies feel strongly about this matter, and it will be looked at carefully in the public inquiry.

[Mr. Peter Morrison]

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South asked specifically about the abandonment of the Piper Alpha platform. In an intervention during his speech I gave him an answer to that question. I repeat that the decision made overnight by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I was subject to certain conditions.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South asked whether debris would be moved or removed. One of the conditions of the abandonment proposals is that my right hon. Friend can provide for debris to be moved, or removed, as he may direct. It was not until I intervened in the hon. Gentleman's speech that I made public at all, even to Occidental, the situation as it stands.

Mr. Doran: The other main point I made about platform abandonment was whether the decision announced today by the Minister was a permanent or interim decision.

Mr. Morrison: It is subject to the possibility of written representations by Occidental. In my office the hon. Gentleman and I discussed toppling the platform outwards. Such a controlled toppling would ensure that the remaining debris would be not be crumpled, or crumpled further, as it might be if the platform were toppled by natural forces. I hope that I have made the position clear, as I understand it.

I was asked about pipelines and whether the certifying authorities were properly co-ordinated. I can give an assurance that that is the case. If the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South has any specific matter to raise with me, perhaps he could do so after the debate and I shall quite happily look at it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) spoke about discussions that he and his wife had had with friends about the corrosion of platforms. I assure him that there is a continuing requirement for platforms to be regularly examined for corrosion. They will continue to be structurally examined at regular intervals by the certifying authorities so that they come up to the standards required by regulations before certificates of fitness can be issued. I hope that my hon. Friend is reassured by that.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South asked about the British Gas monopoly. Perhaps that matter concerns many hon. Members. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission produced a report a little earlier this year. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has asked the Director General of Fair Trading to look at the proposal in the MMC report that up to 90 per cent. of a particular field should be sold to British Gas and that the other 10 per cent. should be sold to another client. As the hon. Gentleman realises, more customers are coming forward. One can quote, for example, the sale of gas from the Miller field to the North of Scotland Hydro Electricity Board. To a certain extent, that is starting to break what might have been a monopoly.

I do not wish to detain the House any further because we have other important matters to discuss. The Bill is short and remarkable for being uncontroversial. It is the first Bill to be presented in this Session and it is important because it has a key part to play in the economy and in industry. I am most heartened that there is cross-party agreement on the Bill, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

7.18 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): One of the many duties of the Leader of the House is to try to ensure that its procedures are kept under regular review and that the House has opportunities from time to time to express its opinions on procedural matters. Tonight's debate on a motion for the Adjournment provides such an opportunity and will enable hon. Members to raise any aspect of procedure in which they have an interest.

The main matters before us tonight are the Procedure Committee's reports, listed on the Order Paper. I shall make some comments on those reports later in my speech, but first I should like to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) and the fellow members of his Committee for their conscientious and valuable work. I understand that my hon. Friend hopes to catch your eye later tonight, Mr. Speaker, and I look forward to hearing what he has to say.

In addition to these reports, however, there are several other current procedural matters which are of particular concern to a number of hon. Members. The Joint Committee on Private Bill Procedure has recently produced a report of fundamental importance, for which I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) and to the other members of his Committee. As hon. Members will appreciate, the report will require detailed and extensive consultation. This is bound to take some time, and I see no prospect of legislation being introduced this Session, but I have said that, unusually, I will try to arrange a debate before the Government have responded to the Committee's recommendation in the normal way so that the views of the House can be expressed.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I am sure that the Leader of the House will realise that this is not only an excellent report but the culmination of a great deal of concern in the House about this matter. He is saying that there will be a chance for an early debate, but little chance of changing Standing Orders in this Session. Does that mean that private Bills being introduced in 12 months' time will still go on under the old procedure? Many hon. Members feel that that would be unsatisfactory.

I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman is aware that there are moves afoot from various hon. Members to block private business so as to precipitate a decision. I for one would not be too enthusiastic at having to carry out that exercise for a whole 12 months. Will the Leader of the House at least give thought to the idea that, by the time Bills are introduced in 12 months, we should have the new procedures in operation?

Mr. Wakeham: I am not sure that I go along with the hon. Member's suggestion that it is acceptable to deal with matters before the House not on the merits of the issues but having regard to other considerations which are nothing to do with the promoters of the Bill or the merits of the Bill. I know that he wants to be helpful, and I wish to be helpful as well. This is an important report, and we should not delay it unnecessarily. The right thing to do is to have a debate as soon as we can to hear the views. I said, not that Standing Orders could not be altered if that was the will of the House, but that the legislation that will be necessary to implement some of these proposals could not be introduced this Session. The best thing is to proceed with a debate on the issue as soon as we can, to hear the views and see whether there is a measure of agreement as to how we should proceed and in what direction.

Another issue which came significantly and sadly to the fore in the last Session of Parliament was the behaviour of hon. Members in the Chamber. We all expect that debates will sometimes be passionate and that feelings will run high, but we also expect Members to bow to your authority, Mr. Speaker, when you rule that things have gone far enough. Last Session, hon. Members were suspended from the service of the House nine times, compared with just 17 previous such occasions in more than 40 years since the war. This fact perhaps shows that the penalty of a five-day suspension is no longer enough when calculated against the media publicity that such suspensions entail. Hon. Members may wish to air their views on this matter this evening. I am sure that the Procedure Committee, which is currently considering the matter, will find them helpful.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Is there not another side to this coin, which is that the most senior Ministers of the House of Commons should tell the truth to the House of Commons?

Mr. Wakeham: I refute that. I do not believe that it is any justification for disobeying Mr. Speaker, on any basis. I am surprised that the hon. Member, with his experience, believes that that justifies him disobeying Mr. Speaker.

A further matter affecting the procedures of the House which will be in hon. Members' minds is the effect which television has on our deliberations. The Committee has just published its first report of the current Parliament on this matter. I have noted the Committee's recommendations that there should be no change to procedures while the experiment is in operation, and I concur with this. We have voted for an experimental period of televising. Let us have the experimental period first before we decide on any implications for our procedure.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the debate on 9 February, when the motion before the House was:

> "That this House approves in principle the holding of an experiment in the public broadcasting of its proceedings by television; and believes that a Select Committee should be appointed to consider the implementation of such an experiment".

I draw the attention of my right hon. Friend to the fact that the television cameras have already been in this

[Mr. Roger Knapman]

Chamber during the proceedings of this place. I understand that it would be surprising if the State Opening were deemed not to be a proceeding for the purpose of privilege. After all, both Houses are at that time properly constituted. In those circumstances, how can the Committee study

"the implementation of such an experiment"

when the implementation has already taken place?

Mr. Wakeham: I assure my hon. Friend that the Committee, of which I am the Chairman, has not yet finished its deliberations or started to make its report. That report has to come before the House, and it has to be approved by the House before any experiment, under the terms of the resolution that my hon. Friend quoted, can be carried out by the House. I gave no permission for any television cameras to proceed, so it is not a matter for me whether any television cameras broadcast at any time.

My hon. Friend may be referring to the fact that, at the time of the State Opening of Parliament, there were some television cameras in the Chamber which were used not for the broadcasting of the State Opening but for an experiment in the lighting arrangements, which was conducted by the Committee the day before, and which had been the subject of some discussion in the House. As far as I know, those cameras were not connected to the gubbins that are necessary before they can produce the signals that can go out across the ether to the great wide world. As I understand it, they were in operation the day before and the only signal that was received was on six monitors that were in the Aye Lobby at the time.

Where did I get to?

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Do not start all over again.

Mr. Wakeham: I think that I was saying, to put it into a sentence, that we should deal with the experiment of television before we deal with the procedures of the House. The tail must not be allowed to wag the dog.

Each hon. Member will have his own particular interests and priorities in procedural matters. If they succeed in catching your eye, Mr. Speaker, I have little doubt, for example, that the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) will have something to say on the times and lengths of our sittings, the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) may remind us of the importance of arrangements for scrutinising EC documents, and the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Faulds) may be able to advise us how best to prepare ourselves for television. Other subjects, which I have not touched upon, could be raised.

Mr. Dalyell: Did the Leader of the House notice this afternoon the difficulty into which Mr. Speaker once again got as a result of this abomination of the open question? Is he going to give any views on the shortcomings of the open question? Have the Government considered whether this is a satisfactory arrangement? When we first came here, Prime Minister's questions were extremely strict and Macmillan and Home, and Wilson in his better days, would transfer any question that was not the responsibility of the Prime Minister. I submitted evidence to the Committee on this subject, and I wonder whether the Government have any reflections on it.

Mr. Wakeham: The Government are perfectly willing to agree with the wishes of the House in this matter. The Government do not have a strong view on how those matters should be dealt with. Ministers are here to answer questions and they will do their best to do so. However, the present arrangements are probably the most generally acceptable to the House. We may be a little wiser at the end of the debate, and the Procedure Committee may return to the issue.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Wakeham: This will be the last time that I give way. This debate is designed to enable people to express their views, and hon. Members can make their own speeches.

Mr. Thompson: I was interested in the point that has just been made about the televising of Parliament and the State Opening. I watched the television programme on the State Opening, so I intervene merely for information. I do not know which cameras were used, but there was a view of the Chamber including all the Benches. I do not know how that was obtained and I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider that point.

Mr. Wakeham: I am happy to consider that point, but it has nothing to do with my Committee. We did not do anything that we should not have done. Front-Bench Opposition Members who are distinguished members of that Committee can confirm that we are innocent.

I wish briefly to outline some general principles and to comment particularly on two of the principal matters dealt with in the Procedure Committee's reports which are before us tonight.

It seems to me that there are certain general questions which hon. Members on both sides of the House need to ask themselves when considering the principle and practicality of these or any other changes to our present procedures. First, will they in practice mean a more efficient scrutiny of legislation by the House? Secondly, do they respect the rights of the Opposition to probe the Government's proposals and advocate alternatives? Thirdly, can they be implemented without making unreasonable demands on the time and energies of Back Benchers? Fourthly, do they still permit a Government to "get their business" in an acceptable way? In other words, the proposals should not lay themselves open to exploitation designed to disrupt the normal proceedings of the House. Of course, a balance between these questions may need to be struck, but I believe that Members will wish to be assured that any changes in procedure will provide satisfactory answers to them.

Against that background, I turn, first, to the Committee's revised proposals for the timetabling of Government Bills in Standing Committee; and, secondly, to the proposals for major changes in the procedures for dealing with delegated legislation, and, in particular, prayers.

On timetabling, if I may remind the House, the Committee's main recommendation is that each Standing Committee should have its own Business Sub-Committee. After six sittings of the Standing Committee, the Business Sub-Committee would report to it, in the absence of "satisfactory understandings", its proposals on the date by which the Bill concerned should be reported to the House, the number of sittings required and, if appropriate, the times at which the various stages of the Bill should be concluded. Such reports would be brought before the Standing Committee for debate and decision.

I share the desire of the Procedure Committee to move towards the introduction of timetable motions, where necessary, at a time which allows for properly apportioned consideration of a Bill. In the most recent Session of Parliament, we have done our best to organise the business with this in mind, most notably with the timetable motions on the Education Reform and Local Government Finance Bills.

However, I see several difficulties with the Committee's proposals. In my view, they may be an overreaction to a comparatively limited problem. I acknowledge that, in some cases in recent years, Committee stages have led to unbalanced scrutiny—the Telecommunications Bill is an example—but such instances are comparatively rare and, as I have explained, I am trying to reduce them still further.

Moreover, it seems to me critical that decisions about the progress of individual Standing Committees and the need for timetabling should be taken and negotiated, as at present, in the context of a judgment on the progress of business in the House as a whole. I am not convinced that the proposed Business Sub-Committees would be able to take account of all the factors involved, nor is there any guarantee that the overall time spent by Back Benchers in Committee would not increase.

However, I have discussed with my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton and the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) the various ways in which individual Standing Committees might be given some formal role in bringing the progress of business in Committee to the attention of the House. I hope that these discussions can be taken further forward, so that I can bring forward practical proposals to the House. In particular, I look forward to hearing the suggestions of Opposition Members in a few minutes' time.

On delegated legislation, the Committee has put forward proposals which they hope would enable prayers to be debated and which would, as a quid pro quo to the Government, hold out the prospect of more affirmative motions being taken in Committee. In order to achieve this, the Committee proposes that any 20 Members would have the right to move at 3.30 pm that a prayer should be referred to a Standing Committee, with such motions being blockable by 20 or more other Members. A Minister, backed by a majority, would also have the power to ensure that an affirmative order was taken in Standing Committee rather than on the Floor. In other words, this would override the present blocking power of 20 Members.

Again, however, I see a number of potential difficulties with these proposals as they now stand.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wakeham: I said that I would not give way again because I want to hear everyone's views, and it is important that I get on.

Regarding the proposals on prayers, I believe that there is, again, a danger of exaggerating the problems that they are designed to address. Although I accept that a large number of prayers go undebated, as the House knows, prayers are frequently tabled for purposes other than debate. I believe that, in the majority of cases where there is a genuine widespread desire for a debate, consultations through the usual channels enable this to be arranged.

I recognise that the Liberal party—if I am allowed to call it by that name—does not get as many prayers as it would like, but, by definition, the number of Liberal Members means that they cannot always command a large number of prayers.

Mr. Beith: Surely the right hon. Gentleman knows that, when those procedures were introduced, the then Leader of the House said that time would be found for all prayers to be dabated. The test of whether a prayer should be debated is not whether a large number of Members wish to debate it, but whether it constitutes legislation and should therefore be scrutinised by the House.

Mr. Wakeham: The present arrangements are reasonably satisfactory, and those prayers which there is a widespread desire to debate are debated. I am considering a proposal in the report which I believe is not totally satisfactory. Moreover, it seems to me that the proposals whereby any 20 Members could at 3.30 block prayers from going into Committee for debate might invite regular and unproductive confrontation at this time of day. As far as affirmative orders are concerned, existing provisions mean that effectively, when the Opposition so desire, arrangements are made to take them on the Floor. Under the Committee's proposals, this provision would be lost. I do not believe that this would be acceptable either to the official Opposition or to private Members generally.

Looking at the Committee's other recommendations on delegated legislation, while I accept that debate on substantive motions on instruments in Committee would give the latter a more formal role, I suspect that this would lead to greater attention to whipping arrangements than at present and to longer hours for Committee members; so, too, would the proposal for scrapping the 11.30 "cut-off" for prayers, with the "knock-on" effect that this would have on earlier business.

Recalling to mind the general questions that I posed earlier, Mr. Speaker, I am not myself convinced that the Committee's proposals on the scrutiny of delegated legislation or on the timetabling of Bills answer them satisfactorily.

We do not live in a perfect world. It would be excellent if the House had the time to consider at length every piece of delegated legislation, every European document, every clause of every Bill, and all in the civilised hours that the hon. Member for Nottingham, North is proposing. Unless we invent some sort of time tardis, where the time available is infinitely longer than would appear from the outside parameters, then we shall have to accept that giving more time to one area of our work will restrict consideration of another.

In recent Sessions, the House has reached general agreement and taken a consequent decision on a number of procedural matters. For example, Mr. Speaker, you now have the power to call for short speeches during certain debates; steps have been taken against filibustering during Committee and Report stages; and Special Standing Committees have been incorporated into the Standing Orders of the House. Tonight's debate provides us with a useful opportunity to assess other common ground on procedure and determine the general wishes of the House on the next priorities for action. I shall listen with interest.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I advise the House that I have no authority to impose short speeches in this debate. However, as the debate must end at 10 o'clock, I ask those who participate in it to be brief so that all hon. Members now in the Chamber may contribute to it.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): I welcome, however belatedly, the holding of the debate. I thank my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House for the kind things that he said about me. I do not believe that it is sour grapes for me to comment that the first of the reports that we are considering this evening was published 29 months ago. With the exception of the report which was published yesterday, the remaining four reports were published not later than May 1987, in the previous Session. The House may recall that we were first promised the debate during business questions in June 1987.

I hope that the House will not think me unreasonable when I say that 14 senior Members spent many hours in Committee and in detailed research trying to produce recommendations that may drag, even at a snail's pace, some of the procedures of the House into the 20th century, not the 21st century, or even 1992. Surely the Government have a responsibility—yea, I venture to say a duty—to ensure that the House is allowed to debate our reports within a reasonable period—six months after the submission of reports. A delay of two years is an insult to those who have spent much time and effort on their work. Indeed, one member of the Procedure Committee refused to remain a member of it during the previous Parliament because he decided that its work was not considered seriously by either of the Front Benches. Perhaps I may have an assurance that that is not the position, and that in future our reports will be put promptly before the House, especially when reform of procedure is part of the recommendation.

I turn now to happier matters. I am grateful that two of the Committee's recommendations have found their way on to the statute book, as it were. The use of Special Standing Committees is now part of Standing Committee procedure, but I ask my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to ensure that they are used when appropriate. Since the acceptance of the procedure on 27 February 1986 —I remember the date because it is my birthday—no Bill has been referred to a Special Standing Committee. Is the procedure to be allowed to wither on the vine? The Licensing Bill, as it then was, which was considered in the previous Session, was not a highly party-political measure and it would have been ideal for the Special Standing Committee procedure, which would have enabled outside views to be heard.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the Leader of the House should tell us which of the Bills referred to in the Gracious Speech he intends to refer to a Special Standing Committee?

Sir Peter Emery: I am certain that my right hon. Friend will have heard the hon. Gentleman's sensible intervention. Perhaps we shall have an answer to his question.

I am happy that the 10-minute rule for speeches during the middle two hours of a debate has been enshrined, but perhaps the House will accept my apology, as Chairman of the Procedure Committee, with six reports before the House, for not containing my remarks within 600 seconds.

I shall try to deal with four of the main parts of the Committee's reports. The part which I consider to be the most important is the allocation of time for the consideration of a Bill in Committee and on the Floor of the House. After all, time is essential for all of us in this place. I hope that this issue will be the main consideration of those who participate in the debate when I resume my seat. Even if other matters are of importance to them, I ask hon. Members to press the Government and the Opposition to accept that the Committee's recommendations have positive merit and deserve at least an experimental period so that their workability, which has been questioned by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, can be assessed properly.

What is the history of the matter? When the Procedure Committee was established at the beginning of the previous Parliament, in March 1984, it was directed by the House to consider the passage of Bills in Committee. After considerable study the Committee reported on a procedure for the formation of a Legislative Business Committee that would assess each Bill. That Committee, if it considered that a Bill would remain in Committee for more than 40 hours, would establish a time structure to be set so that all parts of the Bill would be considered in Committee without the need of a special timetable motion to be debated and passed on the Floor of the House.

That proposal was voted down because it was considered to be too inflexible. That meant that it took a little power away from the business managers and the Whips and, audaciously, gave that power to Back-Bench Members. We now know that that is the definition of inflexibility. When we set out to whittle away the power of the Whips, the walls of Jericho are before us. The trumpets of the Procedure Committee were not strong enough.

Having analysed the vote on the issue, there was a greater turnout of the Establishment—my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, members of the Cabinet, junior Whips and all the Parliamentary Private Secretaries—than on any other three-line Whip of the Parliament. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, for I mislead you. It was a greater turnout of the Establishment than on any other Division because it was a one-line Whip, not a three-line or two-line Whip. To safeguard "flexibility", the payroll marched into the Government Lobby three abreast. Only two members of it were absent. One was quite ill and the wife of the other was presenting him with a child.

The Procedure Committee was not discouraged. If it was, it was for only a moment. It turned the other cheek and tried to overcome the criticisms. It adopted the criteria that are now agreed with the business managers. The four main essentials in considering changes are exactly those which were outlined by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. They are as follows: will they in practice lead to a material improvement; do they leave intact the legitimate rights of the Opposition; can they be implemented without placing unreasonable extra burdens on Back Benchers; do they still permit the Government to get their business?

What is necessary for Bills that are being considered in Committee? A Committee should not waste 100 or 120 hours debating the first three or four clauses of a Bill, thereby proving its virility in its opposition to the measure, until a guillotine motion is forced on the Government. As a procedure, that is nonsense.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: How many examples of that can the hon. Gentleman place before us?

Sir Peter Emery: There are a number of examples. During each Session, between five and seven timetable motions have to be introduced. The result of that procedure means, in many instances, that half or two thirds of the Bills are never discussed in Committee. I cannot give all the statistics to the House in what must be a short speech. I merely say that the facts are set out at the back of the Committee's report. The issue has been analysed quite fully and the conclusion hits the argument that there are not many examples of the first three or four clauses of a Bill being discussed for 100 or 120 hours, for example.

Steps should be taken to try to ensure that every part of a Bill is discussed in Committee. We should not further the madness whereby amendments and clauses are discussed and voted upon hours after midnight after a normal working day. The rest of the world thinks that we are mad, or, even worse, irresponsible, in continuing with this medieval procedure. The House may take these all-night sittings seriously but the country does not, especially when we appear to be acting as prize asses.

What has the Procedure Committee recommended? The recommendation is that, after six sittings of a Bill in Committee, the Business Sub-Committee—which would be similar to that appointed after a timetable motion, but nominated at the time of the selection of the Committee—should consider whether the Bill is proceeding satisfactorily. If it is, which will be the position in nine out of 10 instances, as suggested by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), no action will be taken and the Committee will proceed in the normal way. If the Business Sub-Committee considers that there are problems, it will take only one action at the first instance, but not that inferred by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. It will decide by what date the Bill needs to be reported to the House. The Members and the Whips will then use their brilliant and historic techniques to help bring this about, with the proviso that time is found for every part of the Bill to be debated.

If that procedure has been implemented, the Business Sub-Committee will meet again after 25 hours of debate. If all is proceeding reasonably at that stage, no further action will be taken. If, however, the Bill is bogged down, the Business Sub-Committee will then, and only then, decide exactly what time shall be allocated to each part of the Bill and how that will be structured within the date required for the Bill to be reported to the House. That may require afternoon sittings, evening sittings or even sittings three days a week. However, there should be no sittings after 10 pm or after the rising of the House. In that instance, Opposition Members will know, from their experience of dealing with timetable motions, that when a Business Sub-Committee operates, the Opposition call the shots as to what should or should not be debated within the time scale. We give a specific power to the Opposition to ensure that what they want to have properly debated in Committee, as long as all parts of the Bill are debated, shall be given proper and adequate time.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: That is not so. Once the slots are allocated, any member of the Committee can filibuster or talk at length on one item so that a particular issue in that slot is not reached. That happens frequently under the present guillotine procedure. The hon. Gentleman is saying that the Government want to timetable a Bill from the start. If that is what he is after, that is totally unacceptable to the Opposition.

Sir Peter Emery: I assure the hon. Gentleman that that is the last thing that I am trying to obtain. If what the hon. Gentleman is suggesting occurs, it is within the power of the Business Sub-Committee to allocate much smaller slots than at present. There is a method within the proposal to correct that sort of thing. Having had to deal with Business Sub-Committees, I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's criticism. If his criticism is true, the Business Sub-Committee could allocate the slots to a smaller amount of time to ensure that what he suggests does not happen and that the filibuster is not used.

Two matters are very important. First, there have been no instances that the Clerk of the House can find over the past 30 years where delays caused by the Opposition in Committee have stopped a piece of legislation set out in the Queen's Speech from reaching the statute book. Nor has delay in one Bill stopped other Bills announced in the Queen's Speech from being enacted. The concept of great delays in Committee harassing the Government and stopping legislation is a false shibboleth. The only harm that does is to the sleeping habits of the Back-Bench members of that Committee.

Secondly, if the procedure that I have outlined were adopted, we would save between two and a half and three and a half days a Session on the Floor of the House. That time might be given to private Members' Bills or perhaps it would allow the House to rise a week earlier at the end of a Session. Everyone knows that the present half-day taken for a timetable motion is a complete waste of time. We no longer see it as a great parliamentary occasion. Usually the House has only a smattering of Members. There is no real heat, as there used to be 20 or 30 years ago, and time after time we hear the same speeches of noise and thunder. If ever Macbeth's lines apply outside the original script, they do to guillotine motions:

> "Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, > Signifying nothing."

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is a matter not simply of people's sleeping habits being interrupted, but that the primary job of a Committee, of scrutinising legislation, does not occur? Whole chunks of legislation go through which have never seen the light of day in Committee.

Sir Peter Emery: The hon. Gentleman's intervention came at exactly the right moment in my speech. I was about to say that we should have sensibly staged debates in Committee so that a Bill can be properly and fully considered and not sent off to the Lords half-digested. That would save considerable time on the Floor of the House. We would also not have the filibuster at the start, which is useless.

More time could be saved if the second-look procedure were adopted. Under that procedure, the Government would give undertakings to introduce amendments or reconsider specific points. The Standing Committee could be adjourned after the normal completion of the Bill and asked to sit again within three weeks to take up the points that have been outlined by the Minister. The Minister would return to deal with those points which he considered helpful. That would save those matters having to be dealt with on Report and in certain instances—for example, the Committee stage of the Housing Act 1988—a vast amount of time could be saved for the Report stage and for the House as a whole.

The first report of the Procedure Committee of Session 1986-87 recommended that a parliamentary calendar should be fixed for the dates of sittings. It must be to the benefit of Members to know exactly, more than just a few days ahead, what the schedule of the House is for Christmas and Easter even if the Government require flexibility at the end of the summer. It is no good saying, "Well, one knows approximately." If we want to make plans for constituency tours, overseas visits or to make arrangements with our families, whether the House is returning on 7 January or on any day up to 21 January is of vital importance to our engagements. The Government should be able to announce the dates for rising and returning for the Christmas and Easter recesses at the end of the Queen's Speech, even if they will not accept the full calendar arrangements set out in the report.

The report about televising the proceedings is quite clear, and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has summed it up. It is for television to adapt to ensure that Parliament is properly portrayed and presented to the viewing public. Therefore, no changes to procedure are required at this stage.

There is a great need for consideration of delegated legislation. The report on delegated legislation is detailed and specific and highlights a number of serious problems that are likely to become worse rather than better. More and more we see parliamentary draftsmen and civil servants legislating the principle of the law, but leaving the regulations—the nitty-gritty of the law—to be decided by statutory instrument, which is out of the way in 90 minutes and can be altered the following year and every subsequent year if required. That is not the way that the Procedure Committee believes that the laws of the land should be made.

As 1992 approaches and more EEC regulations come upon us, the Procedure Committee report makes detailed and specific observations. The amount of European legislation that must be considered is much greater than most hon. Members understand. It is imperative that a more effective method for our consideration of that delegated legislation is found. I urge that paragraphs 11 to 38 of the report should have a full debate and not just be shoved away. Those aspects of delegated legislation and the necessary reforms for amendments to delegated legislation require a great deal of thought.

The strong dissatisfaction about the ability of private Members' legislation to be fully considered by the House was more obvious than any other issue raised by hon. Members with the Procedure Committee. That was clear to the previous Procedure Committee and was reinforced to the present Committee. On two Mondays in the late spring, instead of having four half-days for private Members' motions, they should be transferred to two appropriate Fridays. Secondly, the longer full two days should be replaced by an allocation to private Members' Bills. The Government would lose no time and private Members would benefit.

The House should consider whether the hon. Member in charge of the first Bill on that Monday should be allowed the option of moving the suspension of the 10 o'clock rule. Of course, that could be divided against and the hon. Member would have to carry the House. Again, the Government would lose none of their allocation of time if such a motion were carried. However, that would be a way of overcoming the strong feeling that when a Bill received very strong support on Second Reading it should not be blocked by three or four strategically placed amendments on Report on a Friday. It should have the same possibility of consideration as is given to Government legislation. That is not as revolutionary as it sounds because it would apply only to two private Members' Bills each year—those which were first on the two Mondays to which they were allocated.

Mr. Alton: I welcome what the hon. Gentleman has said. Does he agree with the Bow Group's recent recommendation that the House should have the ability to formulate and move a motion to provide extra time for private Members' Bills? If it is the will of the House, after a Bill has had a Second Reading and been considered in Committee and on Report, surely it would not be unreasonable to allow the House of Commons to decide whether it wishes to allocate more time to complete the stages of that Bill.

Sir Peter Emery: I fully understand what the hon. Gentleman says. However, I have to consider the way in which the Government act. The Government act in a very predictable way. That suggestion would mean that some Government time would have to be allocated to private Members' Bills. Our suggestion involves no taking away of Government time. Therefore, it stands a better chance of being accepted by the Government than anything that would cut Government time. Obviously, hon. Members must make their own speeches.

Lastly, I wish to make two small but interesting suggestions. One is that a special or emergency Adjournment debate be allowed by the Speaker on two occasions per week for 20 minutes—a 10-minute speech and a 10-minute reply by a Minister—prior to the normal Adjournment. That would be for specific matters of considerable importance that had arisen. Some hon. Members do not like that suggestion, but it was made by the Committee.

The other suggestion is the possibility of time for private Members' motions on a Friday being split so that one is debated for three hours—rather similar to a Monday half-day—thereby allowing a second motion to be debated for two hours. That, again, would spread the availability of time for private Members.

The House will be aware that much work has been done by the Committee. I do not intend to sum up what I have said, but simply return to the most important points. If Parliament is seriously to be considered as trying to make sense of its procedure, nowhere more than upstairs in Committee is sensible change essential. We must not waste hon. Members' time in parliamentary dog-fighting, even if it is only for 50 or 70 hours—as was suggested by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House—on the first few clauses of a Bill. We must ensure that all parts of a Bill are seriously considered, debated and open to amendment before the Bill leaves the Committee. We must not sit at all hours of the day and night, to the scorn of the well-informed, the disrespect of the media, the satirical comment of the comedian, the contempt of those who wish to see good law reach the statute book, and—perhaps although of little importance—the ultimate despair of our wives. On this matter as much as any other, will the House this evening give clear guidance to the business managers?

8.2 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I cannot speak on this subject without paying a heartfelt tribute to the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), who has worked so zealously as Chairman of the Committee on which I used to serve, undeterred by the shabby way in which the Committee has been treated. He referred to the fact that the payroll vote was wheeled out on a one-line Whip to defeat some major proposals and to the fact that reports have not been debated. Through all that he kept the Committee at work producing more proposals on a wide range of subjects. The House owes him a considerable debt for the work that he has done and continues to do.

I was disappointed by the speech of the Leader of the House. After a couple of hours listening to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee in public session, I thought that I had heard the most complacent of Ministers. It pains me even to imply that the Leader of the House is more complacent than the Chancellor, because I like him rather better than I do the Chancellor. However, he was totally complacent about many aspects of the procedures of the House. That can be attributed either to a lack of radical spirit or to a preference for the fact that at present the Government get their own way very nicely over far too many things.

I shall pick out some of the key points that have emerged from this great pile of reports. First, on Standing Committee procedure, the Committee produced revised proposals, after criticisms of their first proposals, designed to ensure that Bills were properly debated in Standing Committee. It is scandalous that large chunks of Bills go on to the statute book without a word of debate in Committee. The House ought not to tolerate that state of affairs, which arises at least partly because of the determination of hon. Members to demonstrate their total opposition to certain Bills. But that total opposition does not prevent their having views on what the Bills should be like if they are passed, and therefore there is a need for orderly discussion. The Government really must remove the block which, with some help from the Labour Front Bench, they have placed on sensible alternative proposals.

The Bills in the forthcoming legislative Session are enormous. For the first time I have received a Bill which runs to two volumes—the Water Bill is published in two separate volumes. There is a massive task ahead of us, and large chunks of those Bills which effect large numbers of people in Britain will never be debated in the House unless we get our procedures properly sorted out.

The proposal for Special Standing Committees was enacted by the House. It is an ideal procedure for dealing with such measures as licensing laws, Sunday trading and other issues, but it simply is not being used. I endorse the challenge of the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) that the Leader of the House should say now that he is willing to submit some of the Bills in this Session to Special Standing Committees.

The Committee did some excellent work on the statutory instruments procedure. That is an even bigger scandal. Year by year legislation pours out of this place which has not been the subject of any amendment procedure, or in many cases any debate whatsoever. People outside the House have to work with such legislation. I am surprised that the Leader of the House, as a qualified accountant, has not realised what a mess can be made of legislation that is not subject to a proper parliamentary scrutiny system.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments scrutinises those statutory instruments, every one of which passes through our hands? Therefore, there is some scrutiny. Can he persuade the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mrs. Barnes) to turn up more often so that she can take part in that scrutiny?

Mr. Beith: I have not been very successful in persuading the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mrs. Barnes) of late. I did not even persuade her to join my party. However, I did the hon Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments a disservice, because that Committee examines statutory instruments, not for their merits, but for their technical competence, and it does an excellent job. However, on many occasions it draws the attention of the House to failings of statutory instruments which the House does not discuss.

When the hon. Gentlemen earlier expressed some anxiety at the idea that we might remove the block that 20 hon. Members can now place on a statutory instrument going into Standing Committee, they seemed unaware that a successful placing of that block has the effect merely of ensuring that the instrument is never debated. If the 20 hon. Members rise to stop the Bill from going upstairs, there is no obligation whatsoever on the Leader of the House ever to find time for debate on the Floor of the House.

I do not accept the Leader of the House's contention that many prayers are tabled for purposes other than debate. If hon. Members want to express an opinion on something on the Order Paper, they table a substantive motion which says what they think. They do not simply put down, "That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty." That does not convey anything to anyone. It is there because there is a reason to debate an issue.

Prayers for which no time was found are listed in the Committee's report as a percentage of prayers tabled. At one time the figure used to be nil. In 1978-79 it was 28·3 per cent. It has gone up steadily. In 1985-86 it was 69·4 per cent. It is probably more now. Nearly 70 per cent. of prayers were not debated at all. That is 70 per cent. of those statutory instruments on which hon. Members have said there ought to be a debate. It is not good enough to say that there has to be a large number of hon. Members, a whole party, or the official Opposition, seeking a debate. That is not the principle on which we legislate. As long as there is any wish in the House for some procedure to be used, legislation should be subject to a procedure. It is the making of the law of the land.

Mr. Alton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way before he leaves the question of how we go about making legislation. In the same context, does he agree that the Orders in Council procedure that applies to Northern Ireland legislation is totally inadequate because it is unamendable, and therefore leaves the House with no choice other than to vote for or against that legislation at the end of a cursory one and a half hour debate? All that that leads to is a feeling of great annoyance and anger among hon. Members representing Northern Ireland.

Mr. Beith: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I omitted to say that the recommendation that there should be at least a reasoned amendment procedure in Standing Committee is very important, because it enables a Standing Committee to give a signal that something fairly fundamental is wrong which would not lead it to throw out the measure, but which puts pressure on the Government to bring forward some alternative proposals on the Floor of the House.

The Committee made a limited recommendation, which I believe to be helpful, on private Members' legislation. It was defeated by a narrow margin of six votes to five. The proposal was that the House should, in a few limited circumstances, have the power to decide to bring the matter to a conclusion. If a Bill has had a Second Reading, been through its Committee stage and been debated for a considerable time, the House should have the power to bring the matter to a conclusion. Let us take the example of the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) last Session. It brings the House into national disrepute when there has been a national debate on a major issue, the House has debated it at great length, but a decision cannot be reached because the House is incapable of giving itself time to reach a decision.

The Government do not accept any such restraint in their business. They say that they must have their business. All that was proposed was that the House should, in a few limited circumstances, have the power to decide that an important matter should be brought to a conclusion. Last year it was abortion, another year it might be freedom of information and yet another year a measure affecting the disabled. Whatever the Bill, if there has been massive public debate and the House has gone through all the procedures necessary to bring it to Report, it is ludicrous that the House should be incapable of reaching a decision.

The issue of the parliamentary calendar is probably more for the convenience of hon. Members and those who work for the House than for anyone else. It is ludicrous that we cannot predict when the House will rise at Christmas, Easter or summer. Indeed, Opposition Members might think that it would put the Government under usefully greater pressure if they had to work to a calendar. The Committee considered the Canadian example and found Members on both sides of that very divided and contentious House thoroughly happy that such a scheme had been introduced. I have checked since that visit, because there have been quite a few political alarms and excursions in Canada. Although the timetable was not fully operated in two recent years when major issues arose—most recently, the free trade issue—the Members still felt that it was good to have a timetable, even if sometimes they went outside it.

Other issues will arise. I share the Committee's view that it would be premature to make changes designed to suit television. After all, it is only an experiment and it has not yet taken place. I think that, in time, some procedures will appear strange—for example, the leader of the largest Opposition party can ask repeated supplementaries during Prime Minister's questions, but that opportunity is never available to the next largest Opposition party. So great a difference cannot arise because one party is larger in Parliament than the other. In time, I am sure that that will be seen to be an unfair procedure, but we shall see when we have had the television experiment.

The House will have to consider wider issues. We believe that the House does too much—it legislates for Scotland, Wales and the regions of England on matters that should be decided in those areas. The sooner that there is a Parliament in Scotland, for example, dealing with those matters, the better. The Government also do too much. They are an amazingly itchy-fingered Government. They cannot wait to get their fingers into every possible aspect of our lives and then legislate about it. When I first came to the House many Tory Members of Parliament said that, when they were in power, there would not be so much legislation. They said that it was just the Socialists who wanted to interfere all the time. They said that when the Conservative party was in power there would be a lighter legislative timetable—at least, after the first couple of years when they had the main legislation on the statute book. What a fallacy that has turned out to be. There are no fingers itchier than those of Government Ministers, and none more so than the Ministers of this Government. I am not sure that our people are the better for that, as they struggle to live with the laws that we so inadequately scrutinise.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): We should be thankful that, at long last, we are having this debate. It is a serious reflection on the way that we conduct our business that not until the end of 1988 are we considering valuable reports from the Select Committee on Procedure published over a period of three to four years.

I wish to direct my remarks to the second report, published in the 1986-87 Session, on the use of time on the Floor of the House and specifically to its reference to private Members' time. That is a crucial subject for hon. Members on both sides of the House, especially when the issues that they have sought to raise are of grave concern. I refer to matters with which Governments—indeed, all Governments—have felt unable to deal, such as abortion and tampering with the human embryo, both of which are concerned with the very beginnings of human life. If Governments have neither the time nor the moral courage to grapple with momentous issues of that kind, the least we can ask is that action is taken to consider the recommendations of Select Committees which have thought long and hard on the subjects and produced recommendations. Notice must be taken of the intense feeling of many hon. Members about the way in which we conduct business of this kind.

It is incomprehensible to the public how we dilly-dally and fudge important matters. Indeed, it is incomprehensible to them how it is that a private Member's Bill, which commands an overwhelming majority in the House on Second Reading and completes its Committee stage, cannot make any further progress because of deliberate, blatant sabotage by a minority of hon. Members through the use of existing procedure. The matter was brought to a head in 1985—and one or two hon. Members have already reminded the House of this—after a private Member's motion was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden). It followed a blatant abuse of procedure, designed to block Mr. Enoch Powell's Unborn Children (Protection) Bill. Mr. Powell had introduced his Bill in December 1984. It was given a Second Reading on Friday 15 February 1985 by a large majority of 230 to 66, and it was sent to Standing Committee. It successfully completed its Committee stage and returned to the Floor of the House to begin its Report stage on Friday 3 May, when it was the second order of the day.

The first order was a non-controversial Bill on the subject of road traffic documents, which had obtained a Second Reading on the nod and spent only five minutes in Committee. Because of a determined filibuster the debate on Mr. Powell's Bill did not begin until 1 o'clock. Mr. Powell moved the closure at 2.29 pm and a vote was taken on the hostile amendment under discussion, which the supporters of the Bill won by 157 votes to 82. There was then no further time available for the Bill—the saboteurs had achieved their purpose. The Government refused to provide the necessary additional time, so only one option was left to the Bill's supporters, who felt that the will of the House should not be thwarted by a tiny minority.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kemptown drew first place in the private Members' motions ballot and announced that he would introduce a motion to give Mr. Powell's Bill extra time. Opponents of the Bill then accused its supporters of abusing the procedures of the House, ignoring the fact that their own abuse of procedure had caused the original problem. Once more, the will of the House was thwarted when, on 7 June, the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) moved the writ for the Brecon and Radnor by-election and a number of Members presented petitions of a similar nature, one after the other. The private Members' motion debate was adjourned at 2.30 pm after just 15 minutes of debate. That was scandalous, and many hon. Members expected the Select Committee to deal with the matter in a realistic way.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): As a new and inexperienced Member, I must say that many people of all politics and none in my constituency have said that they wonder how we can continue screaming and yelling at each other at Question Time. I have not been approached on any one issue by more people, including those who disagreed with the Life movement and with the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on the issue of abortion. People wonder how the House of Commons can stand by and allow itself to be sat on by a minority of people making a mockery out of its procedures. It is an insult to democracy.

Sir Bernard Braine: My hon. Friend speaks straight from the heart. He is right.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There have been several attacks on the procedures of the House because of the recent Bill on abortion. Will you confirm that throughout the period when that private Member's Bill was pursued in the House the Standing Orders and procedures of the House were followed? There was no abuse of procedure; there was simply a following of procedure. To attack the procedure as being an abuse is, in fact, an implicit attack on whoever is occupying the Chair, including yourself, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I must say on that matter that the procedures were properly carried out. There was no abuse in those terms.

Sir Bernard Braine: If the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) had asked me that question through you, Mr. Speaker, I would have given him exactly the same answer. I am complaining about arrangements which caused consternation outside the House and the kind of reaction to which my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) referred. Not only were people complaining to their Members of Parliament, but most of us who were known to be worried about it were receiving vast numbers of letters, and some right hon. and hon. Members had to face demonstrations in and outside their constituencies. There was intense anger about this issue all over the country. My hon. Friend was absolutely right. We witnessed a skilful use of existing weaknesses in our procedure. This debate is to direct attention to those weaknesses and, if possible, to get them remedied.

The Select Committee made some recommendations which I hope will be accepted by the House, namely, Nos. 22 and 23. The latter is extremely important. I am referring to like petitions, one after another, which are presented to take up the time of the House. The Committee, at paragraph 68, said:

> "The right to petition is undoubted."

That is a reference to the disgraceful episode on 7 June 1985, but it went on to recommend:

> "if presentation of petitions has not been concluded by 10 am on a Friday when private Members' bills are taken any further petitions set down for that day should be presented, as on other days of the week, immediately before the moving of the adjournment for the purpose of bringing the sitting to a conclusion."

If that recommendation were adopted now, there could not be a repetition of what happened in 1985. My complaint is that we are now in 1988 and nothing has been done about behaviour which caused intense anger up and down the country from supporters of all political parties. It is inevitably the only issue upon which the members of the Ulster Unionist party and the Nationalist Opposition in Northern Ireland are completely agreed. It is a matter which brings together hearts and minds across the political divide. It must not be treated in a trivial fashion. It is high time that the House spoke its mind on the subject, which it has not been given the opportunity to do until now.

I would suggest, too, that a private Member whose Bill is first in the debate on a private Members' day should be empowered to move the indefinite suspension of the rule to provide for unlimited debate after 10 pm. It may be argued that, once a proposal of that kind is made, it could lead to all-night sittings, but I do not think so. In the main, the House is composed of reasonable people. The mere threat of a filibuster would soon be removed by the suspension of the 10 o'clock rule. Working on the assumption that each group of amendments would take one and a half hours to debate, it would take a large selection of amendments to force the House to sit all night.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): Are not filibusters which occur on the Floor of the House far more likely to occur in the middle of the night than before 10 o'clock? If there is a suspension of the 10 o'clock rule, it is likely that there will be some very long filibusters by hon. Members who are opposed to the measure that its supporters are trying to advance.

Sir Bernard Braine: Let us make some progress in the matter. Of course, one can raise objections of that kind, but I feel that, once it is seen that the House wishes action to be taken, the message will be received.

Mr. Alton: I entirely agree with what the right hon. Gentleman has been saying. The truth is that there would be votes on closures after one and a half hours, whether it was in the middle of the night or at any other time, and the House could then make progress. Does he agree that it brings us into disrepute when 296 Members can give a Bill a Second Reading, and we can spend 30 hours considering matters in Committee—and we even completed our debate on Report of my own private Member's Bill—but then, in the middle of voting on Report, the clock can strike 2.30 pm and prevent the House from taking any further decision? Does he agree that that makes a mockery of the word "democracy"?

Sir Bernard Braine: Of course, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) is right, and I would advise my dear friend to note that he is a former Chief Whip. I have been here for many years and I have served in Committees all through the night, so I know how the system works. I feel that it is disgraceful for the House to be embroiled, as it has been, by such filibustering within the rules. I believe that, if we made these simple reforms, the message would be delivered. However, there are ways and means of dealing with those who seek to speak right through the night.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I have listened to the Father of the House and I am getting his message very clearly. However, it appears that he is basing his argument on one Bill, because that Bill was controversial. There were many hon. Members in the Chamber on that day, and I believe that Members speak in the House on behalf of their constituents. When they want to get in, they contribute. I contributed for 23 minutes the other night because I believed that it was necessary. So the filibustering, as the right hon. Gentleman suggests, is a load of rubbish.

Sir Bernard Braine: I shall not pursue that. The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes), for whom normally I have considerable affection, is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. Alton rose——

Sir Bernard Braine: No, I shall not give way. Other hon. Members wish to contribute and I wish now to move to my conclusion.

I want to make a subtle suggestion to my right hon. Friend. I believe that my proposal would assist the Government because it would prevent them from being pressurised—often by their Back Benchers—as they have been and as they will be in the future if there is no reform, into finding additional parliamentary time for a particular Bill. It would also enable the Government to remain strictly neutral towards that Bill. I suggest that the matter should be left to the good sense of the House. For example, since 1975 the majority of hon. Members have wanted to see an end to late abortion and also to abortion virtually on demand, which the supporters of the 1967 Act claimed was never their intention to encourage. It is an outrage that a group of hon. Members who sought to amend the law, in keeping with the original intention of Parliament in 1967, should be denied that right by outdated and undemocratic procedures. It is time for good sense and fairness to prevail. It is time for change.

8.29 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Before offering any comments on the procedural reforms before the House, I must express the view that the arrival of television, which is a development that I have opposed and still oppose, will precipitate a whole series of procedural reforms.

The Procedure Committee's reforms that we are examining tonight were all arrived at without any informed consideration of the advent of television, because we were not in a position to do that. A number of the proposed reforms that we have made would have been markedly different if they had been considered in the context of televised proceedings. My view, and I have expressed it in the Procedure Committee, is that, on a number of fronts, we should suspend the amendment of procedure pending the completion of the six-month trial period—if that ever takes place. I hope that it will not.

Our second report of 1985-86 dealt with the allocation of time. I believe that timetabling is correct. From a former position of supporting delay in Committee as a tactic—probably, in truth, it was no more than an inability to budget my own time effectively following my first election to the House—I have moved to a position of outright opposition to the tactic. It is a meaningless and senseless exercise. It is a delusion because, in practice, the Whips have complete control of the timetable. We never create a major obstruction to the Government's programme by using such tactics. Over the years I have sat on many Standing Committees and I have never seen a Bill delayed beyond the date set by the Government. Furthermore, few outside even know what is happening, apart from the lobbies, union observers and too-easily-impressed party activists who are duped into believing that some importance is attached to the exercise.

It is important to retain the right to delay on Report. The loss of a day on Report, or even an overnight debate, is invariably well reported. It is an indication of effective opposition, whether it be a Government rebellion or an Opposition attack. It shows Parliament at its best.

Since the Select Committee last examined the question of shorter speeches, the House has resolved to allow access to television. There can be no doubt that this development will result in demands from Back Benchers for television exposure. For a start, regional coverage of activities on the Floor will turn out to be far more important than national coverage, certainly for the mere mortals amongst us. There will be a marked shift in the weighting of speeches from national to local concerns. The incidence of national coverage for the average Back Bencher will be minimal, whereas regional coverage will become extensive, if only because it offers cheap television for the new franchises under the financial pressure in the new round.

Hon. Members will be in search of a slot, and that can only mean far greater numbers of Members in search of Floor time, and therefore heavy lists for the Speaker to consider. Pressure for shorter speeches is inevitable, and the arrangements approved on 27 February 1986 will be seen as minimal concessions.

The extension of the restriction on Second Readings to full Opposition day debate and full day debates on Government motions has been the subject of an order for the past two Sessions. The Select Committee has proposed the adoption of a permament Standing Order, but I do not believe that that recommendation goes far enough.

There is no reason why nearly all speeches should not be subject to the 10-minute restriction, apart from those by party spokesmen or those by Members moving motions, amendments or new clauses. Such a restriction could endure for most of the parliamentary day from the commencement of public business to the commencement of the Adjournment debate. Such a restriction could be perceived by some as unreasonable and burdensome. However, we should recall that the Speaker would have discretion and, on the desired proportion of our business that was not the subject of pressure, he or she could exercise that discretion.

The only area of difficulty is the Report stage of a Bill. I believe that such business should be exempt from procedural restriction. The Report stage could be the subject of self-regulation prompted by the Whips, who, under conditions of televising, will acquire substantial new influence over events.

Paragraph 5 of the Committee's third report of 1985-86 entered some interesting observations on the value of interventions and the use of prepared speeches. Prepared speeches in the form of written statements, such as the one that I am giving tonight, which are read into the record will make for poor television. I am sure that that will mean changes for many hon. Members.

Interventions are much more of a problem, because they are often crucial to effective debate. I have thought long and hard on this matter and have concluded that, if we do have a 10-minute limit, speakers should not be penalised because of interventions. They should be awarded additional time, perhaps as much as a minute or two. At this stage this proposition may seem a bit sloppy, but I can only reiterate the view that if television comes in it will transform the Chamber and the nature of debate.

I also agree with the recommendation to wind up business in Committee at 10 pm, for the reasons outlined.

The other principal recommendation, which provides for the use of a Business Sub-Committe to fix a "fair terminal date", is extremely complicated. I am not sure that it would work in practice. The proposition appears to provide for a series of negotiated and renegotiated target "terminal dates" for proceedings in Standing Committee. I believe that the terminal date timetabling of Bills, under an alternative option that I am proposing, could be negotiated at Chief Whip level—dependent on arrangements—and, if necessary, occasionally with official Opposition and Government spokesmen in attendance.

The agreement could then be referred to the Business Sub-Committee as proposed in the report for the timetabling of clauses. The cynic, indeed the realist, may argue that the effect of giving the Business Sub-Committee overall control of the "terminal date" would still, under my system, leave the Whips in charge of negotiations and recommendations to Committee. If that is the case, why go through the motions of the Select Committee's recommendations?

On a number of occasions I have referred to the rights of Privy Councillors. Our third report of 1985-86 on shorter speeches failed to tackle the question of the rights of Privy Councillors. According to my informants who were on the Committee at that time, the matter was not even raised during the deliberations.

Sir Bernard Braine: It was.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Forgive me if I am wrong.

Nevertheless, consideration of this matter is an important issue in the light of televising the House. Some of us refuse to accept that Members without portfolios who are Privy Councillors have any greater right to be called in debate than others who equally lack portfolios. I doubt that they have the right even to be called earlier.

With the advent of television, this matter will acquire a new importance. Some of us, certainly I for one, will set about restructuring that privilege. We shall use procedure to secure its removal. I believe that the ending of the privilege will come through an initiative in the Procedure Committee in response to pressure on the Floor of the House. This matter should equally surface as an item on the agenda to be considered by the Select Committee on Televising of Proceedings of the House, as it relates to fair play in the allocation of time and opportunities to Members. If my nomination to the Select Committee on Televising of Proceedings of the House had not been blocked, I should have dealt with that matter.

My soundings among Conservatives do not suggest any great support for this form of Member advantage and privilege. In fact, a number of Conservatives have privately expressed to me their concern about the possible abuse of Privy Councillor privilege on their Benches. One Conservative Back Bencher referred to a Privy Council hoard on his Benches, comprised of people who are not the Prime Minister's most impassioned admirers.

Some of my cynical hon. Friends might say, "Leave it to them." That has never been my view. The whingeing right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) has never done a blind bit of good for the Labour party. On the contrary, he has only served to convince liberal Tories that they still have a voice at Westminster. Certainly such dissidents grab the headlines and make it more difficult for the Opposition to be seen to be spearheading opposition. I conclude with the view that Privy Councillors will fight hard to defend the indefensible, but they must be beaten.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): It seems wrong that there is no equality among right hon. and hon. Members. Being a very junior Member I have less chance of speaking on behalf of my constituents, even though they are clearly as important as those of a Privy Councillor.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: We are all born equal and should all be treated as equals in this Chamber. The problem is that we are not, and I do not blame you, Mr. Speaker, for that—it is precedent.

I turn to public Bill procedure. Apart from the question of timetabling, there is in the second report of 1984-85 a number of recommendations awaiting debate. Among them is one for reconvening Standing Committees to dispense of undertakings given by Ministers—to which reference was made by our Chairman, and I may say that he has been a very good Chairman—and for the approval of consequential and drafting amendments. It was felt that the recommendation for reconvening Standing Committees would reduce the amount of business to be dealt with on Report.

No doubt there are times when such an arrangement would be helpful, but at others it could be positively unhelpful to the House, which, wishing to debate highly important and contentious legislation, might find that Mr. Speaker's selection of amendments denied debates on issues that the Government had carefully manoeuvred into Committee and possibly away from the cameras.

I come now to the parliamentary calendar. I have few words to express on the subject, having been elected to the Select Committee on Procedure after its consideration. I admit to prejudice against the Canadian precedent that the Committee examined. The position in respect of the Scots must be mentioned. It is untenable, and the recommendation in paragraph 3 of the first report 1986-87 that the House should rise not later than 21 July would be a useful and much needed procedural reform. However, not even that would fully deal with the problems of Scottish Members. The timing of party conferences precludes the earlier resumption of hostilities at the end of the summer recess, but that need not be the case. We have the opportunity to reform, and paragraphs 8, 9 and 10 of the report argue the case very persuasively.

As to use of time on the Floor of the House, the report makes reference to private Members' Bills procedure and the availability of time to right hon. and hon. Members wishing to raise matters of a topical nature. The House will not need much prompting to recognise my objectives. Although it may be said that there are times when a Labour-sponsored private Member's Bill could benefit from the prolonged debate that our proposals recommend, the present position is outrageous—although I fully understand that the beneficiaries of such a procedural warp may feel pleased with the current arrangements. However, in all natural justice they are defending the indefensible.

The argument surfaced in the Committee in all its dishonesty. It had more to do with the arguments about abortion and the embryo than about parliamentary procedure. Those right hon. and hon. Members who sat on the Committee know what I am talking about. It does not augur well for objective discussion of Back-Bench power. When that matter is finally debated on the Floor of the House, I suspect that matters will take a similar turn. It will be interesting to know the position taken by the Leader of the House. Will he propose a reasonable and just approach, defending the rights of Back Benchers in the finest traditions of the House of Commons, or will he oppose our recommendations for tactical reasons? On the last occasion, he always seemed to bring, bear or carry the will of the Prime Minister on these matters to the House of Commons. I am not convinced that he is utterly objective. I know that he will object to my comments, but that remains my view, and I am sure that I am correct.

I understand my own party's difficulty, but hope that the shadow Cabinet will resolve not to oppose but to ignore the recommendation in question and will remain neutral—if it is necessary for the shadow Cabinet to take a decision. Such an approach may not be in the finest traditions, but we should beware of spurious opposition. As the Committee points out in paragraph 61, the Government's progress with Bills is not terminated by Big Ben at 10 o'clock; they simply table a motion to suspend the 10 o'clock rule. No matter what the strength of opposition, the Government are likely to clear the Report stage without much difficulty.

A switch from Friday to Monday for private Members' Bills could possibly secure for them an additional one and a half hours' debate or more. The four half days otherwise given over to private Members' Bills under present arrangements would be consolidated into two full Friday debates. It will be seen from the report that discussion took place on the right of a right hon. or hon. Member to move a business motion at 2.30 pm, providing for additional time after 10 o'clock on private Members' Bills on Mondays. That would transform the chance of a Bill clearing the hurdle of the Report stage. It would mean all-night debates on two private Members' Bills if there had been resistance to their passage, but if there are heated arguments on private Members' Bills, why should the House not sit all night on Monday? If that is the time that it takes to debate contentious legislation, and if it occurs only once or twice a year, we should be willing to afford that time. I say to my right hon. and hon. Friends that we are willing to turn up if we can debate a Report stage overnight and attempt to delay the introduction of legislation and bust the 2.30 pm timetable for the following day. If the motivation exists to do that, it should equally exist to allow proper debate of contentious issues.

Sir Peter Emery: Will the hon. Gentleman make it clear that, in order to do that, a right hon. or hon. Member must still carry his motion with majority support in a Division? It is not a simple matter, but, in fairness, a right hon. or hon. Member must have the support of the House for such a motion.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I shall omit another point that I had wished to raise and turn to the matter of prime time and debating opportunities, which is also dealt with in the second report of 1986-87.

Televising the House has wide implications for prime time. The organisation of Back Benchers on theme issues will require the development of considerable expertise in the Whips' Office. I feel sure that it will respond positively. The Opposition's Whips' Office will certainly do so, just as I expect that of the Government will. I understand that the Select Committee on Televising of Proceedings of the House visited Canada to see for itself the one-minute speech procedure. I am led to believe that it is appalling and trivialises issues. However, there is a need for a slot to privide an opportunity for important and topical issues to be raised briefly. The use of the Standing Order No. 20 procedure is an indication of the demand, and that is recognised in the report.

The problem is that the report has produced an ineffective compromise. It provides for two additional Adjournment debates each week, but at what cost? I foresee the loss of private notice questions and of statements in prime time in favour of mini-Adjournment debates answered by Ministers in low-profile time after 10 o'clock, and without the right to question the Minister. The danger is to be found where the recommendation refers to "topical concern" and dissatisfaction with replies, enabling "notice" to be given "for the following day". I alert my colleagues to the danger inherent in that new procedure, which could prove disastrous for Back Benchers. My inclination is to oppose it, although I shall listen with interest to any counter arguments.

The House wil note that I entered a caveat in the form of an amendment to the report. Again, I failed. Some hon. Members not of my political view may have seen advantage. Also among the amendments tabled was my counter proposition, which extracted no support. My amendment did not provide for a ministerial response. I argued that in granting a five-minute Adjournment debate Mr. Speaker could by practice call a Conservative Back Bencher last in the debate. He or she would act as a sweep.

That approach might be novel, but it would certainly have a marked effect on late-night debates, helping to keep the Government on their mettle and fully accountable. It would provide an excellent opportunity for regional television, in an odd way helping to reassert the national context in which the House debates in ordinary time by providing a regional slot, but it would also prevent Ministers from going to the Dispatch Box on what would in effect be 24 or 48-hour notice debates. I believe that you, Mr. Speaker, would find pressure being exerted on you not to grant PNQs, but to ensure that they fell within the mini-Adjournment debates.

I have spoken for 19 minutes. Perhaps I have overshot my time, but I should have liked to talk about a number of other matters. I hope that no precipitate action will be taken, and that no procedural reforms will be introduced in the coming months before the television cameras come in. If television is allowed in, it will transform this place. We shall oppose it, but if introduced it might mean very different reforms.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): More than three and a half years after the Select Committee on Procedure produced its report "Public Bill Procedure", we are not debating motions to implement any part of it. Once again we are debating on a motion to adjourn; sometimes it is a motion to take note. Three weeks ago, our report was not even available when I tried to obtain a copy. I see that it has been hastily reproduced in almost legible condition by some process other than printing, presumably for this debate, but that is an indication of how much time has already passed since its production.

Some years ago, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Accountant of the House who authorised the expenditure of Select Committees taking evidence outside Westminster but within the United Kingdom. As he could not give me the answer, the matter went to your predecessor, Mr. Speaker Thomas. He and the Accountant had to fall back on a "take note" motion—not a motion to approve—concerning a Procedure Committee report of many years ago. That is the state to which our proceedings have deteriorated. It is lamentable that, even after such a lapse of time, there should be no proposals on which the House can make a decision.

Much emotional energy has been expended on private Bill procedure. I think that an aspect of the fate of the Abortion (Amendment) Bill has a lesson for us. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who was strongly in favour of the Bill, said that it received a large majority on Second Reading. So it did, but not in the form in which it went on Report. You, Mr. Speaker, were put in an impossible position. The Standing Committee had inserted a provision which, had it been in the Bill on Second Reading, might have prevented it from receiving a Second Reading. Under that provision, if a woman had been impregnated in the course of a rape, she could nevertheless be denied an abortion.

I understand the position in which you found yourself, Mr. Speaker. If you had given the House the opportunity to debate a provision that many regarded as iniquitous, it would have meant selecting another amendment. You would then have been accused in certain quarters of killing the Bill by selecting too many amendments. On the other hand, not to debate that provision—to which the House had never agreed on Second Reading—meant that time was running out without any possibility of debating a crucial provision. The sponsors and supporters of the Bill never referred to that when they appeared on television saying how abusive were the proceedings of the House. The promoters of private Members' Bills need to adopt a discipline: all the major ingredients should be in a Bill when it is presented for its Second Reading. Such tricks should not be played on the House.

The composition of the Standing Committee reflects the vote on Second Reading. A favourable Committee can be obtained if provisions on which a majority would not be obtained are not put in before the Committee stage. The House is then denied the opportunity of debating a major provision on the last possible occasion before Third Reading. In such circumstances, among those who are put in an impossible position is the occupant of the Chair.

Sir Bernard Braine rose——

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I shall not give way to the Father of the House. Too much time—and time is running out —has been spent in discussing the Abortion (Amendment) Bill, although it was necessary for me to allude to it because it illuminates an aspect of private Bill procedure.

Sir Bernard Braine: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I shall give way when I reach the moment to do so, which has not yet arrived.

The Abortion (Amendment) Bill illuminates the obligations that must repose with those who put forward private Members' Bills within whatever constraints of time apply—and there will always be constraints. I shall now give way to the Father of the House.

Sir Bernard Braine: My hon. Friend must not mislead the House. He made a perfectly sound point in his general observations about a different Bill coming to the House at a later stage, but he was wrong in this instance. The Bill's sponsors had decided to take note of speeches made on Second Reading which asked for the Bill to be amended. The amendments were moved by sponsors of the Bill, the aim being to bring back to the House a Bill that had taken account of views expressed on Second Reading. To that extent, the Bill might be regarded as having been improved; it was certainly more sensitive to the feelings of the House. It is wrong to suggest that Mr. Speaker was put in an impossible position. Mr. Speaker presides over a legislative process that allows for amendment.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: If new provisions of a highly contentious nature are inserted into a private Members' Bill in Committee, the sponsors must be naive beyond all possibility if they do not realise that they are going to present the Chair on Report with an impossible dilemma —a dilemma of their making.

I now leave private Members' Bill procedure because I am concerned about the three-and-a-half-year-old report on public Bill procedure that we can just read in its present form. We suggested that there should be more use of Special Standing Committees. That is because the House often legislates on technical matters, with its mind unclouded by knowledge. That is why the Procedure Committee recommended the introduction of that procedure in the first place.

It is one thing to have the procedure—extant as a possibility in Standing Orders—but it does not do anybody very much good if the Government do not make use of the procedure that is extant in Standing Orders. My plea is that it should be more used. I believe that the time spent in Standing Committee on a Bill would then be more tightly focused and more productive, as it would produce good legislation that did not have unintended consequences.

One of the objectives of a Standing Committee on a Bill is to ensure that the Bill achieves the consequences that were intended and does not have consequences that were unintended. One of the virtues of the Special Standing Committee procedure is that those who are more familiar with the subject matter that will be affected by the legislation can give the benefit of their advice, not expressed in party political terms, to the House as a whole. That will also be of benefit in Committee and on Report.

I turn to a much more recent report—only a year and a half old—entitled "Use of Time on the Floor of the House". There is an old adage that nature abhors a vacuum; but nature also gives way to pressure that it cannot sustain. Unless we make more provision for dealing with urgently contentious matters, there will be abuse of the points of order procedure. We know that there has been such abuse. The Procedure Committee's objective would be not to pretend that that abuse would go away, but to see how it could reasonably be accommodated without imposing on the House and those who serve it in so many capacities an even greater and unreasonable prolongation of our sittings.

Our proposal in paragraph 76—that twice a week there should be a short emergency debate chosen by you, Mr. Speaker—was a reasonable attempt to give to the House an alternative to spurious points of order. To those who would reject it, I am bound to say, "What would you put in its place, other than abusing the rules of order?" The pressure is there for all to see and hear. If your Committee's very modest recommendation is to be rejected, Mr. Speaker, it must, in my view, only fairly be rejected in favour of a better alternative, not in favour of nothing whatever.

Reference has already been made to a number of other aspects, but other hon. Members want to speak in the debate, which is already two thirds gone. Therefore, I must ask my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, whose interest in procedure I know to be authentic, to give us time to take decisions about procedural matters, rather than just to debate them either on a take-note basis or in Adjournment debates. At the end of the day, however, I have this baleful message for him. However often the Select Committee on Procedure sits to try to find ways by means of which the House does not sit at ridiculous hours, when it cannot perform its task appropriately or efficiently, and however many reports it produces, we shall be swamped by legislation unless there is discipline over the introduction of legislation. That, I am afraid, follows, and it is something that only the Cabinet can remedy. It is not within the control of Back-Bench Members of the House.

I used the word "legislation" because about 15 years ago I introduced a Bill, the Amendment of Statutory Instruments Bill. Each year I have weighed on the kitchen scales the bound volumes of Acts of Parliament of the last Session and the bound volumes of statutory instruments. The latter got remorselessly heavier as compared to the former, as well as in absolute terms. The proportion of our legislation which the House is powerless to alter increases each year. Nothing will convince me that it is not the least skilful parliamentary draftsmen who are put on to drafting secondary legislation, because they know that their Minister will not have to defend it against amendments in Committee. Naturally, the more skilled ones are put on to drafting Bills, and the less skilled on to statutory instruments. The absolute bottom of the bucket are put on to drafting legislation subject to the negative resolution procedure, which will probably never come before the House at all for shortage of time.

The House will not have done its task, however hard its Select Committee works, until it grasps the nettle of having a process for amending statutory instruments. Therefore, our first tentative step towards that is recommending a reasoned amendment to be within the power of the appropriate Statutory Instrument Committee. It is a tiny step and a halting one, but for heaven's sake, let us take it.

9.6 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I agree with the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) about the desirability of the House being able to amend statutory instruments. That would be very helpful when we are trying to redress power.

I pay tribute to the work of the Procedure Committee, but it is sometimes too concerned with formal procedures and has not paid enough attention to the informal procedures which run parallel to the formal ones. Members of the Committee have illustrated that tonight by complaining that there has been no opportunity to debate their reports in the House.

Members of the Procedure Committee, almost all of whom are here, with a small number of others, must understand that, if we are to amend the House's procedures, we have to ensure that all 650 Members are involved. Although at least one of the Select Committee's reports is out of print and difficult to get hold of, my impression is that most hon. Members have not looked at its reports. Speaking to a cross-section of hon. Members this week to find out what was to be debated tonight and their views on the subject did not lead to enlightenment for me.

The first problem for the Procedure Committee is to ensure that its reports are fully debated in the informal atmosphere in the House before there is a formal debate. I fear that, with many of its proposals, it has not overcome that first hurdle and got a majority of hon. Members to consider what it proposes.

I am a little worried about the parliamentary calendar. An informal calendar already exists, but the problem will not be solved by making it formal. The problem is that the calendar is wrong. If we make the informal calendar formal, we will solve nothing. We will merely give the Opposition an opportunity to say, "We fought very hard and we have wrecked the calendar again this year." That is not much use. The fundamental thing to which the report draws attention is the view that the House should not sit in July.

We ought to recognise, particularly as the average age of hon. Members has got younger, that hon. Members ought to have the right to go away on holiday with their families in July and not have to take their children away from school. The problem is especially acute in Scotland. It is not a matter of a formal or informal calendar, but of the House having the will to reorganise its time so that it does not sit in that part of July.

I now turn to the question whether we should timetable Bills from the start. Let us be clear that, at present, the right to timetable Bills rests with the Opposition when the Bill starts off. In my experience, the Opposition make a good attempt to timetable the Bill effectively. Although it has been argued that some long Bills have gone through the House with discussion on only the first one or two clauses, I believe that, on the whole, those are exceptions. If one looks at the political content of such a Bill, one realises that most of the political issues can be debated on the early clauses. The majority of Bills that go through the House—having been timetabled in effect by the Opposition—go through with reasonable scrutiny, considering the difficulties.

If we chose to have early timetabling for Bills, a series of abuses might arise. I have served on a large number of Committees and I have found amendment races particularly obnoxious. It is important that we should debate amendments at the right place in the Bill. If one has a timetable for amendments, there is a race to table the first amendment. If one tables an amendment to clause 27, for example, and the amendment says, "Insert at the beginning of the clause 'subject to subsection (1)(a)'", someone else will try to table an amendment that will be debated even earlier and that does not lead to orderly debate.

It would be a retrograde step for the House if, as a matter of principle, responsibility for timetabling Bills was handed over from the Opposition to, in effect, the Government. If a Committee which had a majority of Government Members was appointed to timetable Bills, that is what we would be doing. If the Procedure Committee was suggesting that the responsibility should be handed over to a Committee composed of a majority of Opposition Members, I would not complain, but I am sure that Ministers would not be happy with that. I should not be happy about giving the Government more power over timetabling.

I shall now deal with the Committee's report on early-day motions. It seems that the House has not been well served by some of the trivial early-day motions that have appeared on the Order Paper, but the main point is that early-day motions are a public way of reflecting the informal activities of the House. It is not easy to tell constituents that one has had a word with the Minister and pressed the point: it does not sound convincing. Putting one's name on an early-day motion is a simple process, but it is a way of giving some form to the series of informal processes that go on in the House. We often talk about the Division Lobbies, the Members' Lobby and Central Lobby, but we should realise that much of the process of Parliament is the informal lobbying that goes on. Early-day motions offer an opportunity for a formal way of dealing with that informal activity. That is not too high a price to pay.

It was suggested earlier that hon. Members who are suspended should suffer a longer period of suspension than that which is normally imposed. We should be careful about that, because, if suspensions were longer, we should be using the majority in the House to censure individual Members. Hon. Members should be accountable to their constituents and not too firmly accountable to the majority in the House. If suspensions were longer, they would be far more controversial and would cause more problems.

I ask the Leader of the House to use the Special Standing Committee procedure more frequently. I suggest that the forthcoming legislation on children would be a good opportunity to use that procedure.

I welcome the opportunity to amend statutory instruments. At present, we are too often prepared to put into primary legislation the power for the Secretary of State to do things by order and by regulation. If the House were less willing to give Ministers that power in the first place, fewer problems would develop.

Finally, I should like the Leader of the House to think about the problems that occur with statements, especially if our proceedings are to be televised. It is not a satisfactory procedure for embargoed copies of White Papers and other documents to be given out to the lobby and to other newspaper correspondents, sometimes 24 hours beforehand and often on the morning of the day on which the statement is to be made, and then for Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen and minority parties to receive the same statements and documents perhaps just half an hour or an hour before the statement is made, but no other Members being able even to get hold of a copy until after the statement has been made.

If it is reasonable for journalists to be sufficiently briefed on matters so that they can write about them for the following morning's newspapers, it is reasonable that hon. Members should have the same opportunity to read the documents and ask questions about them. There is the procedure of the statement being given in the House, but there is often a wait of several weeks or months—sometimes even years—before there is a further opportunity to discuss those matters. It should be possible for hon. Members to receive such documents on at least the same terms as journalists.

There should be far more debate about most of the proceedings of the Select Committee on Procedure. Such debate should occur in an informal atmosphere first, and once there is a clear majority in the House for change, we should proceed with the legislation. We should not bemoan the fact that such things are not debated on the Floor of the House. What we should bemoan is the fact that the Procedure Committee has not convinced sufficient hon. Members to take an interest in its reports for there to be a full and frank informal debate before we get to the stage at which we should vote.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I have been busy this evening, which is why I missed the first part of the debate. I have been trying to win Weybridge for the Labour party, which is why I wrote to you. Could you appeal to hon. Members to make their contributions brief so that I can get in?

Mr. Speaker: I was about to rise to my feet when the hon. Gentleman gazumped me to say that I understand that the shadow Leader of the House will seek to catch my eye at about a quarter to 10. Quite a number of hon. Members have not yet spoken—some of whom served on the Committee—but I think it is quite important in such a debate that Members who did not serve on the Committee are also called to speak so that we may have their views as well.

9.17 pm

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): I hope that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) will forgive me if I do not follow too closely the specific points that he made. This is one of our more interesting debates, in which the currents of controversy move not across the Floor of the House like forked lightning, but up and down the Benches on either side rather like sheet lightning. The balance of opinion is sometimes rather interesting, if much more difficult to predict than usual. I shall resist the temptation to enter into the important, but in some ways private, fight that the Father of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir. B. Braine), has reinstated this evening.

However, I shall permit myself one reflection on the important procedural point that has been discussed in considerable depth. If the exploitation of procedure within the rules of order—it must always be within the rules of order because that is a fundamental premise—to oppose legitimate proposals, whether in the form of legislation or otherwise, is to be ruled out, we face a difficult problem. Naturally, like so many other hon. Members of all parties, I dislike such exploitation whenever it occurs. Furthermore, the public do not understand it and I do not think that they will ever. We must be extremely careful before we tighten the straitjacket of procedure on this House so severely that the patient—in this case Parliament —is suffocated. Having said that, I realise that to some extent I am undermining my own case on a number of the other points that I hope to make as briefly as I can.

I am sure that the whole House is grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) for his report—indeed, for all his serious reports. I have read most of them this afternoon and find myself in considerable agreement with a large proportion of their recommendations.

I share the regret of my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) that we are not debating specific proposals placed before the House for decision. As is so often the case, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House showed his usual courtesy and consideration and raised a fundamental point about procedure—the behaviour of hon. Members. My perspective is nowhere near as long as that of the Leader of the House or as long as that of many other hon. Members, but perhaps it is a little longer than the perspective of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

A long perspective does not necessarily confer authority, except in your case, Mr. Speaker, because you sit in the House for thousands of hours a year. Perhaps you spend more time in it than any other hon. Member, and therefore your perspective gives you special authority. Within the last few years the standard of behaviour in the House has declined. There has been a decline in courtesy, in good manners and, perhaps, a decline in that rarest of all commodities in this Chamber, wit.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Sir Ian Lloyd: The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is an exemplar of wit.

Mr. Banks: I have with me a book by Sir Alexander Mackintosh entitled, "Echoes of Big Ben." It says:

> "I trembled for the fame and fate of Parliament as I witnessed the extremely violent, disgraceful scene, in July, 1893, of hon. Members hitting each other."

The hon. Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) has been in the House for a long time. Can he tell us when hon. Members last hit each other? That certainly puts into perspective the rather eccentric behaviour of my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) who left the House earlier today describing hon. Members as disciples of Onan and making strange gestures to Mr. Speaker.

Sir Ian Lloyd: Hon. Members hitting each other is not within my experience, and I hope that it will never be. It is always a little dangerous to quote from a decade in which, I think, Irish Members came here in an attempt to destroy Parliament. Fortunately for all of us, they failed. I will not go as far as to say that such an objective underlay the behaviour that we have seen, but Parliament serves no purpose whatever if none of us modifies our views or assumptions. Surely we come to the House to listen and to enlarge our experience and knowledge and, occasionally, to modify our assumptions and opinions. We cannot do that if we can never hear what anyone is saying.

I shall describe two phenomena which I am sure are familiar to all hon. Members. The House contains what I call the "What about" mob. That mob consists of hon. Members who say, "What about the IMF? What about inflation? What about unemployment, nurses and miners?" Such interventions are not worthy of a soap box debate in Hyde park and are singularly unworthy of the House. Surely we can bring to our debates qualities and standards better than, "What about?" Such behaviour denigrates and destroys what we are trying to do.

The other phenomenon is the finger-pointing mafia. Some hon. Members seem to think that their intellectual arguments are enhanced by stabbing their fingers at Front-Bench spokesmen. That is bad mannered and does not add to the point or force of the argument. The less we see of it the better and the more Parliament will be pleased. When television arrives in due course the public will not want to see such behaviour because they would not like it at all.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Gentlemen is complaining about mafia-like people pointing their fingers at the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. When I stand up with my hands in my pockets it is more than likely that one of the Tory yobbos from the goose-stepping tendency will tell me to take my hands out of my pockets. I am in a bit of a dilemma about what to do. If I were concerned about behaviour in this place, I would not be concerned about people making a point on behalf of their class. I would be concerned about those who come trotting in here half drunk or half sober, whatever the case may be, coming out of the 16 bars, or trotting off on business trips to South Africa, paid for by the Botha Government. I regard that as much more important than somebody who has his hands in his pockets or who is poking a finger at others when he speaks.

Sir Ian Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand my point. I sympathise with him if he is being shouted at by Members who tell him to take his hands out of his pockets, but I am not concerned about people who come here half sober or half drunk. I am much more concerned about people who come here half-witted.

The report on the calendar is interesting. It tells us that it is now over 10 years since the House had two weeks' recess at Easter or Whitsun, and the proposal that it makes for setting the calendar recommends that we should have a least one week at Easter and one week at Whitsun. I disagree with the Committee on that point. It is time that we became somewhat more generous to ourselves, particularly at Whitsun. I do not know what the opinion of the House is on that question, but I should happily trade 10 days in October for five additional days at Whitsun, and I sense that that finds some support in the House.

The real difficulty is this. We shall find more time—time lies at the heart of Parliament and much that we do here —if we spend a little more effort in trying to stop the waste of it. Parliamentary time, like energy, is something which is best found by conserving it. For example, I regard the second Division last night as a conspicuous example of the waste of 20 minutes of parliamentary time. It proved nothing to anyone and by the most simple procedural device, every point could have been satisfied. You, Mr. Speaker, could have asked the Liberals whether they would be willing to record their 20 votes against the majority. All that would have been needed would have been a yes, the Division would have been recorded and the great British public would have been none the wiser, or all the wiser. There would have been no fundamental difference to what we were doing.

Other points, which I wish to make as quickly as possible, also concern time. In the report on the use of time on the Floor of the House, the key conclusion is that in paragraph 2, which states:

> "Compared with legislative bodies in other large democracies, the House of Commons continues to sit on more days per annum than any others."

That prompts the immediate query: Are we, as a country, for that reason better governed than the other large democracies? Different sides of the House will have different opinions in answer to that question. The report concludes:

> "there needs to be the greatest possible efficiency in the use of the available time."

I wholeheartedly agree with that.

What are the facts? We waste time on a prodigious scale, and no more seriously than in four particular ways. The first, which has already been mentioned, is bogus points of order. We can do with far fewer of them and if, by other means, we can give hon. Members legitimate opportunities to raise legitimate points, we should do so and encourage them to do it in other ways.

Secondly, there is the tedious introduction of largely, or often, irrelevant parochial aspects and illustrations in hon. Members' speeches. We are all guilty of that. It seldom adds much to the debate or to the quality of the argument. We could all impose a greater self-discipline there.

Thirdly, there is the tedious repetition of arguments. Theoretically, this is against the rules of order, but it is seldom that anyone is pulled up for tedious repetition We are all guilty of it and we should all do it less frequently. We are all guilty of introducing, ad nauseam, fallacies and assumptions that cannot be sustained.

Fourthly, there is the question of voting. Here lies the greatest possible scope. We do not practise what I believe is widely practised now in all other managerial systems outside and possibly even inside politics. That is known as management by exception. The vote that matters is that which is decided by the electorate once every four to five years. That is the vote that makes the greatest impact on the nation and its affairs. Very occasionally, and particularly if the balance between the governing party and the Opposition is small, a vote is challenged or altered by a profound disagreement within the Government or the Opposition. Occasionally, there is such a thing as a procedural ambush. That is increasingly rare, especially when the Government have a substantial majority. It can be challenged by accidental absence, for example, by a significant number of Members being delayed on a plane from Scotland to London.

However, in my humble judgment, the nation is not interested in those changes, except when Governments are threatened or defeated; that is when the parliamentary balance no longer reflects the general election ballot. Those are the divisions in which the nation is really interested. If we alter our procedures in such a way as to give the nation what it wants, which is a full and proper report on those occasions, we can save ourselves an enormous amount of time on many of the other Divisions that take place here. By and large, the media are uninterested in whether our majority is 150, 100 or 50. The evidence of this is that those Divisions are seldom reported, apart from the particular examples that I have mentioned.

We have no management by exception when we should have such management. We assume a Government majority, but we could allow far more efficient procedures to reveal variations rather than reassert meaningless totals. There are many ways of achieving that and I shall simply mention two of them. First, there are the non-electronic methods. There is no need, for example, on a second Division late at night to troop through the Division Lobbies. I believe that your discretion, Mr. Speaker, and direction to record the vote of minor parties would have achieved every objective except that of wasting time.

Where there are several Divisions and we are bound to record identical votes, we can easily amalgamate them, without prejudice to anyone, least of all the Opposition. That applies to amendments, substantive motions and Third Readings where there may be three votes one after another. We all know that, plus or minus two or three votes, the identical Division will be recorded, and that we will have wasted 50 minutes of the House's precious time, which, as the Procedure Committee admits, we need for other purposes.

Finally, I must at least mention the fact that we largely ignore the significant potential of electronic devices. It now seems possible for any hon. Member to leave a completely secure coded vote in the system, which can be withdrawn immediately on demand or cancelled by telephone. That technical possibility may seem far-fetched, but we should consider the contribution that it could make.

Late sittings have been much discussed. The House should consider the 10 o'clock rule in a fundamental way. The Procedure Committee suggested that hon. Members do not often refer to that or vote against it, but I regard that argument as specious. We do not vote against the suspension of the 10 o'clock rule for the simple reason that we know that the Government would win every Division on that type of vote. It is rather futile as the Government would always outvote us.

I very much agree with the Study of Parliament Group's trenchant comment that

> "proceedings in the chamber should comprise those on which Members are most anxious to exercise their rights to attend, speak and vote."

The group concludes that

> "the chamber could be spared even more secondary legislation, most debates on European Community Documents and, more significantly, the remaining stages of much legislation and more Second Readings. It could therefore become the rule that business such as secondary legislation and EC Documents would always be dealt with in Committee unless specifically brought to the Floor of the House by government, by opposition parties on an Opposition Day or by backbenchers on a Private Members' day."

I heartily commend that conclusion to the House.

9.35 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Regardless of the political colour of the Government, our democracy is in a crisis, both within this place and outside. That is seen to be so by many outside the House because of a number of actions that the Government are taking. The same applies to those who are within the House. Throughout our society we see the overwhelming and overbearing influence that is being brought to bear both inside and outside the House. The procedures of the House, which we are now debating, are being used in a way that reflects the contempt that Governments in general, but this one in particular, hold for what is nominally the legislature.

There has been no serious attempt to reform the way in which this place works. That is because basically it works to the advantage of this Government, perhaps more than it has worked to the advantage of any Government in the past. When television cameras come into the Chamber and viewers see the way in which the Government manipulate Parliament, there will be tremendous revulsion. The same can be said of any party which forms a Government, but the Conservative party and the present Government have demonstrated so clearly the problems that a Parliament without power faces when it is faced with an Executive that exercises no restraint.

There is a great deal more that the Opposition could do to highlight the problems and to produce a serious alternative to the way in which our democracy currently does not work. Unfortunately, there are two camps within the Opposition. There are those who say, "We'll give them some stick when we get in next time. We don't want any changes because we can be just as authoritarian. We can abuse our democracy in equal measure." I do not agree with that view. Secondly, there are those who feel that, if we were to make serious changes to our processes and procedures, their little niche, speciality or maverick ability in this, that or the other area would fall prey to a wider democracy. Both camps are wrong. I hope that tonight's debate will cause one or two of their members to think afresh about the wider values that we Socialists should promote.

We must examine the role of the House of Commons in a democracy. How do we expect the House to move forward so that it can play a serious role in our democracy? How can it extend its ability to hold Government to account? If there ever was a golden age, how can we re-invent the ability to scrutinise government? No outsider, no impartial judge, would say that we in this place effectively hold our Government to account. That can be said of Governments of whatever political colour.

Perhaps we need to go far further than the reforms proposed by the Procedure Committee in the many reports that are before us. We should move on to consider the separation of powers, a written constitution, a Bill of Rights and the wholesale reform of the judiciary before we can seriously tackle the inability of this place to hold the Government to account. That will have to wait for another debate and another day.

One of the several problems that has emerged during the debate is that a number of hon. Members have concentrated their sudden desire for procedural reform to make Parliament effective on one bad experience that they personally underwent during consideration of the Abortion (Amendment) Bill 1987. I do not believe that they do the cause of parliamentary reform any good whatsoever by suddenly discovering that there are problems with the private Member's Bill procedure and suddenly griping that there have been difficulties.

Mr. Beith: In my party, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), who intervened earlier, has argued for the past 10 or 15 years, long before his Bill came before the House, that there should be time for private Members' Bills to reach a conclusion.

Mr. Allen: I do not know about individual cases, but there certainly has not been a massive groundswell on those issues over many years. People have suddenly discovered it because of the issue that was raised last year.

Like every other debate on a Select Committee report —there have been only five on substantive motions since 1979, even though there have been almost 400 reports— after tonight's debate there will be no vote. This has merely been a talking shop exercise. If the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, will allow me, I suggest that it may be an error in the Procedure Committee reports that they contain no proposal that a specified number of Committee reports should, as of right, come back to the Floor of the House for a decision. Under such a system, a number of the hon. Gentleman's recommendations would have been voted upon. Until we link the system of Select Committees to the Floor of the House, those Committees will be divorced from real accountability and scrutiny by the Government.

Mr. Tony Banks: Why only a proportion? If the House sets up a Committee to consider something, surely that presupposes that the Committee should come back with proposals and the House should vote on them. Otherwise, what is the point of setting up the Committees in the first place?

Mr. Allen: My hon. Friend expresses his own view, and I do not wish to comment on his remarks.

Parliament is letting down democracy, as it is not fulfilling its role. Perhaps I come to this debate with some naivety as I am a new Member. However, I hope that that also means that I bring a fresher eye to this problem. I hope also that my commitment to this issue is in no doubt. It is something of a chore, I may tell the Leader of the House, to have to go to the Table Office every day to table my motions on the Order Paper, despite the welcome that I always get there. However, I have spent a year tabling my motions in an attempt, as Conservative Members said earlier, to bring this issue to the fore and get, as my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) said, a number of hon. Members interested in this area. This is not an arcane and esoteric area. It is an area of parliamentary reform which is vital to the ability of our democracy to take decisions effectively, to inform people outside, and, above all, to hold the Government to account.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Perhaps it is rather surprising that the hon. Gentleman and I, as new Members with a fresh view, share the opinion of the Privy Councillors who have spoken this evening and believe that a change in the procedure is long overdue. Surely it must be right that the Government should find time to bring forward as soon as possible substantive proposals that we can vote on to change the procedure.

Mr. Allen: The Government will not find time to change the House, given that the House serves the Government's purpose. Until the House reasserts its independence from Government, I see no prospect of these matters being brought to a decision. None the less, they must be brought to the attention of hon. Members. I have continually tabled motions which appear as remaining orders of the day. Perhaps one day Mr. Speaker will surprise me by selecting one. I hope that that happens on a day when I am in attendance—as I usually am. Please do not surprise me, Mr. Speaker, by selecting one on an odd day when I am not here.

I have proposed that speeches in all debates should be limited to 10 minutes; that is self-explanatory. They should be timed by another clock in the Chamber that can be stopped so that interventions are not taken out of the 10 minutes. That would encourage debate as hon. Members would be very willing to give way and pursue points knowing that they would not lose any time out of their 10 minutes.

The point that all hon. Members should be treated equally in debate has been touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). I fully endorse his proposals about Privy Councillors. A list of speakers should be available before each debate so that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) would not have to come back half-expecting to be called to speak tonight. He would have been able to phone in and find out, and listen at leisure when he arrived.

Timetables should be introduced for all Bills. The theory of timetables is that the Government get their Bill at the end of the day, and they know the day on which that Bill will come out of Committee. But in Committee the timetabling of the Bill should be the possession of the Opposition, and they should choose the areas to be scrutinised in greatest depth.

A number of hon. Members have mentioned dates of sittings. Special Standing Committees are becoming increasingly important. Given the cursory examination that Bills receive, there should be a period of one month between First and Second Reading so that there can be examination outside of the clauses of the Bill.

Finally, Committees of the House should be allowed to come to the Floor of the House by right to present at least one report each year so that there is a connection between the Committee system and the Floor of the House. The Leader of the House kindly raised the question of hours, so I shall not spend any time on that. Tonight's debate has been helpful, but it would be far more helpful if the Leader of the House agreed that decisions as well as speeches should be forthcoming.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I was hoping that at least one novelty would be proposed tonight. I would suggest the installation of polygraph lie detectors in both Dispatch Boxes. That would be to the advantage of the public and Back Benchers and to the disadvantage of Front Benchers on both sides. However, no such novelties have been proposed today.

If we consider what are normally regarded as the proper functions of a Parliament, we are not too bad at the redress of individual grievances; but everyone has to accept that we are not too smart at scrutinising the activities of the Executive, we are absolutely deplorable at controlling Government expenditure, and we have not been too good at producing understandable, workable laws.

During the past two or three years, it has not been the practitioners in the field who are unable to understand the law. In view of the successful court actions against the Government, particularly in local government finance and social security, it is clear that some of the Ministers who introduced the Bills did not understand them and broke the law fairly soon after they were enacted. In those circumstances, I do not think that we are doing too well in the production of understandable law.

One aspect of Parliament that tends to be ignored—the Select Committee, at least in some ways, tended to set it to one side—is our function as a place for free expression of opinion, where people are allowed to express their views and conduct campaigns within a political arena. I hope that no one will take offence when I say that I feel that the Select Committee has taken rather a managerial approach to this place, and in some sense there has been a lot of effort to depoliticise it, as if one of the Committee's objects was the smooth operation of the House. That is not always the case.

I do not want to talk about short speeches, other than to say that you, Mr. Speaker, should be empowered to impose a time limit from 6 pm to 9 pm, if you so wished, rather than from 6 pm to 8 pm or from 7 pm to 9 pm. That would definitely be an advantage.

The Select Committee made proposals for allocating time to Government Bills in Committee. In fact, not many Bills end up being guillotined—although, because of the sanguinary activities of the Leader of the House, during the last Session more Bills were guillotined than in any other Session in the history of Parliament. However, the number was still only six, so we are not reduced to guillotining Bills too frequently. Most Bills go through Committee as both sides expect; only the most controversial of Bills do not. I am doubtful about the idea that a Committee should self-guillotine, fairly quietly and without much publicity. It is generally to the advantage of the Opposition to insist that if the Government want very controversial measures to go through quickly, at some point in the proceedings they must come to the Floor of the House and face adverse publicity.

Last Session we forced the Government to guillotine the Social Security Bill; the result was 140 column inches of newspaper coverage, mostly unfavourable to the Government. That was useful and worth while. It is a stick with which all Oppositions should be able to beat Governments, and to do so in public rather than reaching agreement upstairs.

The Select Committee recommended changes in the rules governing debates on statutory instruments. What strikes me as peculiar is that, four or five years after a Bill has been passed, no one has the faintest idea why it was thought to need the affirmative procedure. The belief is that the affirmative procedure applies to important matters and the negative procedure to less important matters. The fact is that what might appear to be important while a Bill is going through often turns out to be relatively trivial two or three years later.

The present rules for deciding whether statutory instruments should be dealt with on the Floor of the House or upstairs are probably better than the Select Committee's proposals. Much more important is the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) about the willingness of the House to allow important parts of legislation to be sloughed off into regulations when they should be on the face of the primary legislation. If we do not jib at putting such important matters into regulations rather than into primary legislation, the question whether they are dealt with on the Floor of the House or upstairs is trivial. I share the doubts of the Leader of the House about the wisdom of taking a substantial chunk of prime time at 3.30 pm for procedural wrangles about what should happen to particular statutory instruments. Neither side would benefit from such a use of parliamentary time.

A matter of much more consequence is whether it should be possible for the House to amend statutory instruments. Anyone can recognise the advantages of being able to do so. There might be a possibility—although I understand that it is not what the Select Committee is proposing—of identifying groups of extremely significant pieces of secondary legislation that could be amendable, but not to make secondary legislation in general amendable. That might go some way towards alleviating concern about the really poor level of draftsmanship to which the hon. Member for Honition (Sir P. Emery) referred.

Our present parliamentary calendar is ludicrous and has been determined by a hangover from when the House was run by country gentry. There are few of those left in the House, although there are a number of lawyers. We need an altogether different parliamentary calendar. If that necessitated the major constitutional change of shifting the party conferences to another time of year so that we could spread out our time more sensibly, perhaps we should consider doing that. Even within existing arrangements, it would be advantageous to most people to have some kind of parliamentary calendar, rather than conduct our affairs in our present haphazard way.

It is clear that, whatever we decide about the parliamentary calendar, in the end the Government will always be able to amend it if they are desperate. I cannot see many Opposition Members saying, "By God, we've triumphed this time. We've forced them to smash the parliamentary calendar to such an extent that we shall all meet on Christmas day." That will not normally be one of our objectives.

It appears to me that it would be easier for you, Mr. Speaker, and for practically every hon. Member, if we had a calendar set out in advance, and, by and large, the Government made us stick to it.

While we have our present approach to parliamentary government, the Government will always be able to fix what happens in the Chamber.—[Interruption.] I believe that the Whip has misunderstood the amount of time for which the Leader of the House has asked.

I believe that in general the propositions before us are rather managerial in their approach. In line with what my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) suggested, we need a more radical change to the way in which the House goes about its tasks, because we are still obsessed with 18th-century French ideas that in some way or another the House of Commons controls the Government.

The fact is that, once a Government have a majority, the Government control the House of Commons. As long as we fail to recognise that basic point, most of the propositions from the Procedure Committee will not have a substantial impact on what happens in the House or how we carry on our business. We need to start from an altogether different proposition. If we want the Procedure Committee to produce the radical changes in procedure which my party believes in, we must give it a more radical role altogether. We cannot criticise it for producing the propositions that are before us, because no one has asked it to be especially radical.

Mr. Wakeham: With the permission of the House, I shall say a few words.

Because of the late start to the debate and the number of Members who wished to speak, I believed that it was better not to make a substantive reply on the issues, but to hear as many hon. Members as possible. I know that a number of hon. Members did not get into the debate. The debate was held on the Adjournment so that views could be expressed, and I cannot complain if I received some pretty strong views from a number of quarters, because that was the purpose of the exercise. It is clear that virtually any change to our procedures is considered controversial by one part of the House or another. I shall seek to find some general agreement and see whether we can make some progress.

Other matters have arisen in the debate that the Select Committee on Procedure might like to consider further and to give us some guidance on.

Sir Peter Emery: Will the shadow Leader of the House come and advise us?

Mr. Wakeham: I believe that the hon. Gentleman spoke with considerable authority and experience of opposition, which is an important part of the balance of this House.

I shall study tonight's speeches carefully. I also hope that the overwhelming majority of Members who did not take part in this debate will also study them, because what we do will also depend upon them.

It being Ten o'clock, the Motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Milk Quotas

10 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether we could take the two motions together?

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I regret having to make an objection to the two motions being taken together as I appreciate that the subject matters are linked not only in the form of the liquid, but because of the relationship between them. However, if we discuss the two motions together, the quality of scrutiny goes down, because we have only one and a half hours' debate on three different matters, including a possible amendment. Unless we finish the first motion within one and a half hours, we shall have double the time if we take them separately. Therefore, on the grounds of scrutiny, I object to the motions being taken together.

Mr. Speaker: We shall deal first with the motion on milk quotas.

Mr. MacGregor: I am perfectly content to take the two motions separately.

I beg to move,

> That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 8108/88 on milk and milk products and of the Government's intention to pursue agreement which meets the requirements of the European Court's judgment while containing costs and ensuring that the effectiveness of milk quotas is maintained.

It is important to give the House a brief reminder of the background of this matter. In 1984, when milk quotas were first introduced, it was clear that something had to be done to deal with sharply-rising surpluses and ever-escalating spending on support for the dairy sector. The existing regime was simply not working, so the Community had to act. Quotas were not the Government's original preferred approach, but it became clear during the negotiations in autumn 1983—I was Minister of State at that time and involved in the negotiations—that quotas were the only negotiable solution for the Council of Ten Ministers, as it then was.

There are considerable disadvantages to milk quotas, and I have never hidden that fact. They involve a large and costly administrative burden for the Government and industry. Perhaps one of their biggest disadvantages is that they inhibit new entrants to the industry and inhibit entrepreneurial farmers within it. On the other hand, quotas have enabled the industry to contain its dairy problem. I say "contain" because expenditure is still high, and the dairy regime is still the most expensive in the Community.

It is true that the surpluses are largely being dealt with —the "vanishing mountains", as I have described them —and it is important for the public and hon. Members to realise that today those mountains are vanishing.

In the past year we have seen an 80 per cent. decline in the butter mountain in the United Kingdom and the skimmed milk powder mountain has vanished. The disposal of production, however, is still heavily subsidised. About three quarters of the Community's skimmed milk powder production and one fifth of butter production receives a subsidy to assist in finding an outlet for that production. We are now trying to deal with that problem and are urging that some of the subsidies should be reduced. The Commission, with my encouragement, has now taken action on that matter.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware that the Court of Auditors recently pronounced on the incredible waste connected with the public storage of goods that form part of the common agricultural policy. That storage costs us about £3 billion-plus a year, and the Court of Auditors described the whole system as a total shambles and utterly discredited. Does my right hon. Friend agree that we must do something to get this matter under control, because it represents one of the greatest wastes of public expenditure that the country witnesses?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend goes a little far, and perhaps I can explain why. We are not talking about £3 billion being wasted through bad storage methods. A large part of that cost has been incurred in the straight storage and disposal of the surpluses. I made it clear that, as a result of the CAP reforms, those surpluses are significantly falling, so, over a period, that cost will reduce.

Where the Court of Auditors has been right in drawing our attention to difficulties is in respect of the way in which some of the storage and dispoal systems have been operating. The cost of these difficulties is a much lesser figure. The real need is to get rid of the surpluses, for that is the way that costs will come down. Nevertheless, while we have surpluses, I am in favour of ensuring that we operate them as efficiently as possible and that there is no waste or mismanagement. That makes for inefficient use of resources for which the taxpayer has to pay. I assure my hon. Friend that I drew attention to the Court of Auditors' report at the last Council meeting, saying that we should all be concerned to learn its lessons. I am glad to say that I was supported by the Commission, and that the Council will be considering the report shortly. But the distinction to make is an important one.

I referred to some of the quota system's helpful elements, including containing expenditure. Above all, on that side of the equation, quotas have given our dairy farmers stability. Producer numbers have fallen since quotas were imposed, but that is the continuation of a long-term trend. Fundamentally, dairy farmers know the broad constraints within which they will be working until 1992. The price they receive for their output is about 3 per cent. higher than it was a year ago. Dairy farming profits, which were falling when quotas were introduced, have risen steadily since then.

With the rationalisation of processing capacity that has occurred, the industry is in good shape to maximise the value of its production, and—with curbs on production—that will be the key to its future prosperity.

One of the other, often very difficult, problems about quotas is the acute difficulties that arise—especially in the initial stages but also subsequently from time to time—in the methods of and principles applied to the distribution of quotas. That was one of the most difficult tasks facing us on the introduction of quotas—deciding how to distribute them. It is one of the issues before us tonight. In April, the European Court ruled that the original Community quota regulations were in breach of Community law by failing to make provision for producers who intended returning to production after fulfilling the four or five-year cessation period required by the scheme. That judgment requires the Commission to make proposals for changes to the quota regulations.

At this point, I stress that neither the Council of Ministers nor the Commission in any way welcomes that development. It presented a problem that we did not seek and the need for policy changes that we did not wish to make. However, the Council is obliged to act in response to a European Court judgment. It has no option.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): There is an option. If the Council of Ministers agrees that this is thoroughly disadvantageous, an amendment to the treaty would overturn the Court's ruling.

Mr. MacGregor: That is probably beyond the abilities of the Council of Agriculture Ministers to bring about. We feel that we must act within the Court's judgment, but I shall explain how we are trying to minimise the disadvantages. In view of the shortness of this debate, and despite the fact that it is a single debate, perhaps I ought to get on with my speech, so that other right hon. and hon. Members may have an opportunity to contribute.

I have sympathy with those farmers who have complained about the measures that the Council is now considering on the ground that they are unfair to existing producers—for example, those with development awards, and particularly those who found their original quota requests sharply cut back in 1984. I have to say that this is not a step taken by Ministers on their initiative. We are being purely reactive, as we are obliged to be, and it has been my objective—and here I come to my hon. Friend's point—to minimise possible unfairnesses.

The Commission's response to the Court's decision is the package of proposals as refined for decision by the Council and set out in document COM(88)446. Briefly, a new category of producer eligible for the allocation of quota is defined on the basis of restrictive criteria. These are designed to ensure that the only producers who benefit will be those who are committed to return to milk production, although they joined the cessation scheme at the time.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): How is the Court's decision being interpreted? Does it apply to farmers who ceased milk production if the five-year period was before 1984, or specifically to those cases in which the five-year period ended after that year? Would such farmers be prevented from applying for quotas? Many of them would like that to be clarified.

Mr. MacGregor: I cannot give a clear answer to that question yet, because it is one of the matters currently being debated in the Council.

An increase in the Community quota reserve of 500,000 tonnes is proposed to alleviate the problems faced by member states in allocating quotas to the new category of producers. To compensate in part for the extra costs flowing from the additional production, the Commission proposes to reduce the butter intervention price by 2 per cent., which would be offset by a reduction in the co-responsibility levy for small producers. Finally, the package incorporates a technical change in the way in which supplementary levy is calculated to clarify member states' liability in the first two years of quotas. Those are the key ingredients. There are a number of other detailed points which there is not time to go into this evening.

From the outset of our Council discussions, I emphasised my belief that we should be guided by certain principles. First, we should aim to ensure that the quotas of existing producers were not affected by the need to respond to the Court's decision. Secondly, the conditions for eligibility should be restrictively drawn to ensure that only those genuinely intending to go back into milk—and then doing so—should benefit. Thirdly, the quota should not be capable of being sold or leased.

I know that those points have been strongly supported by many of our farmers, and I am pleased to see that there has been growing support for them in the Council. The measures before us reflect them, while taking fair account of the interests of those producers who clearly did and do intend to return to milk production. Moreover—this is another important criterion—the package now taking shape will not undermine the effectiveness of the quota system.

The package has already been subject to considerable discussion in the Council, and I cannot be certain when we shall reach final decisions, although I hope—it is only a hope, but I intend to try to achieve it—that it will be at the December Council. I am keen to resolve the issue—which is causing uncertainty among our dairy farmers—as quickly as possible. Overall, however, while a number of points of detail remain to be resolved, the question of eligibility conditions seems to be moving to a satisfactory resolution.

The remainder of the package has received rather less attention in Community discussion, but raises some important issues. In view of the continuing level of surplus production, I regret the need to increase the total amount of quota available, but—as I have said—it was not of our choosing. It will not be easy to avoid, given the need to make provisions for a new category of producers without affecting the outlook for those who already hold quotas. The need to limit the potential demand for new quota is the main reason for keeping the eligibility criteria very restrictive.

I support the proposed cut in the butter price, although I regret that even on the Commission's figures it does not compensate for the whole cost of the extra quota proposed. Given the current cost of the dairy regime—which, as I explained, is still the most expensive in the Community—it would have been unfair to seek compensatory savings from other sectors for a problem that has arisen in the dairy sector itself.

By the same token, I am unhappy at the suggested cut in the co-responsibility levy for very small producers. It has little economic justification; it is not relevant to the Court's judgment that we have to implement; and it disadvantages the United Kingdom because so few of our producers fall into that category. I have therefore been opposing it.

Overall, this is a complex proposal which has been forced on the Community by an unexpected decision of the Court. However, in the light of discussions so far, there are better prospects than I feared at the outset of a package emerging that is reasonable in all the circumstances. There is still, therefore, enough time for us to ask for views and to reach a final decision. That is why I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in this debate. I have made a short speech to enable as many hon. Members as possible to express their views on the proposal. It will enable me to take their views into account when I prepare my approach to the further and, I hope, final Council discussions.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I, too, intend to restrict my remarks to the aftermath of the Mülder case so that as many right hon. and hon. Members as possible can take part in the debate.

We welcome the opportunity to discuss this important matter. It enables hon. Members to put their views to the Minister, which he will be able to take with him to the meeting that is to be held between 12 and 16 December. He can then fight for what we believe in. Many hon. Members believe that the Court's judgment is perverse, but that is the legally correct position and we have to abide by it. Nevertheless, the judgment highlights the injustices that many small dairy farmers face. They have done badly out of the introduction of quotas. They have not had the advantage of the golden handshake schemes from which farmers who are covered by the Mülder judgment can benefit. That fact needs to be put on the record. Many small farmers were able to make a living before the introduction of quotas. The cuts, however, have made it difficult for them to continue in business as dairy farmers.

The Minister implied that the Mülder case presents the Commission with a serious problem. A literal and generous interpretation of the Court's judgment could mean that an additional 5 million tonnes of milk would have to be found. To put that into perspective, I understand that that is roughly equal to the total quantity of milk that has been saved since the introduction of generous quota systems in 1984. Faced with that dilemma, the Commission felt that it had been placed in an impossible position. It has therefore proposed a limited scheme.

It would be useful if the Minister could tell hon. Members about the bargaining positions of the other member states. It would also be useful if he could further clarify the British Government's stance. We understand that the new scheme will be available only to those farmers who received the non-marketing premiums after 1 April 1984. That is restrictive, but I do not grumble about it. We understand also that the new scheme will apply only to farmers who are able to show that they can run viable dairy units. It will not apply to farmers who are already in receipt of the dairy quota.

The most interesting aspect of the Commission's proposals—I stress that they are proposals—is that the Minister was frank and open at the November Council meetings when these matters were discussed. His stance was known when the Council was discussing the small group of people who are eligible. The Minister supported the Commission's proposals. May we be told about the attitude of the Germans, the main beneficiaries of the scheme, and that of the Danes and the southern Europeans to the scheme, who will not benefit from it?

Another interesting point in the document is that if any of the new quota is subsequently leased or sold it will be confiscated and returned to the Community's reserve. When, a few minutes ago, the Minister elaborated on that, the House applauded what he said. Is it likely that if quotas are leased or sold they will be confiscated and returned to the Community reserve, or will we find that that clause is not implemented? We think that the extra quota should not have a cash value on it. I hope that the Minister can give us a firm assurance about that.

The Minister has previously cautioned farmers about the inherent value of quotas and warned that, while they have a value now, there is no guarantee that quotas will go on indefinitely. It is right to repeat that, because we are all aware of the considerable amount of money that is spent on the leasing and purchasing of quotas.

Will the Minister take on board the worry that there could be transnational quota purchases after 1992? There are considerable differences between the market prices of quotas in the Republic of Ireland, Britain and Holland. At the moment it is not possible to trade quota across national boundaries, but such trade will presumably be allowed after 1992. That being so, the concept of a national quota, which we found acceptable, could be destroyed. Taking the argument to its logical conclusion, we could find that there are no cows in Britain, and that all milk is produced in Holland.

We basically support the Government's line, and we think that they and the Commission are right to try to restrict the availability of quota. We find the judgment rather unfair, bearing in mind the fact that many small farmers have done rather badly out of the milk quota system.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): My right hon. Friend the Minister referred to the early negotiations in 1983 and 1984, when milk quotas were introduced. I think that I would not be exaggerating if I said that he and I have those negotiations written across our souls in indelible ink. We will never forget those difficult months.

My right hon. Friend referred to some of the inherent weaknesses of milk quotas. One of our anxieties was that quotas should be properly enforced in all countries. Now I read that in Italy, for example, there is a suggestion that massive amounts of levy have not been paid. I hope that my right hon. Friend will tell us that, if that is the case, no effort will be spared in extracting that money from Italy. I remind him of a provision which he and I got put in late in those negotiations—that in the event of a country not paying up, the levy would come from the farmers and not from the Government. That is important, and I hope that he will not forget it when dealing with Italy.

I agree strongly with most of what the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) said, but he was a bit unfair not to acknowledge that, when quotas were introduced, we leaned over backwards to ensure that small farmers got back to their pre-quota milk production as quickly as possible. I think that we succeeded. That should be acknowledged.

We must accept the judgment of the European Court —the hon. Member for South Shields responsibly and honestly said that—but I think that it was grotesque in every way. It is well known that most of the people who took the 1977 scheme to be paid to get out of milk production did so as a permanent and not as a temporary step. Few of them could go back into milk production even if they wanted to. No doubt some of them will do, hoping to be able to make a quick buck out of the value of the milk quota, but I shall say more on that later.

I am sure that the Minister remembers, as I do, the difficult months after the introduction of the milk quota. What caused as much resentment as anything else was the fact that some people who had taken the scheme to go out of milk production then came back into it and were given generous quotas. That was widely regarded as unfair at the time, and it will be regarded as even more unfair now if some of those people return after years out of milk production. The European Court has gone off its head in making that judgment.

I welcome the Minister's comments. I want to underline them and suggest that they should be sticking points in the negotiations. This quota is unexpected, so it should be non-transferable; people should not be able to profit by selling it. The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) spoke about that crucial matter.

How will my right hon. Friend deal with a case in which somebody who has been given extra quota then wants to sell his farm? Will he be allowed to sell the quota with the farm, or does it die when he leaves the farm? That is an important matter. It must be a sticking point that people who are given this windfall should not be able to cash it.

I welcome enormously the Minister's statement that the United Kingdom Government are seeking to protect existing quota holders and not to take some of the extra windfall quota from people who, goodness knows, have had enough difficulties in the past few years with milk quotas. The Minister will be taking part in difficult negotiations: I understand that almost as well as any other hon. Member.

I grieve that the Germans' lack of realism seems to continue unabated despite the death of Mr. Strauss in Bavaria. I hope that a little more realism will creep into the way in which Mr. Kiechle works his case in the Council of Agriculture Ministers, because it has been less than responsible for many years. I understand that the Germans want producers, under the windfall arrangement, to receive all the quota that they would have been granted had they been producing in the base year, and that they also want part-time farmers to benefit. I hope that my right hon. Friend will resist that proposal, because I see no purpose in supporting the Germans' suggestion.

I endorse heavily what my right hon. Friend said about his strong opposition to reducing the co-responsibility levy for small producers as part of the whole package. My right hon. Friend knows that one of his most important battles on behalf of British farmers in Brussels and Luxembourg will be to resist the continuous attempts by the Commission and other countries to slant the common agricultural policy in favour of small farmers. That is an attack on British agriculture because we have a hugely better and more efficient structure than almost any other country in the Community.

The proposal to reduce the co-responsibility levy for small producers is just another way in which small farmers —the majority of farmers—in almost all other Community countries benefit at the expense of British agriculture. One should remember that the average size of herd in this country is about 60 cows, whereas in a country such as Portugal, I believe, about 97 per cent. of the milk is produced from herds of three or fewer cows. That fact illustrates the differences in structure. We must not allow the Community to take us in Britain to the cleaners.

I was pleased to hear my right hon. Friend's approach to this most difficult and unforeseen problem, and I wish him luck in the negotiations.

10.30 pm

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I am sure that hon. Members of all parties will agree that since the overnight introduction four years ago of milk quotas, agriculture in Britain has never recovered confidence. It will take a long time to restore that confidence. I say that with respect to the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) and his hon. Friends because I am not in any way condemning him, but simply referring to the milk quotas that were forced on us by the EEC Commission.

It is a great pity that during those four years the industry has lost further confidence in nearly every sector. I have agreed with many of the suggestions made by the Minister in the past four years about what should be done to try to help agriculture, but I hope he will recognise that it is the wish of the majority of farmers in this country that he should stop dismantling many of our agricultural institutions, and that he should not take away the guaranteed price system that has operated so successfully for some of our products. I shall not refer to any of them tonight, but I should like the Minister to be aware of the views of many farmers. After reading what Mr. Derek Andrews, the permanent secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, has said, the fortunes of the farming community do not look very bright. It seems that agriculture will have a bad time in the next 12 months.

[Mr. Geraint Howells]

I turn now to milk quotas and the EEC ruling. I am sure that many dairy farmers throughout the country were as shocked as I was on hearing the EEC's ruling about the two Dutch farmers. However, that has happened and we must live with it. I agree entirely with the sentiments expressed by the Minister tonight. My hon. Friends support him wholeheartedly and hope that he will be successful in his deliberations in Brussels in the coming months.

I am sure that to their way of thinking the Dutch farmers will feel that they have been fortunate. I wonder whether there are any dairy farmers in Britain who would go to court about an extra milk quota. Could any farmers in Britain do the same as those two Dutch farmers? It would be sad if many dairy farmers in this country would do so.

Although this matter has been covered by many hon. Members, I should like to ask some questions. I hold the same view as the Milk Marketing Board, which is in favour of making sure that milk production surrendered will not be surrendered to the non-marketing schemes.

The dairy industry in this country would like answers to three questions. First, many farmers have asked me—I pass this on to the Minister and hope that he can give me an assurance on it—whether the milk quotas will be operating in this country after 1992. Although the right hon. Gentleman said that the butter surplus in the EEC was diminishing, does he foresee a day in the near future when there will be a milk shortage in the EEC?

We have heard about quotas being bought and sold and the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) talked about the transnational quota system that will operate after 1992. A few years ago many dairy farmers in Wales sold their quotas to farmers in England, but I was delighted to learn that the trade is now in reverse. Many farmers are worried about the value of the quotas. I agree entirely with the Minister, who has been saying for the last few years that we have to be careful that farmers' milk quotas do not become worthless after 1992.

The final and best question is the one put to me by dairy farmers. Can the Minister give an assurance that British dairy farmers will have the opportunity to compete on equal terms with their counterparts in the rest of the EEC? If he can give that assurance, many dairy farmers will look ahead with confidence. The ruling has my backing and that of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): There is no doubt that the introduction of milk quotas has substantially reduced the output of milk from our dairy farms. The turn round in farmer opinion after the quotas were introduced has been astonishing. There was an enormous amount of ill-feeling flying around when my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) and our mutual right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food were doing their best to introduce the milk quotas. I was the Parliamentary Private Secretary to my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale and I remember going to the three counties show and then on to Ross-on-Wye and Dyfed. We were mobbed by farmers. I always thought that farmers were friendly until we went to those places.

It is to the great credit of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale that he stuck to his guns and carried on with a difficult job. Dairy farmers now owe him a debt of gratitude that they can never express. That was a difficult time for my right hon. Friend, but the one thing that dairy farmers do not now want to part with is their dairy quota.

It is good news that stocks are falling, because that means lower costs to the taxpayers, less flak for the farmers and less criticism that the dairy industry is not trying to solve its own problems.

Like other hon. Members, I should like to turn to the Mülder factor, the Dutch farmer who took financial inducements to stop milk production through a beef conversion scheme before quotas were introduced in 1984. Admittedly, it was a temporary arrangement, but how was anybody to know that the Dutch farmer was later to return to dairy farming? Mr. Mülder, who pocketed the cash that was available, has now changed his mind and decided to return to dairy farming. May I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister whether it is possible to appeal against this European Court of Justice ruling? [Interruption.] I notice that the Minister moves his head to show that it is not. At any rate, he has not fallen asleep.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) suggested that Commissioners might rewrite the rules. That is not an unrealistic suggestion. Perhaps we could have an explanation about that. It seems to be the height of injustice that farmers, who were involved in expansion plans when the quotas were introduced, were not offered the facility that is now being offered to Mr. Mülder. Many of my constituents who were engaged on Government expansion plans were knee-capped when the quotas were introduced. Many of them, although they were not made bankrupt, had to sell their farms and go into a different business. Why should they not be allowed such an opportunity? Perhaps we could go to the European Court about that as well. There is a great feeling of injustice because the Mülders have received what the farmers in the Forest of Dean see as rather special treatment.

It is incredible that the EEC will find another 500,000 tonnes of production to help Mr. Mülder, and anybody else in his position. It will be a great incentive to other farmers to find ways to ride in on the back of this court case to see whether they, too, can get some extra production or come back into dairy farming. It cannot be right that, having cashed in once to get out of milk, he should seek to cash in again to get back into milk. I was delighted to hear my right hon. Friend say that he will use his best influence to make sure that this is not resaleable, not leaseable and not inheritable.

A quota is now worth money, and the Mülder case is seen by dairy farmers throughout the country as the height of injustice. All the good will of the farmers of the Forest of Dean and of dairy farmers throughout the country goes with my right hon. Friend in his negotiations to ensure that the quota is not resaleable and cannot be passed on. I wonder whether any more skeletons will fall from any more cupboards. Perhaps we should do our best to bring them all out, once and for all, and put an end to it, so that the farmers can know not only where they are now, but where they will be in the future. I wish my right hon. Friend the best of luck in these negotiations, for many of us admire his lucidity, tenacity and stamina in hanging on in all these negotiations. He is positively terrier-like in the way that he approaches the European negotiations.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): First, I apologise for the fact that I may not be here for the winding-up speech.

I shall take a slightly different tack from that taken by the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland). Milk quotas have not just created benefits. In my constituency, a brand-new factory that cost £2 million and employed 60 people had to close. It is a shame that we cannot debate New Zealand butter with the milk quotas, because they tie in. I accept the good reasons of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North (Mr. Spearing) for objecting to that, but the only logic that would cause me to change my mind and be in favour of the importation of New Zealand butter is the fact that there is now a shortage of milk for manufacturing processes. It makes no sense to stop imports of New Zealand butter in those circumstances.

I am a Member sponsored by the Transport and General Workers Union, and many of its members have jobs in the milk processing industry. The quota system may have got rid of surpluses, which is a good thing, but we do not have a free market. It is surprising that Tory Members do not want it. We have a monopoly shortage. The Minister said that the butter mountain has started to melt. Not thousands of tonnes, nor hundreds of tonnes, nor even a single pat of butter goes in intervention. We have a shortage of milk. Companies with orders for evaporated milk, full-cream milk powder, yogurt and cheese—all labour-intensive processes—cannot fulfil those orders because, although we have the manufacturing capacity, we do not have the raw materials. These are all genuine orders; there is no subsidy.

The Minister said that quotas brought a secure future for the milk-processing industry, but that is not correct because there is a lack of investment in the industry. There is surplus capacity, but not the promise of extra milk to meet those orders. I accept that there is a surplus in Europe. I asked the Minister about that before the recess and he admitted that that was so, but, when I asked whether there was a surplus in the United Kingdom, he did not answer the question. Italy and France are putting cheese into intervention, but, in Scotland, the creameries cannot meet export orders for cheddar cheese, which would greatly help our balance of payments, because of the milk quota system. In a perverse way, therefore, the ruling of the European Court will perpetuate that situation.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Was not the quota system designed to ensure that the United Kingdom opened up its market to liquid milk from Europe? As the hon. Gentleman said, there is a shortage of milk in this country. Manufacturing capacity is unused because of that shortage and the system is now achieving what Europe rather than the United Kingdom wanted—access to the English market for continental liquid milk.

Mr. Martlew: If the hon. Gentleman is asking whether we got a raw deal from the Commission's milk quota proposals, the answer is yes, just as we normally do. However, the dairy farmers who are left did not get a raw deal; they are doing very well. If we consider agriculture in general, dairy farming is the one area that is doing well. One of the reasons for that is that the Milk Marketing Board, which is, in effect, a farmers' monopoly co-operative, pushes up the price of milk for manufacturers. That money then goes to the farmers. As a consequence, we shall be pushed out of the world market and some creameries will close. Those farmers now have guaranteed security. They have a product that is more valuable than milk and, in some cases, more valuable than the land that they farm.

Let me quote an example from an advertisement in Saturday's Yorkshire Post. The advertisement, which appears under an advertisement for cess pools—that is perhaps significant—states:

"Milk quota for sale. Both clean and part used with B.F. 3·56 to 4·05 per cent."

The figures refer to the butter fat content.

We cannot blame the farmer for selling the quota. He did not buy it; he just happened to be there when the EEC and the Government gave him the commodity. Surely that cannot be right.

We must consider a system in which we can equalise the amount of milk that goes into manufacture in Europe. One of the reasons why there is a shortage of milk at present is the milk curve. It would be a bureaucratic nightmare, but we must examine the possibility of a monthly quota so that we can calculate the times of year when we require the milk. That cannot be done by giving financial incentives to the farmers. We must consider a system whereby, in the spring, there would be no surpluses to go into intervention, but, when in periods of shortage, we would have the milk to ensure that our creameries kept going.

I hope that the Minister will examine that option and consider ways of getting rid of that distasteful speculation and bartering of milk quotas represented by a certificate that the farmers never earned and do not deserve. The only person who pays is the consumer.

10.50 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I have two brief questions for the Minister, who is clearly dealing with great skill with an issue that has arisen from a judicial decision. First, what is the net cost of that which has been proposed? The papers that are before us are mystifying. The Commission refers to a "net deficit" of about £18 million. The Ministry tells us that the cost will be about £30 million. The third estimate comes from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, who, being a sensible and humble man, has taken a middle view and opted for £24 million. Why is there such a great difference between the estimates, and where will the money come from?

In a recent debate we were told that there are legally binding terms and restraints on agricultural spending. I ask the Minister to tell us where the £30 million, or £24 million, will come from. Will it mean some compensating factor for other spending on agriculture?

Further to the net addition to Community spending on agriculture, will there be any additional spending by member states, including the United Kingdom? The Court of Auditors' report says that the transfer of financial responsibility for butter dumping to member states was unlawful, and the Council of Ministers declined even to discuss the proposal. We know, however, that butter dumping is extremely expensive. It was revealed in a parliamentary answer last week that the most recent price of selling butter is 2·75p per pound, which seems extremely low. When the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), the Liberal party's spokesman, was speaking of the possibility of a shortage of milk and butter because of the reduced quotas, he should have been aware also of the implications of the fire clearance sale.

Will there be additional spending by member states because of any increase in the dumping of butter, which has reached extraordinary and substantial levels? My right hon. Friend the Minister will know that specific assurances were given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and by all the members of the European Council in February, when they agreed to a massive increase in Community spending. I hope that we shall be told who will pay for the deficit. Secondly, will there be a compensating effect on the Community's spending on agriculture? Thirdly, why are the Commission's figures so wildly different from the Government's estimates?

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I, too, have experienced the milk quota issue at first hand. The quota was announced on the day that I was selected as the Conservative party candidate for the Stafford by-election. That is another event that I am unlikely to forget.

I endorse the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) as a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation, which recommended that the issue before us should be debated at an early date. There is the important matter of principle that these matters are ultimately subject to majority voting, and there is potential for a blocking minority that will be constituted by the Mediterranean countries. We do not know what the outcome will be, and at the same time it is clear that the proposals that we are discussing are inspired largely by the interests of the German Minister and the electorate which he serves.

I have the greatest possible respect for my right hon. Friend the Minister, for he is a man of great skill and determination, but how are we to retrieve a situation that will have a significant adverse effect on the British farmer, on the assumption that majority voting will have the result that we expect? We must stand up for our rights.

There was a unique event on Monday, when the proposal to take note of a European document was opposed by the Government. If we are out-voted on this issue, we should not take that lying down in the Council of Ministers or as a Parliament. We should ensure, as a Government and as a Parliament, that we make our protest and that we act accordingly, if necessary by a vote in the House.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): I support my right hon. Friend the Minister in this matter. I believe that he is working very hard for constituents like mine who over the past few years have had a 19 per cent. cut in their milk quota and who now have some stability. They welcome the fact that the Minister is determined to fight to preserve that position and to ensure that farming is on a fair financial footing over the next few years.

In Pembrokeshire we have watched with some concern the implications of the Mülder case, especially for family farms which tend to be small and medium-sized units. I hope that the Minister will bear in mind the parliamentary answer that he gave me recently. In one he said that it was not envisaged that there would be any further cuts in quota after this year, taking account of those that have already been announced. In another he said that surpluses had, to a large extent, been eliminated in the dairy sector. Given that that is the case, we must ensure that there are no cuts in quota as a result of the Mülder judgment.

Farmers who now believe that they have a stable position should not find suddenly that further unexpected cuts are made in 1989 and 1990. It is up to the Commission to find some other way if it is necessary to recompense farmers who went out of production in 1978 rather than take it out on the farmers who are still in production and who have been led to believe that the position has been fixed for the foreseeable future.

I welcome a letter sent by Mr. O. J. Williams, the prospective Conservative candidate for the European Parliament constituency of Mid and West Wales, to the Minister in September in which he stated that in 1984 only 65 per cent. of hardship cases were met. Not every farmer who suffered hardship received benefit. It is important that we should remember that when we are dealing with the Mülder case. We should therefore take a fair, but restrictive, attitude towards the applications from farmers who went out of production as long ago as 1978.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): I commend the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett). That is not something that I normally do, but at least he was the only individual on the Government Back Benches to commit himself and his support to this evening's proposal. I congratulate him on that.

I was surprised by the attitude adopted by the Minister when he opened the debate. I was also surprised by the comments of the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) who followed him this evening, but who preceded him in office. They both spent some considerable time hand-wringing and bemoaning the evils of the quota system and the common agricultural policy. I have to remind them that it was the Conservative Government who took us into the European Community, who accepted the common agricultural policy and who for the past nine years have been the stewards of British interests in the European Community. If there are any deficiencies in the quality of the agreements——

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to finish this sentence and make this point, I will give way, as I think that he has a valid intervention to make. However, at least he should have the courtesy to allow me to finish the point that I am making.

If there are any defects in the agreements coming from Europe at the moment, we know who is responsible for them. The British Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food represents British interests in Brussels.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman go on the record and agree that, as a result of the referendum, the Labour Government ensured that we stayed in Europe and, furthermore, renegotiated on terms that have turned out to be less than satisfactory?

Mr. Davies: That is irrelevent to this evening's debate. My point is that for the past nine years all the agreements made in Brussels have been made with the agreement of successive British Ministers. There are two of them here tonight who have bemoaned and criticised the quota system—the present Minister attempted to suggest that there would be some benefit from quotas—but they have been responsible for the implementation of the quota system in Britain. We should not forget that.

We have had a very wide-ranging debate, and I was surprised at just how wide-ranging it was. Indeed, the contribution from the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland) was quite entertaining, as is normally the case. I hope that we did not keep him from his dinner for too long.

The Mülder case and the judgment that resulted from it receives our support for two very good reasons. First, the outgoers scheme, as it was introduced in 1978, was known to be a temporary scheme. The Minister was suggesting to the Under-Secretary that a Labour Government were in office at the time. That is true. I hope that I am showing the degree of consistency that my party has always shown on these matters in endorsing the action taken by that Government in 1978. It was a temporary scheme, and it would be quite wrong for individuals who voluntarily involved themselves in those outgoers schemes now to be penalised. Therefore, we support the principle that was developed in the Mülder case. Secondly, the principle of the violation of legitimate expectations was the basis on which the judgment was made.

We supported the Minister's initiatives on set-aside. It is important that the principles developed in this case are seen to be supported by all parties in the House. Otherwise, initiatives such as the one that he is now taking under set-aside could be in jeopardy if farmers felt that their legitimate interests would be prejudiced in two, three, four or five years' time—God forbid that quotas on cereals would be introduced—and they would be reluctant to enter into set-aside agreements. For those reasons, we support the principles of the judgment in the Mülder case.

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is a fundamental difference between a temporary scheme, whereby the scheme itself is not supposed to last for ever, and the temporary exodus of individual farmers? In the case that we are discussing tonight, the farmers themselves decided to go out of milk production. There is a great difference between whether the scheme was temporary and whether the farmers' cessation of milk production was temporary.

Mr. Davies: I understand the distinction that the hon. Gentleman is trying to make, but, as I understand it, the temporary scheme was clearly intended to take farmers out of milk production for a limited period. That was the nature of the scheme and the basis on which entrants into the scheme signed various agreements.

I support the principles involved, but I have some doubts about the implementation of the scheme. I understand that in September, when the Commission was considering the matter, it estimated that 1 million tonnes of quota would be required to meet applications under the scheme. The scheme now before us provides for only half that figure: only 500,000 tonnes of additional quota will be made available. Will the Minister square that circle and tell us how he proposes to deal with it? If there are more applicants than quota, will he come back and suggest that more quota be found? Will he enforce some percentage agreement, take applications on the basis of first come, first served, or will he reduce the amounts available? Those are serious questions and I hope the Minister will tell us how he proposes to deal with them when he replies to the debate. They are particularly important for Britain because the British dairy industry was as prepared as that of any other country in Europe voluntarily to involve itself in the 1978 scheme.

I draw the attention of the House to the appendix that accompanies the motion. It refers to the number of applicants for cessation in the various countries of the European Community. In the United Kingdom there were 5,694 beneficiaries of the milk non-marketing premium and 2,510 beneficiaries in the dairy herd conversion scheme. In total, more than 8,000 British farmers participated in the schemes. The Under-Secretary agrees. I am grateful for that because I have here a comment which he made in the explanatory memorandum on the European Community legislation. He said:

> "The United Kingdom accounted for a high percentage of the production surrendered under Regulation 1078/77 and will wish to see this reflected in the allocation of any additional quota."

British farmers provided 10 per cent. of production relinquished under those schemes, with 8,000 of them participating. A court judgment now makes quotas available to two Dutch individuals who took court action. When the Minister replies, I want him to say how the proposals will affect the 8,000 British farmers who took advantage of the 1978 scheme. He should have the answer readily available.

I refer the Minister to the detailed translation available in the Vote Office, which sets out the criteria for eligibility for entry into the scheme. One has been included quite deliberately to exclude not only British farmers but a large number of European farmers. It states that they had to have > "applied in vain to the Member State's competent authority for a reference quantity between 31.3.1984 and 31.7.1988."

The Ministry has records of all the applications lodged with it for quota between 31 March 1984 and 31 July 1988. The Minister is shaking his head, either because he does not have the records or because he is not prepared to agree to the provision. If the latter, it is a pity that he did not say so during his speech. If the former—that he does not have details of those who applied—it means that 8,000 British farmers eligible, in theory, for admission to the scheme cannot apply because the Ministry does not have records of their applications.

Mr. MacGregor: It is the latter case. I opposed that provision in the Commission's proposals. I am glad to say that it does not now appear that it will be included.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Davies: I share the delight of Conservative Members. However, it is somewhat remiss of the Minister not to say that what appear in the document as the conditions that will apply do not meet with his agreement, and that the House is being asked to take note not of this document but of an amended document. We do not know what those amendments will be. I like to think that the right hon. Gentleman treats the House with a degree of integrity. He should be prepared to say how the document will be amended and how the criteria will apply.

As the Minister has volunteered that snippet of information, I shall press him further. Will he give an assurance that the criteria will not have to be met?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman knows that there is qualified majority voting. It is not open to one Minister to give an absolute assurance on how negotiations will end. I said that I opposed the proposal, and I have support for that. I do not think that it will be in the final scheme.

Mr. Davies: I am grateful to the Minister for that concession. I shall test him once more—[Interruption.] We do not often have time to debate these matters. If Conservative Members want to take me on, I shall be happy to take them on during the remaining 22 minutes. I have legitimate points to make and these matters must be properly debated in the House. We have already had one important admission from the Minister, and I want one more.

If there is to be a similar provision—that to meet the eligibility criteria applicants will have had to have lodged their applications with the Ministry between 31 March 1984 and 31 July 1988—in the light of the Minister's reservations, will he assure us that there are adequate records of any British farmers who made applications verifying that they lodged applications during the relevant period? That appears to me to be a simple and straightforward question. If the Minister will give the undertaking that that information is available in his Department, I shall be happy with that.

A number of questions were asked by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), the answers to which we would be interested to hear. We, too, have a number of questions. How is the quota to be apportioned; and what percentage of the additional quota does the Minister believe will be available to the United Kingdom? How many applications have so far been made? How many applications are held by his Department? If the criteria discussed earlier are to be enforced, how many applications have been made? How many of those applicants would meet the necessary criteria? How many British dairy farmers, who took advantage of the two outgoers schemes in 1978, would be eligible for this scheme if it were accepted as it presently stands? Those are specific questions which we are entitled to have answered.

The Minister was very candid when he said that the Commission had been forced into taking this initiative —if we can call it that—which was reactive and for which we expressedd our support. Of course, that was the minimum that was compatible with the judgment. We do not criticise the Government for the way in which they have presented this or for their behaviour so far. However, for all of us, it is a sorry reminder of the inadequacies of the common agricultural policy, and it should remain a spur both to the Government and to Opposition to achieve a radical reform of that policy. That is the real lesson to be learnt from this debate.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): I am surprised that the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) said that everything should have been cut and dried before we came into the Chamber; if it had been, all the speeches in the debate would have been worthless and useless, and there would have been no point in having the debate. The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who asked for the debate to be split into two halves, would also have been wasting his time. The hon. Member has gone, but he will be here again. The Scrutiny Committee asked for the debate so that the Minister could get the flavour of opinion in the House on this important issue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) began with an intervention saying that we could perhaps change the rules altogether; that has been taken up and, of course, has been brought to my right hon. Friend's attention.

The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) covered many of the matters which were subsequently reinforced. Initially, he asked what the attitude was of other member states. He named Germany, Denmark and the Mediterranean countries. He wisely chose three divergent opinions. The Germans want a less restrictive scheme than we do. They want to allow in, perhaps, all the people who were excluded all those years ago, and they want to allow in part-time farmers. The Danes support my right hon. Friend in wanting a more restrictive scheme. I am not sure whether the Danes support the Germans in the introduction of part-time farmers, but we certainly do not.

The southern and Mediterranean countries are asking, as the hon. Member for Caerphilly has done, for a renegotiation, a payback: "Let us do a deal. What will we get out of it?" Perhaps we could have expected such attitudes.

The hon. Member for South Shields said that, when and if quotas are reallocated, they should be non-negotiable. My right hon. Friend has already said that if those quotas are reallocated, he will try to ensure that they are not transferrable and non-negotiable. It is a special scheme with special quotas and I hope that we can draw up special rules.

The hon. Members for South Shields and for Ceredigion and Pembroke (Mr. Howells) also asked whether quotas will go on for ever and whether there will be Euro-trading in them. The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke also asked whether there will be a milk shortage after 1992; whether there will be transnational quotas and whether British dairy farmers will be able to compete on equal terms. I can only answer yes to the last question. The Minister and previous Ministers have done their best and have succeeded in ensuring that our farmers can compete on equal terms. I would need to look into the crystal ball to be able to give the hon. Gentleman any reasonable answers to the rest of his questions. Perhaps he can have a word with Merlin when he pops home.

I should like to reinforce what my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland) said about my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling). The work that my right hon. Friend did during the introduction of quotas is now being recognised. I have been to farmers' meetings where they have said straight out that they did not realise that it would all turn out as well as it has—I am sure that at the time my right hon. Friend knew that it would. It is because of my right hon. Friend's hard work that we now have such a sensible system.

My right hon. Friend will be reassured to know that my right hon. Friend the Minister is following in his footsteps by hounding the Italians at every stage. The only way in which we can guarantee that British farmers are not disadvantaged is to ensure that all the member states of the EC stick to the rules that are imposed by a qualified majority or a unanimous vote. My right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale said that the court judgment was grotesque, and since then many people have supported that statement.

I have already said that this is a special quota dealing with a special category. The hon. Member for Caerphilly said that the terms of the quota should have been chiselled on stone in black and white to prevent alterations. I am sure that he will accept that all the terms will be the subject of negotiation in Brussels during the long hours of deliberations.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be highly desirable if the European Court of Justice decisions could be attributable to the judgments made by individual judges? Then we would know who made the majority decisions in that court.

Mr. Thompson: It might help my hon. Friend, but it would not help me. It would not alter the case. I shall not be led down that path tonight—perhaps one afternoon in the Smoking Room.

The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) left the Chamber after advocating what I would have called, to provoke him had he been present, a free market in milk. However, as he is absent, I shall not bother.

The hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) mentioned costs. He will have read the financial implications given in the explanatory memorandum:

> "The Commission estimates the cost of increasing the Community reserve, measured in disposal terms, at 90 MECU (£59·9m). In addition the 0·5 per cent. reduction in co-responisbility levy will reduce receipts by 20 MECU (£13·3m) giving a total cost of 110 MECU (·73·2m). Against this is set the savings of 74 MECU (£49·3m) from the reduction in the intervention support price for butter leaving an overall deficit for the proposals of 36 MECU (£24m)."

However, my right hon. Friend and others in the Council are striving to neutralise the effects of that half a million tonnes of butter as much as possible.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: How?

Mr. Thompson: How unusual. I turn, expecting my hon. Friend to be extending his hand. I move on.

The kind contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) was most welcome. He spoke clearly for the dairy farmers in his constituency.

As to the remarks of the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), we agree that in Britain, 8,000 farmers took up the various outgoers' schemes. In Europe alone, 6 million tonnes of butter were removed, and in Great Britain we took out 20 per cent. of our production. How many farmers will want to return under the scheme is not known, but those in Great Britain who satisfy the conditions when they finally emerge amended and not unamended—and I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the satisfaction, which word I do not use in any derogatory sense, of saying that they will not be unamended—will be able to join the scheme, as will all European members.

Mr. Ron Davies: For the sake of the accuracy of the record, will the Minister confirm that his Department has accurate records of those applicants who participated in the two outgoers schemes in 1978 and who, after the introduction of quotas, subsequently made quota applications?

Mr. Thompson: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a categorical answer to his question this evening. I shall take it up with my officials and see exactly what the situation is. It is no use doing the work twice. We must first see how the scheme as amended turns out.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I refer to a constituency case that I thought was dead—that concerning Eric Lodge. The Minister may recall that Mr. Lodge's land was only good for milk production because of previous opencasting. Subsidence wrecked his cow house and all his feeding sheds, and by the time the board put that right, the quota was introduced—so he had a marvellous farm and cow house but no cows. That was because of the quota system. He made a quota application but was turned down. Is it possible that the new provision will allow him to enter the scheme again?

Mr. Thompson: Distressing though the case is, I do not think that that gentleman will fall within the ambit of the scheme. My hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke mentioned the 64 per cent. of hardship cases—cases like that of the hon. Gentleman's friend—that were initially turned down. I do not think that I can give the hon. Gentleman any hope, but I shall look into the matter if he will write to me about it. I shall also write to the hon. Member for Caerphilly if I can get together a reasonable and concrete letter without undue expenditure of time and money. Once the document has been amended and has passed through the Council, we shall have a clearer idea of the answers that he has asked for.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 8108/88 on milk and milk products and of the Government's intention to pursue agreement which meets the requirements of the European Court's judgement while containing costs and ensuring that the effectiveness of milk quotas is maintained.

New Zealand Butter

11.25 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 8961/88 on New Zealand butter and of the Government's intention to pursue agreement to these proposals which meet the aim of establishing arrangements for the continued access of New Zealand butter on special terms for the period 1989-92 in a way which represents a reasonable balance between the interests of those involved.

The document contains the Commission's proposals for dealing with future arrangements for the import of New Zealand butter into this country. The treaty of accession to the Community, in recognition of our traditional trading links with New Zealand, provided that decreasing quantities of New Zealand butter could be imported over a five-year period at a reduced rate of import levy. The treaty also provided that the arrangements could be extended by unanimous decision of the Council of Ministers, acting on the basis of a Commission proposal.

The importance to New Zealand of its butter exports to this country was acknowledged by Community Heads of Government meeting in Dublin in 1975, and the special arrangements have been extended by the Council on a number of occasions since then. The quantities of New Zealand butter permitted to enter the United Kingdom at the preferential rate of levy have been reduced from just over 165,800 tonnes in 1973 to 74,500 tonnes in 1988, reflecting the continuing decline in United Kingdom butter consumption.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): What has been the percentage reduction in the consumption of butter in this country since the last time the New Zealand quota was decided?

Mr. MacGregor: I have not the precise figures for the last three years. I think that the reduction is between 5 and 7·5 per cent., but I shall check the figure, and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary will respond at the end of the debate.

That substantial and continuing decline in consumption—it is probably rather larger than my figures suggest—is one of the problems facing the dairy sector as a whole.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): In 1976 the Commission recommended that the figure for New Zealand imports should be 25 per cent. but, because consumption has fallen, New Zealand butter now accounts for 37 per cent. of the market.

Mr. MacGregor: Those figures are not quite right, but I shall deal with my hon. Friend's point later.

The present arrangements for New Zealand butter imports expire at the end of the year. The document explains the Commission's proposals for the continuation of imports between 1989 and 1992. The proposals have two main elements. First, a cut of 10,000 tonnes in the quantity of imports, to 64,500 tonnes, is proposed for 1989, followed by equal annual reductions to 55,000 tonnes in 1992. Secondly, it is proposed to reduce the rate of levy from 25 to 15 per cent. of the butter intervention price from 1 January 1989.

The proposed reduction in the quantity of New Zealand butter imports over the next four years reflects the trend since accession and the continuing fall in overall United Kingdom butter consumption. The proposed reduction in the rate of import levy would partly offset the loss in revenue to New Zealand from the cut in quantity. The Commission's proposals would therefore be consistent with the Community's international obligations. They imply a reduction of 26 per cent. in New Zealand imports by 1992, which is twice the reduction in Community milk production since the introduction of milk quotas, and more than double the annual percentage rate of reduction in butter imports under the previous arrangements. However, in terms of the total United Kingdom butter market, our estimates suggest that if the Commission's proposals were adopted, New Zealand supplies would represent about the same share of the market as they do under the present arrangements.

The Commission's proposals would ensure continuity of supply of New Zealand butter to the British consumer. We believe that it would be unlikely to have any significant effect on retail prices, or any significant adverse effect on the United Kingdom and Community taxpayer. Now that the support arrangements in the milk sector have been tightened and intervention stocks substantially reduced, it is unlikely that significant quantities of butter will enter public storage in the foreseeable future. Therefore, the budgetary costs of the concession to New Zealand will be considerably lower than might previously have been the case.

I should like to emphasise one point about which there is still considerable misunderstanding among United Kingdom farmers. As New Zealand and all other butter imports were excluded from the original calculation of United Kingdom dairy quotas—the original basis was past production by our own producers—whatever decisions are taken about the future arrangements, they will have no effect on United Kingdom quotas. It is important to stress that point, because there is a great deal of misunderstanding about it. Some people believe that if New Zealand butter imports were reduced even further than is provided for in the Commission's proposals that would lead to an increase in United Kingdom dairy quotas. It would not.

I have a few words to say about the amendment. The concerns that are expressed there are fully met by the Commission's proposals.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Some members of the Council of Agriculture Ministers have criticised the package and may have been trying to unravel it. How does the Minister view his role in regard to those critics? Is he actively promoting the package, and will he continue to do so?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall make my position on that clear at the end of my speech. It would be more natural to do so in that context. There are many varying points of view on both this and many other proposals that are before the Council of Ministers. Criticism has been voiced by many Ministers, often from conflicting standpoints. Some of them are inevitably linking the butter proposals with the sheepmeat proposals, because New Zealand is involved in both. My view is that there is no legal link between the two, but some Ministers are making that link. The sheepmeat proposals are being criticised widely by nearly all Ministers—again from many different points of view. There is nothing unusual about that.

As for some of the concerns that have been expressed —not least in the amendment, which has not been called, but which highlights some of the concerns—I believe that the Commission's proposals meet them. It is important to remember, as I have stressed throughout, that butter consumption in the United Kingdom has been falling for a number of years, and I expect it to continue to fall. If the proposal is adopted, I expect the New Zealand share of the total United Kingdom butter market to fall only very slightly—so slightly that its share will be about the same as it is now over the four years of the agreement. I expect the New Zealand share of the packet butter market to continue to increase somewhat, as it has done in recent years. Consumer choice would therefore be broadly the same.

As for the consistency of the proposal with the Community's commitments at the start of the Uruguay round, which we shall discuss in the mid-term review in Montreal next week, it could be argued that as the New Zealand arrangement is a unilateral concession by the Community there is no legal obligation on the Community to maintain it after it runs out at the end of this year. The New Zealanders are, however, perfectly at liberty to appeal to the spirit of these undertakings to justify continued access. It is in any event reasonable that the proposal should provide for a continuing reduction in the New Zealand quota in line with what has happened in the past and with the continuing decline in our butter market. The proposal is consistent with the Community's commitments on the Uruguay round and, as my hon. Friends will have noticed, it is endorsed by the New Zealand Government.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): My right hon. Friend is trying to justify the proposal, but in view of the dramatically changed circumstances since we joined the Community, the advent of quotas and the reduction in butter consumption, can we continue to justify the substantial import of New Zealand butter, bearing in mind the loss of jobs in creameries throughout the country and the grave problems faced by many people in creameries and other areas of milk and butter manufacture?

Mr. MacGregor: New Zealand has accepted reductions in British imports of its butter recently in line with reductions in butter consumption. Under these proposals there will be a rather sharper decline in butter imports than there will be in milk quotas in the Community. Any reductions in imports from New Zealand, however, would not have any effect on quotas and, therefore, on creameries.

We have still to take a decision on these matters in Council. In theory it will be done before the end of the calendar year, but the recent progress in the Council of Ministers leads me to suggest that we might be being optimistic in thinking that we will reach agreement before the end of the calendar year. This is therefore an opportune moment for the House to express its views. I suspect that, in contrast to the previous debate, we shall hear some contrary views on this subject, just as very different points of view are being expressed in the Council.

Many interests are involved—Community producers, consumers and taxpayers—and there are the Community's obligations to New Zealand. The Government believe that the Commission's proposals represent a reasonable balance between them, and that is the point of view that I have been expressing in the Council.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I have to tell the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the names of the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) and his hon. Friends.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): The Minister rightly said that this is probably an issue which will prove quite divisive and lively. We have had some good debates on it. It stirs many emotions. I do not apologise for that. The House knows that politics is not always determined by logic. Sometimes it is determined by emotion.

Many of us feel that we owe a debt of gratitude to the New Zealand people. Some of us remember that, in the early 1970s, when we were arguing the case against our entry into the EEC, one of our greatest worries was what the status of New Zealand would be. Many of us were very pleased that we were able to achieve protocol 18 of the 1972 accession legislation, which gave some continuity and hope to New Zealand dairying.

The New Zealanders have adapted remarkably. They now send considerably less butter to Britain than they did in 1972. According to a parliamentary answer given to the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) on 2 February, in 1986, 27 per cent. of the United Kingdom butter market was provided by New Zealand. I use the Government's figures.

As we consider the argument and the problems that the Minister faces in negotiations in the Council of Ministers, we hope that he will fight the New Zealand corner—and we wish him well.

I regret that there is a considerable amount of misinformation—I use that word and not "disinformation"—about this matter and regret the hostility from the National Farmers Union of England and Wales, the Milk Marketing Board and the Farmers Union of Wales, which feel that the New Zealand Government and people are being treated too generously. I do not share that view.

I remind the House and the NFU that farmers in New Zealand produce that butter without a single penny of subsidy and that they can send that butter halfway round the world and jump a tariff barrier of about £500 per tonne, and still compete with European butter. We are talking about a very efficient argriculture, which is not protected.

In enunciating such views, I take comfort from the fact that I have the support not only of many of my hon. Friends but of hon. Members of all parties. I was pleased to see early-day motion 543 in the last Parliament. It was sponsored by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) and others, and attracted over 200 signatures. I note that there is an amendment to this motion that broadly goes along the same lines and urges the Government to stand up and fight for the New Zealand point of view.

There is considerable misunderstanding about this matter. As I go around the country and talk to farmers and at NFU group meetings, I find the misconception that if we could get rid of the New Zealanders, our milk quota would be increased. Therefore, it was rewarding to hear the Minister state the position categorically. We cannot repeat it too often. The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) repeated it clearly in a written answer on 8 May 1986:

> "The United Kingdom milk quota, like those of other member states, is based on past national production levels with no account being taken of imports from New Zealand or any other source."—[Official Report, 8 May 1986; Vol. 97, c. 238.]

I have repeated that because it needs repeating as the message has still not got across, and it is because the message has not got across that there are so many misconceptions.

Another misconception is that we guarantee a market for New Zealand butter. Of course we do not. What we do guarantee is the opportunity of entry for New Zealand butter. Once the butter is in this country, it must compete with every other brand or make of butter, whatever its origin, on a strictly commercial basis. People buy New Zealand butter because by and large they want to buy New Zealand butter. They do not buy it because there is no alternative. The brand name "Anchor" is one of the premier brand names in this country. I hesitate to mention this, but I think that I should remind hon. Members of what the Prime Minister said on 19 May:

> "People here still wish to purchase that country's butter. —[Official Report, 19 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 1088.]

It would be wrong for us to take steps that are too rigorous and to stop people having the choice of New Zealand butter. We in the Labour party believe that people should have the freedom to choose that brand of butter.

As we have heard, the consumption of butter has been falling in recent years. I suggest that, if we took draconian steps and banned New Zealand butter, as some responsible people advocate, consumption of butter would fall even further.

As with many other products, demand for butter is sustained and stimulated by advertising. I think that about £8 million a year is spent on advertising it in Britain, and of that amount, £6 million is contributed by the New Zealand Dairy Board. If New Zealand butter was not coming into Britain, that shortfall in advertising would not be made up and the result would be an even steeper fall in the consumption of butter in Britain. Overall, British butter producers would not benefit.

Another reason for being careful about restricting the access of New Zealand butter—the Ministers touched upon this—is the whole issue of the current GATT negotiations. I am mindful, as I know the Minister is, that the next round of the Uruguay talks will take place on 5 December in Montreal. The spirit of most countries is that world agricultural trade should be liberalised and subsidies reduced, with resulting benefit to Third-world and other countries. That spirit is correct.

The EEC has given a commitment to liberalise trade and it would seem strange if at the same time we were leaning towards more protectionism by restricting the entry of New Zealand butter. As I have said, just over one quarter, 27 per cent., of the United Kingdom butter market is in the hands of the New Zealanders. They have obtained it through competition and brand loyalty. The Opposition are committed to the entry of New Zealand butter to Britain.

I realise that the Minister is engaged in a complicated set of negotiations involving not only butter. As he says, there is also lamb, which is covered by a firm GATT agreement. The issue of top fruit was discussed earlier this year. I hope that the message he takes from the House is that the overwhelming majority of hon. Members—including all Opposition Members and probably a majority of Conservative Members—feel that it is his duty to go to Europe and fight the other Ministers on behalf of the New Zealand producers. That is the will and the desire of the British people.

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): I beg to move, at the end of the Question to add,

> 'but much regrets the restriction on consumer choice for British housewives caused by the proposed further reduction of 25 per cent. in the New Zealand quota, and urges Her Majesty's Government to consider whether the proposal is consistent with the pledge given by all the participating nations at the start of the Uruguay round of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade that no new barriers to trade would be introduced while the negotiations continued.'.

I hope that my hon. Friends who have come into the Chamber clutching their briefs from the National Farmers Union will go back to their constituencies echoing what has been said about the effect that any cut in quota will have on our dairy farmers. It is not only our dairy farmers who will be affected, but our arable farmers too. I am glad to say that I have many arable farmers in my constituency. We should never talk about milk or milk products without having regard to the interests of the arable farmers who produce the feed grains that go to the dairy herds.

For the life of me I can see no prospect of any arable or dairy farmer benefiting in the slightest by the proposed cut in butter imports. Surely it is common sense that not a tonne, not an ounce, not a pat of New Zealand butter can come to Britain unless the British people say that they wish to buy it. No one can dispute that. Therefore, we are talking about an attack on the preferences of the British people.

The New Zealand Dairy Board has for decades been advertising butter and promoting it in a way that the Milk Marketing Board has failed to do. It is a disgrace that the Milk Marketing Board insists that we must agree to cuts in the imports of New Zealand butter when it has done so little for decades to promote butter and has left it to the New Zealanders to do the task.

The New Zealand Dairy Board has not only advertised butter and promoted it for years, but has gone out of its way to blend a type of butter to suit the British palate. It has taken endless pains to achieve that end. According to all the market research, the majority of people prefer to eat that kind of butter, which is blended to suit their palate. Therefore, if there is a further cut in the amount of butter that we shall be allowed to eat of our own choice, that is an attack on freedom of choice. That is something that we treasure and wish to promote.

I know that my right hon. Friend will go to the Council of Ministers and fight hard for our consumers. I hope that he will draw the attention of his colleagues to protocol 18 of the treaty of accession, to which he referred earlier on. It is because of that protocol that we are required to import a declining quantity of New Zealand butter.

That article had two parts to it. One was that we would accept a decline in the amount of New Zealand butter that we were allowed to eat, and the other was a pledge by the Common Market not to do anything to frustrate New Zealand from seeking markets elsewhere. We debated that for a long time. Those of us who can remember those awful dreary debates that we had about our accession to the Community will remember that New Zealand butter was one of the main sticking points, and we were given an assurance that the EEC would do nothing to make it difficult for New Zealand to find export markets elsewhere.

What happened? Our butter production went up, and when New Zealand sought to sell butter to Hong Kong, an island without a single dairy cow, as far as I know, and almost on the doorstep of New Zealand—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Well, we live in a small world. If I have my geography right, New Zealand is nearer to Hong Kong than to the Common Market. However, when New Zealand tried to promote the sale of butter at a competitive price to Hong Kong, in went butter from the Common Market, dumped at a ridiculous price, so New Zealand lost that market. New Zealand went to Moscow and sought a market there, and again butter from the EEC was dumped and it lost that market. Wherever the New Zealand Dairy Board has sought an outlet for its products, the EEC has gone in and denied it that market.

The Common Market has broken the pledge that it gave under protocol 18 of the treaty of accession. I hope that my right hon. Friend will emphasise that when he mets his colleagues. New Zealand has cut its dairy production again and again, although it is the lowest cost producer in the world. It has fought hard to find markets elsewhere, but every time that it has done so it has been thwarted by the funds—raised from our money—of the Community.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will emphasise a point that was mentioned by the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) and is included in the amendment—the fact that the Common Market gave a further pledge at the beginning of the Uruguay round not to impose any fresh barrier upon trade with third countries until the completion of the GATT negotiations. If the Community goes ahead with that further barrier against New Zealand's trade with us, it will be in breach of that undertaking. I hope that the Community will not contemplate that step until the GATT negotiations are complete.

I am sure that the House and the consumers of this country will wish my right hon. Friend well in his negotiations. I hope that our farmers also will wish him well, in the knowledge that they cannot lose by New Zealand continuing to send butter to this country. The promotion of butter needs to be financed by the New Zealand Dairy Board to sustain our dairy farmers. It is a paradox that our dairy farmers have in the past gained as a result of the board's skills in promoting butter in the past few decades.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will give the firmest assurances that he will argue as strenuously as he can for the interests of the British people.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I do not have an interest to declare, but I am married to a New Zealander and breed New Zealanders in captivity under licence in this country part-time.

I was in New Zealand throughout the 1960s as the New Zealand equivalent of Robin Day, although not as well paid. I remember a series of British Ministers, both Conservative and Labour, coming out throughout the 1960s. I interviewed most of them and on television and to the public generally they gave solemn and sincere assurances that New Zealand interests would be safeguarded and defended by the British Government, that New Zealand would have continued access to the British market and that the traditional and close trading relationship would be maintained. Those assurances were given by Minister after Minister into the 1970s, when we finally went into the EEC. Perhaps New Zealand was a little trusting in heeding those assurances without demanding more definite quid pro quos, but they were certainly intended at the time. I regard it, therefore, as a matter of honour, and the curtailment of New Zealand access, which is implicit in these proposals, is wrong and immoral.

The Minister, whose work has been impressive in many other spheres, has not fought has strenuously as I and many of his hon. Friends should have liked to defend New Zealand's access to this market. The reduction in quota from 165,000 tonnes in 1973 to 55,000 tonnes in 1992 is a 26 per cent. reduction on 1988 imports and is a faster rate of reduction than before.

The butter negotiations have been tied in with the sheepmeat treaty, which was a treaty obligation. They should not have been tied together. The Minister's position has been more ambiguous than it should have been. His defence of New Zealand interests has not been as strong as I should have liked. I can understand that, because it is not a happy position for a Conservative Minister of Agriculture to be unpopular with those involved in agriculture. By reducing milk output, he has not been in the happy position of his right hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker) when he was Minister of Agriculture.

It is wrong that the National Farmers Union, individual farmers and Conservative Back-Bench Members should attack New Zealand access. Their argument is misguided, as the Minister has said. It is wrong even to insinuate that there should be a reduction of the New Zealand quota. A reduction of New Zealand butter imports would not lead to a better milk quota for the United Kingdom. If there were to be an increased quota, it would be followed pari passu by the other members of the EEC. The effect in the United Kingdom would be minuscule. There would be an increase in the price of milk and, therefore, an increase in the price of butter. The consumption of butter would decrease and the only beneficiaries would be the margarine manufacturers, not the farmers who are attacking New Zealand access. It seems that we would be going to a great deal of trouble to benefit the margarine manufacturers.

The Minister should have fought more strenuously in Britain and in the rest of Europe. It is clear that we do not have a good deal. I warn the Minister that there will be anger in the House. That is shown clearly by early-day motion No. 543 of the previous Session, which was signed by over 200 Members, and by the amendment which has been moved tonight. There will be anger in the country as well if the Minister does not respond. He must fight to the utmost to prevent any undermining that could follow from what has already happened.

We have a moral obligation to New Zealand. Furthermore, there is a consumer issue. Consumers want New Zealand butter. They like New Zealand butter and they buy it. They are accustomed to the taste of New Zealand butter. Consumer organisations want sustained access for New Zealand so that consumers can buy the butter that they want and should be able to secure. It is unreasonable for the Minister to say that, because consumers want New Zealand butter and because the product can hold its share of the market, it is legitimate to reduce access in order to increase market share because of consumer preference. That is a tortuous argument.

As has been said, New Zealand is the only substantial advertiser of butter. Of the £8 million that was spent on advertising butter last year, £6 million was spent by New Zealand. Against that, £16 million is spent on advertising margarine. It is clear that the consumer wants New Zealand butter, and as a result of advertising New Zealand is sustaining the demand for butter generally.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: What is the hon. Gentleman's attitude to Icelandic cod in Grimsby?

Mr. Mitchell: That is a silly question at this moment. It is irrelevant as well. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman regards it as a humorous question. In fact, we want Icelandic cod in Grimsby because we want to maintain the processing side of the industry. Similarly, the consumer wants New Zealand butter. I do not see the relevance of the hon. Gentleman's question, but he has his answer.

This is a trade issue as New Zealand is one of the few countries in the world with which Britain trades successfully. Our annual trade with New Zealand amounts to £1 billion—visibles and invisibles—and we are actually in surplus. That is a unique phenomenon for Britain. At a time when we have such a horrendous trade deficit, why should we allow a substantial market for British goods and services to be undermined by the reductions in quota that are implicit in the document? We should support our markets and our friends.

As the hon Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) said, protocol 18 of the treaty of accession gave solemn undertakings that the EEC would not frustrate New Zealand's efforts to develop alternative markets and to diversify its sales. That undertaking has not been kept in any respect. Wherever New Zealand has tried to develop alternative markets for butter, wherever it has got its butter exports going, it has been counteracted by large-scale dumping of EEC butter. That was done not only to compete with New Zealand's exports, but to depress the price of butter on the world market. The solemn obligation has in no way been sustained by the EEC. Having failed in that crucial respect, although New Zealand took the plunge and agreed to diversify its markets, to start now to reduce New Zealand's access to this market is unreasonable.

New Zealand's share of the British butter market went down from one third in 1970 to about 27 per cent. in 1986. Despite all my efforts to the contrary—and I have been magnificent—the butter market has shrunk. It is half what it was when we entered the EEC. New Zealand's trade has diversified enormously. Nine tenths of its trade came here before the war. Now nine tenths of it goes elsewhere, but 45 per cent. of New Zealand's butter export earnings are still made in this market. It is crucial to the New Zealand economy because 14 per cent. of New Zealand's total exports come from the dairy industry.

Curtailment of the quota will be a bitter blow for an economy that is facing real difficulties. For a highly efficient primary producer, which developed as this country's farm in the antipodes, it will be a bitter blow to farmers whose standards of living have been cut drastically and who have been hit hard by what has happened to world agricultural trade. This will be a further blow which we in this country should not countenance.

Why should we cut New Zealand's access to this market in any respect? I regard the Minister's stand on this as equivocal. What economic sense does it make to penalise New Zealand—the most efficient producer in the world, with which we trade successfully and in surplus—and to be forced to buy over-priced, inefficiently produced butter from the EEC, from nations with which we are in a horrendous trade deficit, which is getting worse every year? The proposal to cut quotas will be a serious blow to our trade with New Zealand. The proposal is a moral and political folly of national self-interest. We should not reduce the quota, as the Minister evisages; we should sustain New Zealand's access as much as we possibly can.

12.7 am

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): There is no point in discussing this issue unless we put it in the context of decision making within the European Community. That lays down the framework of the debate.

It is not an option to preserve the status quo, because the present entitlement lapses at the end of the year and legally the Community could simply say that no butter should be imported if the rules are not renewed. As the original agreement talks about transitional arrangements, that clearly envisaged progressive reductions.

However, it is not an option to seek to wipe New Zealand off the face of the map. There are reasons for that. First, there is a common interest between the Community and New Zealand in trying to maintain prices on the world market. There has been some success. The minimum price was $1,000 per tonne at the start of the year, $1,100 in March and $1,250 in September; it is now being traded at $1,400 and some sales have been concluded at $1,600 per tonne, including sales by the New Zealand Dairy Board. Secondly, in the light of the GATT negotiations, the Community would not be in good order going into those negotiations if it were to introduce the proposed cuts for the New Zealand quota which were out of line with the reductions that had been progressive over previous years.

That is the framework within which the decisions must be taken. A political compromise will be struck and the interest lies in the requirements for the compromise. I believe that the first interest is a continuing choice for the consumer in the United Kingdom and availability of New Zealand butter broadly with the same proportion that we had before, in a declining market place, as all hon. Members have noticed. The second is a fair deal for New Zealand, because, as hon. Members have said, New Zealand has invested in the marketing network in the United Kingdom and put a major proportion of its advertising expenditure into the United Kingdom and is entitled to look for a fair revenue for its producers.

The final requirement is justice for British and European farmers, who have taken significant cuts in their quotas and who feel that all participants in the market place should share that burden, although they have realised a major capital asset in the dairy quotas. The cost of disposing of the surpluses and making the mountains disappear has been borne by the taxpayer as well as by the producer, and sometimes each side in that equation forgets the other.

On that assessment, is the deal fair? The cuts are not draconian; they are not as high as expected. Most people would have punted the Commission's opening bet at around 50,000 tonnes. It is significantly higher than that. The reduction in the levy seeks to compensate in revenue for the cut in quantities sent by New Zealand farmers. In my experience, what matters to farmers is the bottom line of the account. Consumer choice is preserved because the cuts are broadly in line with those that have taken place historically, and the European farmer cannot say that a 14 per cent. cut in the New Zealand quota is not a severe measure.

It has to be emphasised that any other proposal could be worse. What the Commission has put on the table is the best that New Zealand will get. Any amendment will be worse for New Zealand: that is the political reality. It is an illusion to think that a cut in the New Zealand quota will produce one extra gramme for British dairy farmers. The quota will not be redistributed. We could argue that, if New Zealand butter did not come in, perhaps there would be a little extra for everyone across the Community, but even that is very doubtful. I believe that the reaction of the New Zealanders, with all the marketing effort that they have put in, would be to buy continental butter and put it into Anchor packs. There is nothing to prevent them from marketing continental butter in the United Kingdom under the Anchor label.

The market in Europe is not yet in such perfect balance as people suggest. There may be only 100,000 tonnes of unsold butter in public storage. However, liquid skimmed milk is still being subsidised into calves' feed at 53 ecu a tonne, and skimmed milk powder is being subsidised into calves' feed at 650 ecu per tonne. Therefore, it is ridiculous to talk about the market having undergone some miraculous transition to balance. There is still a long way to go. Butter is being subsidised into pastry-making, ice cream and other manufacturing projects.

The proposals represent a balanced view, and, as my right hon. Friend the Minister said, we have to consider them with the lamb and sheepmeat proposals. Most people consider it a package, although the legal status of the two agreements is wholly different—one is a bilateral deal and one is a voluntary restraint within the overall framework of the GATT. With the proposal to cut the New Zealand lamb entitlement to a level still above the historic level of New Zealand shipments—with some limitation on chilled lamb, which in some senses is more sensitive to the United Kingdom market—the Commission has produced a cleverly worked package, which may be one of Commissioner Andriessen's last measures as Agricultural Commissioner before he takes on his new role as Commissioner for External Relations.

This is a well-wrought deal. It is fair to all the parties concerned, given that the Commission had to square a circle containing very conflicting interests. I believe that the housewife has the same proportion of choice that she had before. The European farmer cannot complain that his pain is not shared by others. The combination of the cuts and the levy change for New Zealand maintains the revenue expectations of that country and justifies its input into the promotion of the butter market.

I commend to my right hon. Friend the view that, within the confines of his negotiations, he should seek to promote the deal, as it comes as near as we are likely to get into the practical political circumstances of producing something supportable, even if all parties are not ecstatic about it. It is a well-wrought package and he would do well to defend it as it now exists.

12.14 am

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): The National Farmers Union and the Government appear to be at loggerheads over the issue of New Zealand butter. Perhaps the Minister will explain why. The NFU represents a large number of producers in this country. The NFU's view is also taken by the Milk Marketing Board, which has served the dairy industry well for the past 50 years. It is also the view of the Dairy Trade Federation. They are all agreed that the New Zealand butter quota should be reduced to 40,000 tonnes next year and be abolished by 1992. There is a great deal of disagreement among the unions, the trade, the Milk Marketing Board and the Government. It would be helpful to know why.

There has been a 15-year transitional period and the dairy trade is wondering how long it will continue. Hon. Members on both sides have said that we would not have an additional milk quota if the New Zealand butter quota were abolished.

I should be grateful for clarification on the question of profitability, which is important to British farmers. The Government are duty bound to look after the interests of their dairy farmers. I still believe that we should treat New Zealand gently and allow it to continue to send butter to this country, and, so long as the Minister does his utmost to safeguard the interests of British dairy producers and consumers, he will have the blessing of my party.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I agree with the remarks of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells). I especially agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) said in his outstandingly clear speech.

The House is beginning to realise what a contentious issue this is and always has been. Various arguments are deployed. There are those who say that there should be more, even unlimited, access to New Zealand butter. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) has almost made it his life's work to find every conceivable argument from the bottom of the barrel to criticise the European Community. We are all familiar with that, and it is the gist of the amendment. There are others who say that New Zealand butter imports should be abolished as soon as possible.

Like many hon. Members, I have spent a large part of the past four or five years travelling around the country to speak at farmers' meetings. I often met strong objections to New Zealand butter imports. I discovered that almost all the criticism was based on the false assumption that if those imports were abolished there would somehow be increased quotas for Britain and, possibly, the Community. That is erroneous, and my right hon. Friend has nailed that argument. Many of the cries from farmers and the Milk Marketing Board are based on that erroneous assumption. I hope that we can kill that.

We must put the position of New Zealand imports into its historic context. I well remember that in the early 1970s, when we were negotiating to join the Community—the team was led, I think, by Lord Rippon as he now is—some issues came up time and time again. There was the issue of sugar imports from the developing countries, and there was the issue of New Zealand butter imports. I notice that some of the people who, 15 years ago, insisted on the need to maintain New Zealand's share in the United Kingdom butter market are now saying that it should be eliminated altogether so that perhaps our farmers would get some extra quota. That is a silly argument and one to which we should not listen.

I hope that we shall hear no more from the Opposition about it being wrong to reduce the amount of New Zealand butter that has been imported over the years. I remind Members on the Opposition Front Bench that the amount of New Zealand butter imports decreased during the years of their Government, as it was their Minister who negotiated that decrease.

I feel that the proposal to go down to about 55,000 tonnes in 1992 is about right. I understand that the New Zealanders have said that this is the lowest level that they can accept and, like my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon, I was pleasantly surprised that the Commissioner did not put a somewhat lower figure on it. I believe that it is about right, but I warn the Minister that there will be those in the Council of Ministers who will take this proposed figure as the starting point. I can anticipate the arguments of, perhaps, the French and Irish Ministers, who will use this as a starting point from which to negotiate a significantly lower figure. I hope that my right hon. Friend will support the Commission and resist any suggestions that this figure should be further reduced.

I believe that we have a continuing debt to New Zealand because of what it did to support Britain in two world wars, and we should never forget that. It would be a tragic mistake if we were to sell New Zealand down the river, and we are not doing so with these proposals. As my right hon. Friend said, they will mean that New Zealand's share of our butter market will be more or less maintained. That is the key, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will support the Commission in sticking to these proposals.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in this debate. I have an interest in this matter. The New Zealand dairy products that are imported are processed and prepared for sale at the Anchor Foods factory in Swindon. Some £25 million has been invested in a modern factory, providing excellent working conditions and employing 400 of my constituents. A substantial number of those jobs are for unskilled workers, and, as elsewhere, there is a diminishing number of such jobs in Swindon. There can be little doubt that a reduction of nearly 20,000 tonnes of New Zealand butter during the next four years would mean redundancies among those of my constituents who work for the Anchor Foods company. The loss of £40 million in turnover a year could not easily be replaced by diversification.

Of course, as has been said several times, this is not the final decision of the Community; it is a proposal. Will the Minister give an undertaking that the Government will support this proposal to the full, without the possible consideration of any further concession? If my right hon. Friend is unable to give that commitment or unable to deliver in the negotiations, the viability of the factory in my constituency will be at risk, 400 jobs will be on the line, and to what purpose? It has already been said many times tonight that nothing that happens as a result of the negotiations on New Zealand butter will affect the British farmer one iota. If the total imports of New Zealand butter were distributed throughout the Community, it would give each of our farmers only a couple of extra pints a year.

The housewife has already been mentioned. We should consider what the consumer wants. A survey of more than 1,000 housewives who buy butter was conducted in March and April. It revealed that 84 per cent. of all respondents thought that New Zealand should be able to continue to sell butter in Britain; 9 per cent. disagreed; and 7 per cent. did not know. It revealed that 79 per cent. of all respondents thought the people of Britain should be allowed to buy as much Anchor butter as they want and 54 per cent. of that total expressed their favourable feelings strongly. Do my right hon. and hon. Friends believe in free trade? Do they believe in the consumer's right of free choice in our markets? The survey continued:

> "84 per cent. of all respondents said yes, they did think the British Government should continue to make sure people can buy New Zealand butter in Britain, while 7 per cent. said no and 10 per cent. did not know. Of those 84 per cent., 94 per cent. agreed that the British Government should insist that the Common Market continues to allow people to buy New Zealand butter in Britain. Of those, 30 per cent. expressed their agreement extremely strongly, 31 per cent. very strongly and 30 per cent. fairly strongly."

Is my right hon. Friend the housewife's friend? Will he stick out for the interests of our consumers?

The reduction in the New Zealand butter quota would not increase United Kingdom milk quotas one jot. When the national production levels were originally calculated and the quotas were set, they took no account of New Zealand butter. It is worth repeating what my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) told the Select Committee on Agriculture on 24 February 1987:

> "there is no question that if we did not have the New Zealand butter our quota would in some way be larger; in fact it would not affect the production of farmers, because even if the whole of the New Zealand production was taken over by British butter, all it would mean would be that it would have to come out of our present quota."

One cannot say plainer than that, and my right hon. Friend has repeated that message tonight. Those who believe that that is not the case should read this debate in Hansard and appreciate that crucial point.

The only cut in New Zealand dairy imports that could be justified is that which reflects the national, overall reduction in our consumption of butter. When I intervened in my right hon. Friend's speech, he said that, in the past three years, butter consumption had dropped between 5 and 7·5 per cent. We are being asked to contemplate a reduction, however, of more than 25 per cent. in the New Zealand butter import quota for the next four years. I do not believe that those figures are in phase. What we are being asked to agree tonight is in excess of what equity demands, let alone what our consumers require.

The Government should be prepared to return to the table in Brussels and argue for a better deal for New Zealand butter than that contained in the present proposal. I hope that my right hon. Friend will take note of my objections on behalf of my constituents.

12.29 am

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): This is a sad episode in a long and sorry story. Once again representatives of our Government—one devoted to principles of free trade abroad and non-intervention at home—have put before the House documents that do violence to both. That is a great shame. Earlier, it was pointed out that when we joined the Community in 1973, we entered into a compact on behalf of New Zealand whereby it would be limited in the amount of butter that it could send to Britain. However, in the Dublin declaration annexed to the protocol we agreed that the Community would not deprive New Zealand of essential outlets.

It may be thought ironic—or not, as the case may be—that that provision was contained in a Dublin declaration. During Question Time yesterday the Prime Minister said in respect of other Dublin declarations:

"although the Government of the Republic of Ireland make fine-sounding speeches and statements, they do not always seem to be backed up by the appropriate deeds."—[Official Report, 29 November 1988; Vol. 142, c. 575.]

That accusation can also be made of the Community.

In 1973 we imported about 165,000 tonnes of New Zealand butter. Today the figure is less than half that. Earlier, my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), who seems to be limiting his access to the Chamber—placing himself, unusually, under a voluntary restraint agreement—asked how one could justify continuing New Zealand butter imports. They can be justified because no one is forced to buy New Zealand butter, and imports and sales are determined by consumers. If people did not buy New Zealand butter, not one ounce of it would be imported into this country. New Zealand butter's price is competitive, notwithstanding—and no one has pointed this out—the fact that it attracts a 25 per cent. tariff.

Since 1970 New Zealand's market share has fallen from 33 to 27 per cent. I obtained that figure from a written answer to a question put down by my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett), who asked earlier what the figure was. I know that my hon. Friend is a very busy chap and he may not have noticed that answer to his question.

The reduction in New Zealand butter imports over recent years is significant. I was surprised to hear one of my hon. Friends, who is keen that we should import coal into the United Kingdom from other countries to make our own industry more efficient, take a different line in respect of butter. In much the same way Opposition Members are not keen to see coal imports, but are keen to encourage butter imports. I am sure that that has nothing to do with the demographic and occupational make-up of their constituencies. However, as a representative of some of the finest dairying country in Britain, I can tell the House with complete consistency that, as a believer in free trade, I am convinced New Zealand should continue to enjoy the freest possible access to our markets.

I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), who, in an otherwise lucid and realistic speech, remarked that the proposed cuts were not draconian, when they are the largest cuts yet advanced in relation to New Zealand's market, amounting to 25 per cent. over the four-year period, with a cut of 10,000 tonnes this year alone. Notwithstanding the fact that the levy will be reduced from 25 to 15 per cent. that will not compensate New Zealand for its losses on access, which will lead to an overall fall in income of 16 per cent. It has been pointed out that the levy will lead to no compensating or countervailing benefit for British farmers.

Butter consumption is falling, and no doubt it will continue doing so. One reason is that consumers are having to pay many times more for butter than they would in a free market. In 1973, butter prices were the same as margarine. Today, butter is two and a half times more expensive. The reason is the protection racket that is the common agricultural policy. Farmers have done tremendous damage to their own interests by the vigour with which they have supported agricultural protection.

That has dawned on farmers in New Zealand. The New Zealand farmers union makes it clear that farmers there are not rattling the begging bowls as they are in this country. They are firmly committed to the principles of free trade, because they know that if they endorse protectionist policies other countries will do the same and agricultural markets will become organised as they are in the Community, to everyone's cost—consumers, taxpayers and producers alike.

As has been said many times this evening, the Community has not kept faith with New Zealand. Community dumping has disrupted New Zealand's markets all over the world, and, although we have reduced the accumulated surpluses that have so exacerbated the problem, there is still no guarantee that in the future the Community will not seek to invade the markets which it agreed in 1973 would be left to New Zealand.

The linking of the reduction in butter imports with the restraints on lamb imports does fundamental violence to our principles of free trade, not only in this country, but in the Community and the wider world, under the GATT negotiations. We agreed in the Uruguay round that we would not seek to increase protectionist barriers against third countries, yet that is precisely what we are seeking to do in the extension of voluntary restraint agreements on lamb. Under the GATT treaties, New Zealand should be able to export unlimited quantities of lamb to the Community at a tariff of 20 per cent., but that was limited by a voluntary restraint agreement in 1980—the kind of "voluntary agreement" that is reached when someone points a gun at a man's head and asks him to hand over his wallet—to 245,000 tonnes at a tariff of 10 per cent. It is now proposed to reduce that to 205,000 tonnes, with further limits on chilled products.

I cannot understand how we can hold our heads high in the world while saying that we favour the reduction of trade barriers and then bring proposals such as this to the House. I appreciate the realism of the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon. I accept that the proposal is probably the best that we shall get. I am not trying to justify it; I am merely being realistic. It is vital that we advertise to people, not only in this country, but elsewhere in the Community, that this is where the buck stops, that the New Zealand Government have reluctantly accepted that this is the best deal that they will get, and look to our Ministers to fight for them as they have in the past and as they have recently declared they will continue to do.

I urge my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to do just that—to stand up for New Zealand, for Britain and for British consumers.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I shall keep my remarks very brief, as the hour is late. I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) made an excellent speech, and I hope one day to emulate his knowledge of these matters.

The debate has been interesting, and I have found it most informative. As my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) pointed out, we receive many briefs on these important issues, not least from our own Whips Office, and they help us to form a sensible judgment on what we should do. One element, however, has been lacking in the debate. We have concentrated entirely on circumstances relating to a particular Commission proposal. I should like my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to tell us how he envisages the position in 1992. If, as my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon suggested, this is the best that we can expect, that will still leave 55,000 tonnes in 1992, when the single European market comes into being.

I take my right hon. Friend's point that any further reduction in New Zealand butter imports would not affect our dairy farmers' quota now. However, the quota arrangement is not permanent but temporary. By about 1992 the quota regime will have to be reconsidered.

The House has shown tonight that it is committed to the moral obligation that was entered into in 1973 to allow access to New Zealand imports, but it is fair to place on record the fact that some hon. Members are equally concerned—in some cases more concerned—about farming interests in our own constituencies. Young dairy farmers, looking to the future, are asking, "What future is there for us in dairy farming, taking into account the present balance in the market place?" We must take their views into account.

I think that the House ought to accept the Commission's proposals, but we shall have to return to the problem. The conflicts that are emerging will have to be addressed. When the single market is in place, I believe that the other member states will resist the import of any New Zealand butter. Our farmers will then ask why all the New Zealand butter has to come to this country.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): My right hon. Friend the Minister has referred to the special regard that the United Kingdom has for New Zealand. He also pointed out that the treaty of Rome reflects that fact. The proposals that we are discussing are a further reflection of that relationship. The largest ANZAC ceremony outside Australasia is held every year on Cannock Chase. Therefore, the Cannock area has a special regard for New Zealand.

I am somewhat sceptical about the EEC. Its attitude towards New Zealand butter is most depressing. I have not participated in previous debates on EEC documents. The document that relates to this debate runs to about 60 pages. It is full of information and figures, and it has made most interesting reading. A most interesting fact is that the document contains scarcely any reference to the consumer. It is an entirely producer-dominated and orientated document. The omission of the consumer from the document confirms that the common agricultural policy has established completely wrong priorities.

Many hon. Members have referred to the arrangements that have been entered into to reduce the amount of New Zealand butter that is permitted to enter the United Kingdom. Imports have been reduced from 166,000 tonnes to 74,500 tonnes during last year. The New Zealand share of the market has not remained static: its share has fallen from 33 per cent. to 27 per cent. It has already suffered a cut. Tonight, New Zealand is being asked to take a further cut and to shoulder a further share of the burden.

Apart from having to accept quota restrictions, New Zealand has also had to pay the levy and compete against home-produced and EEC products. Notwithstanding those hurdles and the falling demand for butter, New Zealand managed to ensure that in 1987 the retail sale price of new Zealand butter in small packs was about 4·4 per cent. less than the price of equivalent United Kingdom butter.

Anchor butter remains the houswife's favourite butter. It has always been and it remains my favourite butter. When I was at school I took it home to Germany where I lived to ensure that I did not have to eat German butter. I have been consistent throughout.

Despite high butter stocks in the United Kingdom, the consumer is clearly exercising his or her choice and preference for New Zealand butter. I am distressed that the Commission is proposing yet more reductions in New Zealand butter quotas. By 1992, they will have fallen to 55,000 tonnes, which is precisely one third of the 1973 quota. The House has to consider how far the Commission may press us in the future. Presumably, it wants ultimately to reduce the figure to zero.

I believe that the interests of the consumer in this matter are paramount, but there are other considerations such as historical association and the fact that New Zealand has tried, with great success, to restructure and liberalise its enonomy. Moreover, we earn more money from our trade with New Zealand than it earns from us.

I hope that the Minister and the Parliamentary Secretary will take heart from the message given by the House that they should go out and fight for the interests of the British consumer and our friends and allies in New Zealand.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): This has been one of the most realistic and agreeable debates on EEC affairs for many months, probably because of the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body). I want to speak for only one minute.

I hope that the Government will accept that what they are proposing is a reduction in consumer choice. The House should face that fact. The Government may take the view that the proposed reduction of one quarter is consistent with what they think will be the reduction in butter consumption, but nobody can argue that butter consumption will decrease by one quarter during the next five years.

I hope that the most recent activity of the European Commission—it banned imported apples so that housewives had less choice—will get across to the Government the fact that we must ensure that the housewife can buy what she wants, not just what the Common Market has in surplus.

Bearing in mind New Zealand's problems, is there anything that we can do about butter dumping? There is talk of what might happen next year, but we know that dumping has been extraordinarily high during the past 12 months—to the extent of butter being dumped at 2·72p per pound, which is outrageous. Can the Government persuade the Council to ensure that housewives can buy what they want and that dumping is reduced?

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): The Minister will take away tonight the united view of the House of Commons. All who have spoken have been supportive of New Zealand. I have found the debate instructive and constructive, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will draw strength from it. When he negotiates in Europe, I hope that he will remember the message that my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) delivered: that he should fight the case for New Zealand. I am sure that he will have the good will and support of the House when he does that.

I am glad that all hon. Members who have been rising in their places have been called. The case was put admirably by the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body), who brings a distinctive view to these matters. He was supported with great authority by the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). If he were present, I would take issue with my hon. Friend as he made a passing reference to the Minister's predecessor but one. He did the Minister a disservice when he compared him unfavourably with the right hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker). In previous debates, we have all omitted to observe that, 12 months before milk quotas were introduced, the right hon. Gentleman was stamping round the country telling farmers to produce. If I were offered a choice between the present Minister and the right hon. Member for Worcester, I would settle for them both remaining in their present jobs.

The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) did the House a service by drawing attention to the fact that the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) had not bothered to read the answer to his parliamentary question, tabled earlier this year. I should like to correct the hon. Member for Tatton, as 26 per cent., not 27 per cent., of the United Kingdom butter market is taken by New Zealand imports. That is the 1987 figure, not the rather dated one that the hon. Gentleman used. I am sure that he will update his records and use the former figure in future.

The hon. Member for Tatton did New Zealand a disservice when he mentioned our opposition to imported coal. Our opposition is not to imported coal per se, but to imported coal that is produced under slave labour conditions in South Africa. To attempt to draw a comparison—as the hon. Gentleman did—between the dairy industry in New Zealand and the coal mining industry operating under slave labour conditions in South Africa does a grave disservice to the people of New Zealand, who are our historic friends and allies. The case tonight has been overwhelming. Imports of New Zealand butter provide consumer choice. It is a wholesome product, and is sold at a competitive price. It is part of a trade relationship that is best described by a statement by the New Zealand high commissioner earlier this year:

> "The visible and invisible trade in each direction is now worth nearly £1 billion a year—though Britain still earns rather more from New Zealand than New Zealand does from Britain. . . . The remitted profits of British investment in New Zealand alone exceed the receipts from New Zealand's dairy export to Britain."

The Labour party supports our historic and traditional relationship with New Zealand. In the light of arguments such as the one that I have just quoted, I fail to see how a Conservative House of Commons can do other than support these proposals.

12.50 am

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) started, as he ended, by saying that the House supported these proposals. Brevity will mean no discourtesy, as I have only four minutes in which to reply to the debate.

So that the record need not be changed, let me correct my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs), who quoted figures per year, giving a total of 23 per cent., not in toto. That is just to keep that part of the record straight. Those who read Hansard will understand that.

I must start by reminding the House that this agreement must find unanimity in Brussels—and it will be a difficult unanimity to find. My right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) will not mind my saying that he is an old hand at this game. He highlighted the difficulties of France and Ireland. I repeat that unanimity will be difficult to find. I should like to start where my right hon. Friend ended by saying that the Government believe that the Commission's proposals represent a reasonable balance between the many interests involved.

The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) made the point, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body), that it is not the Government who buy butter. It is the housewife who does that. The hon. Member for South Shields fully supported advertising, which is unusual for the Opposition. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston, the hon. Gentleman spoke about the value of generic advertising. He also emphasised that the Labour party wanted to fight for the New Zealanders. The hon. Member for Caerphilly also made that point.

In his delightful speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston pointed out the difficulties that New Zealanders have faced in finding other markets. However, despite those difficulties—I do not quarrel at this late hour with his specific examples—they have found other markets. My hon. Friend the Member for Swindon will discover that Anchor butter will find other markets, that New Zealanders will continue to find markets abroad to meet their requirements and that they will continue to sell their butter here.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) was not fair to my right hon. Friend the Minister.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) should read the excellent speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), because it encapsulated many things that needed to be said. My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) was gracious enough to mention that speech. I assure him that the matter will be renegotiated and that we will again discuss the matter in the House. He spoke specifically about 1992. The Community decision on the future level of New Zealand imports took into account a wide range of often conflicting factors.

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business), to put the Questions necessary to dispose of the proceedings.

Question, That the amendment be made put and negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 8961/88 on New Zealand butter and of the Government's intention to pursue agreement to these proposals which meet the aim of establishing arrangements for the continued access of New Zealand butter on special terms for the period 1989-92 in a way which represents a reasonable balance between the interests of those involved.

PETITIONS

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): It has been a long night, but I have been very willing to stay here until nearly 1 o'clock to present this petition on behalf of 2,000 people, many of them my constituents, to preserve the Settle-Carlisle railway as part of the national network.

As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the Transport Users Consultative Committee is sending reports to the Minister, and British Rail has produced new figures to show that revenue on passenger traffic on the line has increased from £1 million to £1·7 million. Examination of the Ribblehead viaduct has demonstrated that the repair costs will be halved from the £5 million that British Rail claimed. The course is set fair for the retention of this beautiful railway which is useful not only for scenic visits by tourists but also as an important lifeline for people who live in the area.

I hope that, when the Minister sees on the Order Paper the 29 petitions with more than 80,000 signatures that were presented this week, he will recognise the strength of opinion about keeping this excellent lifeline, link, main-line route and beautiful engineering achievement as part of the national network. It gives me great pleasure to read the petition. It says:

> To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.
> The Humble petition of the supporters of the Settle to Carlisle railway sheweth that the outstandingly beautiful and historic Settle-Carlisle railway provides an essential transport system for the people who live in the area; for people wishing to visit the area; for people travelling between the Midlands, Yorkshire and Scotland; for British Rail as a diversionary route; for British Rail to use as a potentially important freight route; and for hundreds of thousands of people who wish to enjoy the scenery near the line and the engineering heritage of the line itself.
> Wherefore your petitioners pray that the Settle-Carlisle railway and the associated Blackburn-Hellifield railway, will be retained as an integral part of the national railway network.

And so say all of us.

To lie upon the Table.

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I have your guidance? I too came with a petition in the same terms as that presented by the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). I took the liberty of putting it in the bag to make sure that it reached the appropriate place as speedily as possible. I hope that I am in order when I say that I wholeheartedly support the petition and the hundreds of people who have signed it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is out of order. He has put his petition in the bag but he cannot present it without giving notice.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): I wish to present a petition in the name of Mr. Robin Stewart Smith, 3 St Mary's drive, Edwinstowe and 1,000 other signatories in support of the retention of the Settle-Carlisle railway line.

The history of Sherwood forest is legendary, and my constituents share the views of the local people and others nationwide who want to protect this line for future generations. Like the petitioners, I hope that the railway line can be saved, and will join Sherwood forest as part of our famous heritage.

To lie upon the Table.

Council House Sales (Torbay)

1 am

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): I wish to present a petition signed by more than half the council tenants of Torbay council—2,634 people—who are horrified by the undemocratic decision of the councillors to sell off their homes, despite an overwhelming vote against such a move by the tenants. The tenants point out:

> "after a vote of all Council tenants monitored by the Electoral Reform Society and where a majority of three to one tenants elected against the sale of their houses to a private landlord, the Torbay Borough Council chose to ignore that majority by inclusion of abstentions and non-voters as signifying acceptance."

This petition is signed by more than half the tenants because they want the House to be aware of the wishes of the majority. The petition ends:

> Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to (1) accept the straight majority vote, as is traditional in this land, and (2) maintain the Council's Housing Stock in the hands of the Torbay Borough Council as is the wish of the majority of tenants.

To lie upon the Table.

1.1 am

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): I present a second petition, which is signed by 2,771 people, who are horrified by the plans to sell off or close the Settle to Carlisle railway. The petitioners and I believe that this outstandingly beautiful and historic line provides an essential local transport link for the people who live there and for the people who are visiting the area. The livelihoods of some people depend upon it, and it is an essential and under-developed part of this nation's rail network. The finances are increasingly showing the viability of this railway line. The petition ends:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that the Settle-Carlisle railway, and the associated Blackburn-Hellifield railway, will be retained as an integral part of the national railway network.

To lie upon the Table.

1.2 am

Mr. Garry Waller (Keighley): I wish to present a petition on behalf of 4,000 people living in or near the Keighley constituency, which calls for the retention of the Settle-Carlisle railway. The signatories of the petition, with whom I strongly identify, believe that it is vital that the line should be retained for generations to come. I am proud to be a vice-president of the Friends of the Settle-Carlisle Line Association. Whether the future of the railway lies in the private or the public sector, we would not easily be forgiven if we allowed the commission of that act of vandalism that closure would constitute. The petition ends:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that the Settle-Carlisle railway, and the associated Blackburn-Hellifield railway, will be retained as an integral part of the railway network.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

1.3 am

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I have two petitions to present. The first has over 1,000 signatures of supporters of the Settle-Carlisle railway. The fact that so many people in my constituency have signed the petition shows how important this railway is as part of a national rail network. These petitioners are calling for the Settle-Carlisle line to remain part of the network. It is a particularly beautiful railway, and is used and admired by many people from all parts of the country. It is because of that that many people want to see that line remain as a functioning part of the rail network, and of our public transport system.

To lie upon the Table.

Seals

1.4 am

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): The second petition I wish to present is from the children of the Rochdale road junior school, and has over 150 names. They have signed a petition to show their concern about the fate of the seals in the North sea. It is a matter of great pride to me that the children of a school should show so much concern, and such organisation to send in this petition, signed by them and the staff of the school. The petition is a great credit to the children, and it is creditable that they have this concern about the environment, and that they know how to organise themselves and express themselves to the House, which has the ultimate power to do something about the matter.

The petition states:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom and Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled. The humble Petition of the children of Rochdale Road Junior School, Scunthorpe in the constituency of Glanford and Scunthorpe, showeth that they are greatly concerned about the virus that has been decimating the seal population of the North Sea, particularly along the coast of the United Kingdom.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will urge the government to do all in its power to support research and provide resources to combat this virus and protect the seals.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray &c.

To lie upon the Table.

RAF Upper Heyford

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sackville.]

1.5 am

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): I am grateful, even at this late hour, for the opportunity to raise an important issue so early in this Session of Parliament. I refer to the problem of noise levels at RAF Upper Heyford.

There has been an airfield at Upper Heyford since the late 1920s. For some time now it has been a major NATO air base. F111 aircraft have been based there since 1970 and their numbers were significantly increased by deployment of an additional squadron of EF111s in 1984. Local people have always recognised the contribution that the base may make to Britain's defences and acknowledge that the first duty of the realm is the defence of the realm. However, that public duty has to be balanced against the collective private interests and considerations of hundreds of people living in the proximity of the base.

RAF Upper Heyford lies in the Cherwell valley. The airfield has one physical runway which is aligned roughly on an east-west axis. To the west, literally at the end of the runway, lies the village of Upper Heyford with an adult population of about 1,750 people. A little further away, on the valley ridge, lies Steeple Aston with a population of approximately 860 and Middle Aston with a population of just over 100. At the other end of the runway, again right against the perimeter fence, lies the village of Ardley with a population of about 670. In total, about 2,400 adults and their children live very close to the base. There can be no airfield in Britain or, I suspect, in NATO where so many people and so many villages are so close to an airfield runway and so vulnerable to aircraft noise.

During the late 1960s, there was a substantial increase in aircraft activity at RAF Upper Heyford and thus an increase in aircraft noise. That led in turn to an increase in very real concern among local people that aircraft noise was making their lives intolerable. A survey carried out by some pupils at Bicester school in 1969 and 1970 stated:

"the chairman of Steeple Aston Parish Council told us that the council had done everything possible, but with very little in the way of actual results. They have written to the Base Commander, attended many meetings at the Base, as well as writing to the Ministry of Defence (who only referred the letters back to Upper Heyford)."

That sense of frustration in 1970 is undoubtedly experienced perhaps even more deeply today by the parish council and local residents who feel that officials simply are not listening to them.

However, in 1970, the Ministry of Defence realised that something had to be done to try to relieve the burden of aircraft noise on local people. The minutes of Steeple Aston parish council in September 1970 state:

"In an endeavour to alleviate the noise, aircraft taking off from Upper Heyford were now instructed to turn 10 deg right as soon as possible after take-off. If it were possible with the compatibility of safety, it may be possible to turn more than 10 deg."

That was 1970. Following further public concern, these informal arrangements later became more formal.

Early in 1974, the United States air force experimented with and finally adopted a formal noise abatement flight pattern for departures to the west. The procedure involved a right turn before the aircraft had left the confines of the airfield to avoid Upper Heyford village, following a line slightly to the north of Middle Aston and culminating in a left turn to avoid direct overflight of Duns Tew.

In 1984, as the result of suggestions from a civil airline pilot who lived in Ardley, basically a similar procedure was adopted for departures to the east of the base to avoid Ardley. Despite these noise abatement measures, there was still considerable aircraft noise. In fairness, however, householders in the worst affected villages qualified for noise insulation grants. From time to time there were complaints about aircraft straying from what were regarded as agreed flight paths, but the noise levels were at least tolerable.

What for a number of years had at least been tolerable levels of aircraft noise became intolerable in June of this year. On 24 May, the United States air force announced to local people that both noise abatement departure routes would cease to be used from 1 June. From then on planes would take off in a straight line and fly direct over the villages. That means that to the west of the base they fly directly over Upper Heyford and Steeple Aston. To the east, jets fly directly over Ardley. The official reason for such change was that over the years the F-111 aircraft have become heavier and the planes' thrust has remained the same. Thus, on the ground of safety it had become necessary to straighten the flight paths. The consequence of the change was that the levels of aircraft noise were no longer tolerable. Instead, they became intolerable.

My hon. Friend the Minister came to RAF Upper Heyford to learn more about the situation for himself. In consequence, the United States air force was asked, during the latter part of the summer, to experiment with flying slightly different flight patterns over the area to ascertain whether any improvement could be made. Simultaneously with these experiments, noise tests were carried out by the RAF institute of community health and the Cherwell district council, the council being the environmental health authority.

A combination of these experimental flight patterns and extensive noise tests have led in due course to a slightly modified flight pattern. The results of the tests to the west of the base have now been published. They show that, while there has been a slight reduction in noise levels in the southern end of Steeple Aston, the modified flight paths have meant a substantial increase in noise for Middle Aston. Much of Steeple Aston and Middle Aston now lie within a 78 dBA contour. Amazingly, the noise tests by the RAF institute of community health in the Ardley area, to the east of the base, have not yet been completed. However, there is every reason to believe that, given the results that have been obtained by Cherwell district council and a straightforward extrapolation of the noise footprint elsewhere, a substantial part of Ardley will now come within the 83 dBA contour.

What do the figures mean? I can inform the House that 70 dBA is the level at which the Ministry of Defence pays for houses to have noise insulation grants. So there is a clear public recognition that any household that has continually to endure those levels of noise merits some compensation and the ability to have its home insulated. I am concerned about substantially greater noise levels. There is not time in this debate to discuss in detail the way in which noise is measured, but it is important to remember that it is a logarithmic scale, not a linear progression.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment recently refused a planning appeal in the Cherwell valley because the background noise was 73 dBA. The local district council recently took enforcement proceedings against a factory in a nearby built-up area where noise levels were in in the mid 60s dBA. By contrast, many local people are expected to live with noise levels of 77 dBA and 78 dBA and more. That is somewhat akin to the count of a tube train reaching peak speed and crossing line junctions. We should remember that the report from the RAF institute of community health produced average readings. Contained within them are some very hig spot readings. Individual planes passing close over people's homes cause real physical pain and distress.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister has received many letters from local people which set out very clearly the depth of discomfort that they now experience. Nor should we forget that, in consequence of the change in the flight path, Dr. Radcliffe's school at Steeple Aston is now immediately below the flight path. As the Bishop of Oxford, in a letter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, said, the school is > "now suffering intolerable noise levels."

If, as expected, the noise levels in Ardley are in excess of 83 dBA, the MOD will be obliged to offer to purchase all the houses—an Oxfordshire village. To the west of the base 13 properties in Upper Heyford are clearly within the 83 dBA contour and I understand that the Secretary of State for Defence will be offering to purchase those homes in due course.

People do not want their homes bought; they want quieter homes. There has been a village at Ardley since before the Norman conquest, and villagers do not want the village to be purchased. They simply want to see a substantial amelioration in the present noise levels or, as posters in the village now claim, they want "church bells, not decibels."

Many people experience intolerable levels of noise, and relief must be found. That relief can only come from the MOD. As it is an MOD air base, private individuals have no relief to abate the nuisance in the courts, and the local environmental health authority has no statutory powers to make the nuisance cease. However, let there be no doubt that, had this been a factory or anything other than an installation exempt by statute, local people could have obtained relief by an injunction in the courts and the local environmental health authority would certainly have sought to abate the nuisance by enforcement procedures.

There is a simple constitutional point. The RAF and the United States air force are answerable to Ministers and Ministers are answerable and accountable to the House. My hon. Friend the Minister will have seen that 75 right hon. and hon. Members have signed early-day motion 22. I am very grateful to my hon. Friend and colleague and neighbour the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) for sponsoring that motion. The most recent signature to that motion is that of my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) who is in the Chamber tonight. Early-day motion 22 urges the MOD to investigate without delay measures to relieve substantially aircraft noise, including the possible realignment of the runway.

This issue will not go away until a solution is found. Since early-day motion 22 was tabled, I have been encouraged by the sizeable number of right hon. and hon. Members who have expressed their support for speedy action. My hon. Friend the Minister will doubtless tell the House that realigning the runway is a very expensive option. I understand that he estimates that that would cost more than £50 million. If the Ministry feels that in the totality of its budget that is too expensive, the burden of responsibility is on the Minister to come up with a workable and cost-effective solution.

The MOD has the technical expertise and knowledge. Tonight the House wants to know what the MOD is doing to find a solution. The status quo is clearly not sustainable, and changes need to be made without delay.

On television, my hon. Friend said that he > ". . . will want to see over time what effect this really does have on the local villages."

I do not believe that there can be any doubt whatsoever about the effect of the changes of flight path on local people and local villages. The effect is devastating. No more time is needed to confirm that. It will be no good for my hon. Friend simply to hold out the vague hope of some uncertain solution at some unspecified date in the future. People living in the proximity of Upper Heyford want to know today what action the Ministry of Defence intends to take to resolve the problem.

Finally, I express this caution to my hon. Friend. Local people have been very patient. Six months have passed since the change in flight paths was introduced. They have placed their trust in the parliamentary system. If that system does not produce a result, they will feel increasingly antipathetic towards their American neighbours, and in time, I fear, increasingly hostile to their presence. I am sure that my hon. Friend and the United States air force realise that it would be a matter of real concern if the base were to exhaust local support. Thus, I hope that this evening we shall start to hear of some real solutions.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Roger Freeman): My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) has presented the problem with characteristic clarity. I am aware of the considerable concern of those who live in his constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), which is also affected. I am well aware, through reports in the media and correspondence received from my hon. Friends and from members of the public, of the very deep concerns that they have, and, I understand them.

The problems of Upper Heyford as a military airfield, and the problems of noise associated with military aircraft, are not unique. I regret that there are no simple solutions. I hope that I shall be able to convey to the House my concern and that of the Ministry of Defence, and outline one or two positive constructive steps that we plan to take.

The history of RAF Upper Heyford began during world war 1, when the base was used for training purposes. During world war 2, Upper Heyford again played a training role at first, eventually becoming a Royal Air Force bomber station in 1943. In 1969 it was announced that the base would become home to the 20th Tactical Figher Wing of the USAF which was to be re-equipped with the F-111E swing-wing fighter bomber. A large modernisation and construction programme was carried out at the base to enable it to accommodate the F-111E, and the first aircraft of the planned three squadrons arrived in September 1970. The three squadrons of F-111Es were joined in 1983 by one squadron of the EF-111A—electronic counter-measures support aircraft.

[Mr. Roger Freeman]

Those aircraft provide long-range, all-weather tactical fighter bomber and electronic combat sorties for NATO and are a vital part of the Alliance's range of deterrent forces.

The United States air force presence at Upper Heyford therefore goes back more than 30 years, and during that time the base has received the support and the hospitality of the local community. I am very grateful for that support, which continues to this day, despite the current problems, and I know that this gratitude is shared by the United States air force. The base has worked hard to reciprocate that support. One of the ways in which it has done so was the introduction in 1976, as my hon. Friend said, in response to representations from the local community about aircraft noise, of a noise abatement take-off pattern for aircraft departing to the west. That manoeuvre involved the aircraft making a steep banking turn to the right immediately on take-off, followed very shortly by another turn to the left. That procedure aimed successfully, to reduce the noise levels experienced by villages near the end of the runway. In 1984 a noise-abatement pattern was introduced for aircraft departing to the east, with the same aim. However, the F-111 is undoubtedly a noisy aeroplane, and noise levels around the base were still high. Consequently, in 1986, following a noise survey by the RAF's institute of community and occupational medicine, a noise compensation scheme was introduced. That provided for those homes within the 12-hour average 70 dBA noise contour to be given grants for noise insulation work and for the Ministry to purchase homes within the 83 dBA noise contour, of which there was only one at that time.

Our prime responsibility towards the communities around the base is to ensure that the flying activities there are carried out as safely as possible. To that end, the safety of flying operations at the base, as elsewhere, is kept under constant review. That process led the United States air force to the conclusion, earlier this year, that changes in the thrust-to-weight ratio of the F-111E since the noise abatement patterns were introduced had led to an erosion of the safety margins for those patterns to an unacceptable, though not currently dangerous, degree. Typically, an F-111E on an operational sortie is some 6 per cent. heavier now than it would have been 10 years ago, consequently reducing the thrust-to-weight ratio, while there has been an associated increase in the drag factor. Those changes did not occur all at once, but step-by-step over the 10-year period.

Bearing in mind its responsibilities for those over whom it flies as well as the safety of the aircrew themselves, the United States air force prudently requested that it be allowed to revert to the standard direct take-off employed at other military airbases, and, indeed, as previously used at Upper Heyford. I endorsed that request and the changes in take-off patterns were made with effect from 1 June this year.

We expected that the changes would increase noise levels in several of the villages around the base, notably Steeple Aston and Ardley, but we took into account the fact that Steeple Aston had lived with the straight-ahead pattern from 1970 to 1976, while Ardley had done so from 1970 to 1984, although neither village could be expected to welcome a return to the earlier patterns. In addition, when visibility was bad the aircraft had in any case generally used the straight-ahead pattern directly over Steeple Aston or Ardley. I commissioned a full noise survey by scientists of the RAF's institute of community and occupational medicine for this autumn, taking account of the changes to which I have already referred. I also arranged for my officials and officers at the base to brief locally elected representatives of the communities likely to be affected —and indeed my hon. Friend—before the changes took place.

In the event, it became clear that the increased noise levels had given rise to considerable local concern especially in respect of the Dr. Ratcliffe school in Steeple Aston. I accept that they also affect other residents. Those concerns were ably and forcefully represented by my hon. Friend and, as a result, I visited RAF Upper Heyford and Steeple Aston soon after the change in take-off patterns to assess the situation for myself. During my visit I announced that I had decided to take three steps in the light of my hon. Friend's representations: first, that the Ministry of Defence would, in principle, on an exceptional basis, pay for sound insulation work at the Dr. Ratcliffe school in Steeple Aston; secondly, that the United States air force would carry out an evaluation of alternative operating patterns aimed at identifying a means of reducing the noise levels then being experienced by many local people; and, thirdly, that the full noise survey planned for the autumn would be brought forward to this summer. The work on all three of those areas has been pressed forward as swiftly as practicable and I shall outline where we now stand on each.

First, the governors of the Dr. Ratcliffe school have commissioned a firm of consultants, for which the Ministry is paying, to advise them on a suitable noise insulation scheme for the school. We shall pay for the necessary work to be carried out and I hope that it will be possible to begin that during the Christmas holidays.

Secondly, the United States air force tried out a modification whereby the aircraft made a gentle turn to take the aircraft between the villages of Steeple and Middle Aston, coupled with an earlier termination of the aircraft's afterburners. That modified pattern has been employed by the F-111s taking off from the base to the west since mid-August, and the results of the noise survey indicate that it has produced some reduction in the noise level in most of Steeple Aston. For example, the average noise level at the bus stop in the centre of Steeple Aston was 77·5 dBA prior to the introduction of the modified take-off path, and 72·3 subsequently. It has also reduced noise levels in Lower Heyford.

The modified take-off pattern has a further advantage. The old noise abatement pattern could not be flown in bad weather and so aircraft from the base used to overfly Steeple Aston perhaps as much as 17 per cent. of the time during the winter months. The modified path can be used in bad weather as well as in good, and so aircraft from the base no longer directly overfly the village of Steeple Aston because of bad weather.

Thirdly, the noise survey for the western end of the airfield has now been completed. The work on the eastern end, in which direction there are significantly fewer departures, is not yet complete because there have not been a sufficient number of flying days for correct observations to be taken. We are not delaying matters. The report for the western end of the runway shows that the noise levels in Steeple Aston and Upper Heyford in particular are higher than they were prior to 1 June and recommends the introduction of a revised noise compensation scheme at the base. This revised scheme will include an offer from the Ministry of Defence to purchase 13 properties in Upper Heyford which lie within the 83 dBA 12-hour noise contour.

I am today able to announce a further step which I hope will be welcome to my hon. Friend, although it is not a complete answer, and I shall come on to further planned steps in a moment. As my hon. Friend is aware, in addition to providing noise insulation grants for residents who are subject to average noise levels in excess of 70 dBA, the Ministry of Defence allows claims for injurious affection compensation where there is evidence to show that there has been an adverse effect on the value of residential property and certain small businesses as a direct result of an increase in noise or other physical effects following the bringing into use of new public works at an airfield. I feel sure that my hon. Friend will be pleased to learn that, although strictly speaking there are no new public works, exceptionally my Department will be able to consider claims for injurious affection from those concerned. I shall announce full details when the revised noise compensation scheme at RAF Upper Heyford is introduced.

My hon. Friend especially mentioned the possibility of realigning the runway at RAF Upper Heyford as a possible solution to the remaining problems. I am aware that I have been talking principally about noise compensation schemes and not, as my hon. Friend said, tackling the fundamental problems. I have to say that there are significant difficulties with this proposal, not least of which is that realigning the runway so that aircraft no longer take-off toward Steeple and Middle Aston can only serve to create problems elsewhere. Although, perhaps, not as severe, they will none the less be unwelcome to the people they affect.

Such a project would also be extremely costly, because it would involve the demolition and reprovision of expensive support facilities, as well as simply building a new runway. In addition, there would be operational problems caused by the disruption of moving the aircraft to another base while the work was done; and, indeed, the problem of finding another base at which to put them and the large numbers of associated personnel. However, I can tell my hon. Friend that we will, as he asked, carry out a full study of the costs and implications of realigning the runway. We will make the results public and I shall write to my hon. Friend when the work is complete.

When I visited Upper Heyford some months ago to see and hear for myself the problems involving military aircraft, I promised that I would return to the base once the full study had been completed, and I hope that it will be completed not only comprehensively but quickly. I shall then meet my hon. Friend and his constituents to explain the results of the study and to explore what further steps can be taken.

Mr. Baldry: May I make it clear to my hon. Friend that, while, of course, I am grateful for the fact that he will carry out a full technical survey of the feasibility of realigning the runway, he has made it clear on a number of occasions that there is a cost involved, and he has made it clear publicly that he is worried about that and the technical feasibility of it. However, can one understand that the Ministry of Defence will consider other technical options? The Ministry clearly knows the capabilities of these planes, and it should not just be a question of considering whether it is possible to realign the runway. Other options that may be available to relieve aircraft noise in this area should also be considered.

Mr. Freeman: I give my hon. Friend that assurance. Our minds are certainly not closed. We are sympathetic to the problems. As I said at the outset, there are no simple solutions. If there were, we would have taken them. Certainly my mind is open, and we shall continue to explore with the United States air force and with our own experts possible solutions to the problem.

To sum up, I very much regret that the change of take-off patterns at RAF Upper Heyford this summer has led to an increase in the levels of disturbance experienced by many of those who live in the vicinity of the airfield. I apologise to those who have experienced distress because of this disturbance. However, I have to say that the changes were necessary because of the need to maximise the safety of flying operations from the base. As such, the changes were in the interests of all concerned, the local community as well as the aircrew, since I believe that one point on which we would all agree is the need to do our utmost to reduce the chances of an accident.

I hope that I have shown that the concerns that my hon. Friend has so ably presented on behalf of his constituents have been taken very seriously by the Ministry of Defence, by myself and by the US air force, and that we have responded, and will continue to respond, in a constructive and helpful way.

Question put and agreed to.

CITY OF GLASGOW DISTRICT COUNCIL ORDER CONFIRMATION

Mr. Secretary Rifkind presented a Bill, under section 7 of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1936 to confirm a Provisional Order relating to City of Glasgow District Council; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be considered upon Wednesday 7 December and to be printed. [Bill 11.]

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food Surpluses

1. Mr. Baldry: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the progress that has been made in eliminating agricultural surpluses within the European Community.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): European Community intervention stocks of most commodities have fallen significantly as a result of recent common agricultural policy reforms. For example, butter stocks have been reduced by 80 per cent. over the past year and stocks of skimmed milk powder are now almost negligible.

Mr. Baldry: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the fact that the United Kingdom butter mountain is melting and that skimmed milk powder surpluses have almost vanished proves that CAP reforms are beginning to work and that it is possible to reform the CAP in such a way as to provide a firm basis for the future prosperity of our farmers?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree with my hon. Friend. A main criticism of the CAP in recent years has been the amount of money that has gone into the storage and disposal of surplus stocks. The fact that those surplus stocks are decreasing substantially is a good sign for the future stability of our farmers. We must do other things to achieve complete CAP reform, but we should acknowledge how much has been done already.

Mr. Tony Banks: I understand that we have a large and growing cheese mountain as a result of EC surpluses. Of course, we expect to get nothing but hard cheese from the Government—[Interruption.] It will do for 2.36 pm. As I assume that some of that cheese will be in intervention stores in my constituency—there is probably some good Greek feta cheese knocking about—is there any chance of the pensioners of Newham eating some of that feta cheese, with a pint or two of ouzo, at Christmas?

Mr. MacGregor: That was a rather belaboured remark. It is important to get the matter in context. The increase in cheese stocks is small, as is the total stock. The major expense lay in the butter mountain stocks, and they have been decreasing. As the hon. Gentleman probably knows, we took advantage of the EC free food scheme in relation to butter, but the decrease in butter stocks means that we shall have much less, or nothing, to do on that front in the future. That is not the best way to deal with the surplus. The best way is not to have a surplus in the first place.

Mr. Marland: As the agricultural surpluses are coming under control, will my right hon. Friend consider easing the co-responsibility levies on dairy products and cereals? They have always been iniquitous taxes and have had no effect on surpluses. Will he use his best offices to reduce that tax?

Mr. MacGregor: It is right to emphasise the fact that surpluses are decreasing and the mountains vanishing. The public at large and many pundits have not yet got hold of that fact. But we must still undertake further reforms, not least in the subsidised disposal of dairy products that are not in intervention stores. With other factors, that means that the dairy sector is still an expensive regime.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the co-responsibility levies on milk and cereals are the wrong way to tackle the problem, and I shall continue to battle to get rid of them. But the regimes are still expensive, and until we get them more under control I may be unable to persuade all my fellow Council Ministers to accept my view.

Dr. David Clark: Will the Minister confirm that it has cost the European taxpayer £4·5 billion to remove the post-1987 food mountain and thus reduce the amount in storage? Will he assure the House that, to stop those mountains being rebuilt, not even one quarter of that amount has been spent in 1988?

Mr. MacGregor: It is rather complicated to give exact figures on what it costs to get rid of surplus products, as costs are spread over several years. Perhaps I can write to the hon. Gentleman about that. He is right to say that the figure has been high for storage and disposal of stocks. Last year, the actual figure for the Community was £12·5 billion. It is important that we ensure that stocks do not increase again and that we do not face such costs. That is what the thrust of the policies is about.

Mr. Paice: Does my right hon. Friend agree that cereal farmers have taken an almighty beating in the cereal price that they received as part of the effort to reform the CAP and reduce surpluses? There has been a 42 per cent. reduction in their prices in the past 10 years. Would he say to cereal farmers in his and my constituencies that he understands their problems and that he will do everything that he can to ensure that they do not lead to widespread deprivation of vast areas of East Anglia?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree with my hon. Friend. I understand entirely the difficulties that many cereal farmers in this country are experiencing as a result of the adjustment process that we have had to undertake, coupled also with two years of bad weather in East Anglia, which has certainly exacerbated our difficulties.

I do not wish to minimise the matter; I entirely understand the pressures. However, my hon. Friend will agree that there was no stable basis for our cereal farmers as worldwide and Community surpluses went on rising, at ever-increasing cost to the taxpayer. The best guarantee of a prosperous future is to tackle the problem of the surpluses, and taking marginal cereal land out of production helps with that, which is, of course, the purpose of the set-aside scheme.

Hedgerows

2. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make a statement with regard to the destruction of countryside hedgerows during the last five years.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Richard Ryder): There have been hedgerow removals in recent years as a result of changing agricultural circumstances and development such as road schemes and housing. There are no clear details on the extent of those removals.

Countryside hedgerows provide a wide variety of benefits to the environment and agriculture. I am very keen to discourage their removal or deterioration. Their value depends on positive action and sympathetic management to keep them in good condition. My Department provides capital grants at favourable rates for the laying of hedges and planting of new ones, as well as advice to farmers on hedgerow management.

Mr. Hardy: Can the Minister deny that, since the Government blocked my perfectly sensible and responsible Hedgerows Bill five years ago, thousands of miles of hedgerows, much of them established and important, have been destroyed? In view of the Prime Minister's recent pronouncements on the importance and attractiveness of the British hedgerow, may I take it that when I again present the Bill next month the Government will take a different view?

Mr. Ryder: I do not believe that legislation in this sphere would be effective, because it cannot be properly policed. Nevertheless, because I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said on the subject over many years, and because, during the past month, I have twice met representatives of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, of which the hon. Gentleman is a member, to discuss the issue, I would be more than happy to talk to him if we could get together in my office during the next week or two.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I was extremely glad to hear what my hon. Friend had to say about the Government's attitude to hedgerows. He knows the importance of hedgerows for wildlife, ranging from hares to partridges, to small birds and butterflies. I am not convinced that, as it exists at present, the grant system is adequate to persuade people to put in more hedgerows. Particularly in the light of the set-aside proposals, will he review the grant system and see whether something can be done to improve it?

Mr. Ryder: Only last Monday my right hon. Friend the Minister announced a new scheme—the farm and conservation grant scheme which increases hedgerow grants from 30 to 40 per cent. in lowland areas, where losses have been the most severe. I urge as many farmers as possible to take advantage of the scheme.

Marine Mammals

3. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department has recently held discussions with fishermen's organisations regarding the phenomenon of the incidental capture of marine mammals.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): My Department has developed plans to seek the co-operation of fishermen to monitor more closely the extent of incidental capture of marine mammals and will be in touch with fishermen's organisations.

Mr. McAllion: Unlike Scottish Tories, grey seals are an endangered species about which the people of Scotland really care. I was pleased to hear the Minister say that he agrees that everything possible should be done to try to control the activities that threaten the remaining seal population off our shores. When he meets representatives of the fishermen's organisations, will he ensure that the representatives of the appropriate scientific groups are also there, and that practical solutions to remove this threat from the seal population around our shores are found?

Mr. Thompson: It would be no good meeting fishermen's group unless both we and they were properly backed, or we would not reach any commonsense arrangement. This problem is greater in the Pacific, where the mammals swim along with the tuna, than it is in the North sea. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman and I should visit the Pacific to see what is being done there.

Mr. Ian Bruce: What is happening about the checking of other vessels off our shores, and particularly in the taking of catches that are not allowed by law? We have good policing arrangements in force when our fishermen dock into our ports, but what are we doing to ensure that these regulations are properly policed within our territorial waters?

Mr. Thompson: I will stick at this point on marine mammals. The Wildlife Link umbrella group will be as influential in other countries as it is in this, and I am sure that fishermen in other countries see this as great a problem there as it is here, and will be making their own arrangements.

Dr. Godman: Given that cetacea of all kinds are now covered by schedule 5 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, can the Minister assure the House that he will advise fishermen that they need not fear prosecution if they report any such incidental catches?

Mr. Thompson: As the hon. Gentleman says, all whales and dolphins are given a general protection in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 against being caught. However, a fisherman accidentally taking a protected animal would not be held liable, assuming that he acts in a reasonable manner. This will be made clear to fishermen so that they can be reassured about reporting information for our monitoring scheme.

Bovine Somatotropin

4. Mrs. Golding: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has discussed the use of bovine somatotropin for boosting milk production with representatives of the Womens Farming Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I am well aware of the views of Womens Farming Union members on this subject, which I discussed with them last week.

Mrs. Golding: Is the Minister aware of the concern of all women about the use of BST? Is he aware that in America there are many adverse views about the use of it and about the effect that it may have on young children? Will he discuss with all farming unions, before he grants a licence, the adverse effects that it could have on the farming industry?

Mr. MacGregor: I have discussed this subject with all farming unions, and there are varying views within the unions, including within the Womens Farming Union. It is important to reassure women by saying that before the trials were approved safety was carefully assessed by the Veterinary Products Committee, as it has to be under the Medicines Act 1968. That Act lays down the criteria that it has to apply. The committee consists of experts in human and animal health and it advised that there was no risk to consumers arising from the trials. That is an important point, and the same processes would have to be followed if there were an application for a licence. It is also the case that many countries, including the United States, are allowing these trials because they too have been advised that there is no risk to human health. That is an important point to make clear to consumers.

Mr. Latham: In view of the traumas that we have had over milk quotas in the past few years, why are we talking about boosting milk production by artificial means?

Mr. MacGregor: We must be careful to distinguish several factors. Under the Medicines Act, when there is any application for a new scientific development, we have to ensure that it is assessed by the experts on safety, efficacy and quality. Safety is paramount, and that is what we have to be sure about. But one has to be careful about saying that one should inhibit new agricultural development simply because we have a surplus. I am anxious that our industry should remain highly competitive and able to take advantage of all legitimate technological developments. Otherwise, it will become uncompetitive. As to surpluses, we have a milk quota system that guarantees that we shall not have an increase in milk production as a result of the application of BST. The point about not disadvantaging our industry or research effort by banning products that are safe is important.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Will the Minister prevent the Milk Marketing Board from selling milk for human consumption from the trial cows until the findings are known?

Mr. MacGregor: Under the Medicines Act, I have no powers to stop something if the Veterinary Products Committee guarantees that it is safe, efficacious and of quality. As the hon. Gentleman knows, it would be extremely difficult in practice to do that. We should emphasise the fact that there is no scientific evidence of risk to human health.

Mr. Churchill: Is it not time that the consumer was given the protection of the right to know precisely what is in the pint that he drinks? Is it not time that there was a proper requirement for labelling when such additives, hormones and other products are used to boost milk production?

Mr. MacGregor: It is important that the consumer should know that, according to all our expert advice, there is no risk to human health. In any case, the hormone is already present in the milk produced.

I am keen to ensure that more informative labelling is available to consumers wherever possible. There are practical problems with the Milk Marketing Board with regard to this product, but I am willing to consider all possibilities for improving the information available to consumers.

Mr. Ron Davies: Does the Minister recognise, from the questions that have been put to him this afternoon and from motions on the Order Paper, that there is outright opposition, both inside and outside the House, to the proposed introduction of BST? This afternoon the Minister has taken refuge behind the Medicines Act. Does he accept that if the Medicines Act is not an adequate instrument to deal with the threat posed by BST he should review the provisions of that Act? In the interim, will he acknowledge that he has powers to ban BST under the 1968 Act? Will he now give an assurance, before he makes a decision, that he will give full consideration to banning BST, using the powers in the 1968 Act?

Mr. MacGregor: There are a wide variety of views about BST and it is important that they are based on full knowledge. With regards to the animal test certificate under the Medicines Act I have to approve any product if the Veterinary Products Committee assures me that it is safe, efficacious and of quality. As regards issuing a licence for the product, that again would go through that committee and through a European Community committee, so there would be a full process before a decision was made.

There is another important point that I should stress to the House. There is concern about ensuring proper research and development possibilities in this country. If major companies thought that their major investments would be put at risk by changing policy decisions in mid-stream without a good basis for doing so, we would be disadvantaged in this country, because that research and development would go elsewhere. That is another important consideration to be borne in mind.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

5. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimates he has for the spread of bovine spongiform encephalopathy over the next six months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: All the evidence available so far suggests that the disease is not spreading from animal to animal, but that the cases identified are attributable to a common source. Our knowledge is still developing and any estimate must be tentative. Based on the incidence since the disease was made notifiable, the number of cases likely to be confirmed over the next six months may be about 350 a month.

Mr. Lloyd: Will the Minister confirm that his Ministry was aware of the widespread belief that "spongy brain" is transmitted from one species to another—from sheep to cattle—and that during that period infected meat was sold for human consumption in the markets because of the lamentable failure of his Ministry to stop it? The Minister should apologise for that. What action will he take to prevent the import of infected meat? There has been no recorded outbreak of the disease outside this country, but that may simply reflect the fact that veterinary practices are not at the same standard as those in Britain.

Mr. Thompson: Far from apologising, I shall say that the response of all concerned with the disease has been exemplary. The Ministry, the farmers and the renderers have acted in concert to attack the disease at its onset. The Ministry has diverted funds to find out exactly where the disease is coming from and has found, as the hon. Gentleman said, that it may have started in sheep and been transmitted through animal feedingstuffs to other animals. Therefore, the rendering industry—renderers make protein for animal feedingstuffs—have withdrawn that protein and we have extended the withdrawal period for another year. The farmers are notifying the disease and have accepted 50 per cent. compensation. The Southwood committee has made recommendations which the Government have implemented immediately.

Mr. Robert Hicks: Is my hon. Friend aware that the incidence of outbreaks of the disease is particularly high in the south-west? Will he consider carefully the existing level of compensation for affected animals? There is, after all, a precedent in the brucellosis eradication scheme, in which the figure was higher than 50 per cent. for infected animals.

Mr. Thompson: I omitted to mention imports in my answer to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd). He said that there are no notifications of the disease anywhere else. We are studying the position carefully. I know, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks) knows, that the disease started in the south. Nobody knows why there have been far more incidents in the south-west than in the rest of the country. [Interruption.] The south-west would not think its economy was over-heated. Compensation is at about the right level. The animal withers and dies, so is worthless even if the farmer does not notify, although we have no information that farmers are not notifying us of the disease.

Mr. Skinner: Can the Minister say whether there has been any incidence of the disease in Leicestershire, particularly in Blaby? Can he also confirm that if human beings eat large quantities of meat that has been infected by "spongy brain", the disease can be transmitted to them? Could Ministers, who go to large banquets, be infected with the disease, and can he confirm that that is why the Chancellor has tunnel vision?

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Gentleman began well. There have been outbreaks of the disease in every county. [Interruption.] The disease does not affect meat, therefore neither I nor the Chancellor can be affected by it.

Miss Emma Nicholson: I congratulate my hon. Friend on acting so swiftly and circumspectly to contain the disease within animals—if not on the Opposition Front Bench. Has the Ministry managed to achieve proper incinerating facilities? In the south-west we are concerned about the open burning of the repulsive carcases.

Mr. Thompson: There was open burning of carcases in Cornwall, at Lean quarry, in Peasedown St. John and in Cheriton Bishop in Devon. That has now stopped. We have a perfectly adequate facility in Hertfordshire, where we are collecting carcases and taking them to the incinerator in refrigerated vehicles. That facility is in Royston and will meet our needs for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Heffer: What about heifers?

Dr. David Clark: As the BSE-type disease has jumped species from sheep to cattle and there is some evidence that it has jumped to humans, why is the Ministry withholding cash for vital research work on BSE, which obviously poses a potential threat to public health?

Mr. Thompson: The answer to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) is that we have found the disease only in female cattle, with one exception, so he had better be careful.

The answer to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) is that there is no evidence that the disease can move from cattle to human beings. Scrapie has been endemic for many years and there is no evidence that it will move from sheep to human beings. We are burning the animals and have banned the milk in order to be doubly safe. We have spent a great deal of money on this disease and its eradication. We may be accused of spending too much, but I am sure that we cannot be accused of spending too little.

Sheepmeat

6. Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the sheepmeat regime will next be discussed in the Council of Agriculture Ministers of the European Economic Community.

Mr. MacGregor: I expect the Council to discuss the review of the sheepmeat regime again at its next meeting on 12 December.

Mr. Shepherd: Does my right hon. Friend agree that sheepmeat production is of particular importance to the west of the country, with only uplands to work, and where little else can be done with the ground? Does he agree also that the stabiliser package, as it is currently running, not only ignores imports from eastern Europe and New Zealand, but penalises United Kingdom and European production? Is there not, therefore, a case for seeking a marked reduction in imports from New Zealand under the voluntary restraints agreement below the level of 205,000, which is currently on the table, bearing in mind that at present New Zealand is putting in only about 200,000, yet this works against the interests of United Kingdom producers?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of the sheep sector, not only in the west country uplands, but in uplands throughout the United Kingdom. I am aware of that in the negotiations on which we are embarking. The stabiliser was introduced because of the escalating cost of the sheepmeat regime, now estimated to be more than 1 billion ecu, from a much lower base only a short while ago. The stabiliser was introduced to control that and it relates entirely to increases in flocks in the European Community.

My hon. Friend will know that imports from New Zealand and elsewhere are a major aspect of the review of the regime that we are undertaking. There is a draft agreement with New Zealand. The arrangements with New Zealand are GATT-bound, but we shall have to see how the negotiations go as we proceed with the review. I expect that that will take a long time.

Mr. MacDonald: Is it right that under the stabiliser proposal upland sheep farmers in less-favoured areas may face cuts in premiums because of increases in production on lower ground, particularly as a result of farmers who grow grain moving to sheep production? Can the Minister guarantee that that will not happen? If he cannot, will he look at the case for increasing the hill livestock allowances to compensate?

Mr. MacGregor: I cannot give a guarantee that that will not happen because, clearly, stabilisers are introduced in this sector, as in any other where there is a high cost in the regime, in order to control the costs of the regime. It is not possible to distinguish across the Community where the sheep receiving the benefits come from. I am aware of the importance of the sheep sector to the uplands, which is why I excluded grazed fallow from the set-aside scheme. I wanted to ensure that upland farmers were protected from what I would otherwise have seen as unfair competition. I did that because I was strongly aware of the sector's importance to the uplands.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Is my right hon. Friend aware that food prices and agricultural support are at their lowest level for 20 years? Does he realise that depressing agriculture prices is doing vast harm to the industry and to the British economy in general?

Mr. MacGregor: I do not think that that question is entirely related to the review of the sheepmeat regime, but I should like to say that it is important to ensure long-term stability for our farmers. That is what I have been keen to secure. While we have surpluses and the heavy cost of disposing of them, long-term security is on a fragile basis. I acknowledge the splendid contribution that farmers have made to food production and to keeping food prices down. I agree with my hon. Friend about that. I hope he agrees, however, that we must ensure security for the long term. Getting rid of surpluses and their cost must be part of that.

Common Agricultural Policy

7. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with European Community Agriculture Ministers about reform of the common agricultural policy; and what agreements were reached.

Mr. MacGregor: Discussions are continuing in the Agriculture Council on Commission proposals for reforming the CAP regimes for sheep and beef.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. In his negotiations with the Commission, does he share the view of the deputy director of the agriculture department of the Commission—Mr. Pooley—who said in Clwyd last week that, in his opinion, the common agricultural policy is likely to lead to farms with no sensible income that nobody but farmers would accept? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with that statement?

Mr. MacGregor: I am not entirely sure that I know what that statement means. That farmers would have no sensible income? That they would have lower incomes? If that is what Mr. Pooley said—he has never said it to me —I do not agree with him. We are anxious to secure a good, stable basis for the prosperity of our farmers. In other member states in the Community, I understand that there are a lot of small, non-viable farmers with non-viable incomes—many more than in Britain. That problem will have to be tackled.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: May I refer my right hon. Friend to the future of the sheepmeat regime? Will he give a rather more positive response to the view just expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd)? Does he agree that, since punitive milk quotas were imposed on the United Kingdom, many farming areas have been suitable only for sheep, so the sheepmeat regime is of considerable importance to the United Kingdom? Is it not extraordinary that the CAP does not show where surpluses and the huge additional costs to it that arise because of the increased number of sheep. Will my right hon. Friend consider that in future discussions in the European Community?

Mr. MacGregor: I certainly will. The sheep sector is expanding rather faster here than in many other Community countries. There are very good reasons for that, one of which is that we are good at it. In negotiations on the sheepmeat regime, I am anxious to secure arrangements that allow free but fair competition, provide support at reasonable cost and enable the United Kingdom to capitalise on our natural productive advantages in the sheepmeat sector. That is what I am out to secure, and I believe that it is exactly what our sheep producers want.

I am sure my hon. Friend knows that dairy quotas now have widespread support throughout the British farming community.

Mr. Maclennan: In answer to the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd), the Minister sounded more concerned about New Zealand sheep producers that about sheep producers in our own hills and uplands. Why is that his objective?

Mr. MacGregor: That is certainly not the impression I intended to give. I hope that the answer I have just given shows that I am fighting for United Kingdom sheep producers in order to secure the best possible arrangements in the future regime.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones) raised a matter of great importance for small farmers throughout the country? Will my right hon. Friend try to direct the energy of his fellow Ministers to reform the common agricultural policy and to protect farmers from partial and unbalanced programmes such as the BBC's "Watchdog", which made unfounded, dangerous and alarming allegations about eggs?

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, certainly. For small farmers, we must put the matter in perspective. The thrust of some policies geared towards small farmers being advocated in the Community would not be advantageous to the United Kingdom, because they are directed at the type of small farmer, that we do not have. Those are the unviable farmers, and I am not sure that those policies make sense.

On the issue of salmonella in eggs, it is important that the media put across a balanced view. There have been a small number of outbreaks in relation to total egg consumption per day. There have been 26 outbreaks this year, and 30 million eggs are consumed per day. Therefore, the risks are small. Having said that, we and the industry are determined to ensure that we minimise the risks to the maximum extent possible. We are considering further measures to enable us to do so.

Farmers (Northern Region)

8. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent correspondence he has received from farmers in the northern region.

Mr. Ryder: We receive substantial correspondence from farmers in the northern region on a wide variety of issues.

Mr. Devlin: The Minister will be aware from recent correspondence that, although many farmers in the northern region have had a good harvest, they have not had a good financial year? I ask him, on behalf of the farmers in my region, what advice he has to offer them? Is he asking them to get out of agriculture altogether, should they diversify, or just soldier on regardless?

Mr. Ryder: We shall, as always, be keeping a close watch on information about farm incomes that emerges from the annual review. Work is still being done on the figures. However, it is clear that although there is pressure in some sectors, others, such as the dairy sector and farms in less-favoured areas, both of particular relevance to the north, appear to have had a better year. I am convinced that the policies we are pursuing are the best way to ensure a viable and stable farming industry in the north.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Minister aware that the proximity of the northern region to Scotland will be making farmers and farm workers in the north of England aware of the burdens that will result from the imposition of the poll tax on employees whose employers at present pay their rates for them? Will he seek to avoid the distress and difficulties that are presently being created for farm workers in Scotland by immediately asking the English Agricultural Wages Board to take steps to avoid that problem being created for farm workers in England and Wales in a year's time?

Mr. Ryder: I welcome the hon. Gentleman back to the Labour Front Bench. Under the community charge, if an employer wishes to pay the community charge of an employee he is still entitled to do so. It is not for me to interfere with matters that are looked after by the Agricultural Wages Board.

Licensed Victuallers Association

9. Mr. Allen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met representatives of the Licensed Victuallers Association.

Mr. Ryder: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Member for Calder Valley (Mr. Thompson), met representatives of the National Licensed Victuallers Association on 25 April 1988, in the company of several hon. Members, including the hon. Member, himself.

Mr. Allen: Does the Minister agree that there are now large numbers of people in the brewing industry who own pubs but who are not brewers by trade—they are property developers, speculators and so on? Is he aware that their tenants and publicans are not covered by the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, nor by the voluntary code of practice to which brewers adhere? Will he meet the LVA to discuss how to tackle the problem?

Mr. Ryder: I would be pleased to meet the LVA. There are very few instances such as those raised by the hon. Gentleman, but he is right to draw attention to them. In the case of recent relatively large scale pub sales by one of the major brewers, Grand Metropolitan, to a non-brewer, Heron, the contract of sale required the buying company to respect the provisions of the code, so the tenants continue to enjoy that protection. We would expect similar arrangements to apply to other similar sales. If there are other cases which the hon. Gentleman would wish to draw to my attention, I hope that he will do so.

Mr. Colvin: May I suggest an easy solution to my hon. Friend? That is, to give statutory backing to the brewers' code of practice on tenants' security.

Mr. Ryder: That is a matter for the Brewers' Society in consultation with the LVA, and I am not convinced yet that both those organisations wish to go down the path that has been recommended by my hon. Friend.

Green Pound

10. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in securing a further devaluation of the green pound.

Mr. MacGregor: Following persistent United Kingdom pressure in the price negotiations in July, the green pound will be devalued from 1 January 1989 to reduce monetary compensatory amounts by 3·2 points, except for beef, where devaluations will be considered during the current review of the regime.

Mr. Livsey: I thank the Minister for that answer. I am pleased to hear that there will be a devaluation. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that that is not sufficient, with farming incomes at their lowest in real terms since the last war? Will he press for a further devaluation in addition to the one that he has said is on the books?

Mr. MacGregor: Devaluations of the green pound are normally considered in price negotiations. We achieved one of the best deals, with the exception of Greece, where exceptional circumstances applied, in the last negotiations. I have made it clear that I want to see MCAs phased out by 1992. I have succeeded in getting the Community to agree to that. I shall be persisting in that approach.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be departing immediately this afternoon to attend the European Council at Rhodes.

Mr. Bowden: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to repudiate claims so assiduously put about by the Opposition that the failure of the Irish Government to expedite an extradition order in respect of Father Patrick Ryan is due in any way to an error on the part of the Crown Prosecution Service?

The Prime Minister: I understand that very shortly my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General will be dealing with these matters in response to a private notice question, and will deal with them fully. I can deal with them only generally. Any suggestion that the failure to secure Ryan's arrest is attributable to any fault of the CPS is absolutely unwarranted. The fact is that the Irish authorities could have sought a provisional warrant from early last Friday evening onwards. The Irish Attorney-General has been in a position to authorise the backing of the original warrants since they arrived in Dublin early on Saturday. It is now over five days since all the relevant documents were sent to Dublin. No questions have been raised as to the sufficiency of the statements of fact and law, although my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General had told his opposite number that he was immediately available.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister share the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that mortgage interest payments should be withdrawn from the retail prices index?

The Prime Minister: I understand that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made it clear that there was no immediate proposal to exclude mortgage interest payments from the RPI. As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, there is an advisory committee which considers any changes to the RPI. The Government's view is well known. We include mortgage interest payments in the retail prices index, which very few other countries do. It obscures the underlying trend and produces the perverse effect that the tightening of monetary policy causes an apparent rise in recorded inflation. However, the payments are included, and the right hon. Gentleman will be aware that they can have a perverse effect both when the RPI goes up and when it comes down. If the payments were excluded, an alternative measure would need to be added. There is no immediate proposal to exclude them.

Mr. Kinnock: We remember when there were "no immediate proposals" to break the link between pensions and earnings. We remember, too, when there were "no plans" to add new NHS charges. We recall also when there were "no immediate proposals" to freeze child benefit payments. Against such a background of mendacity—[Interruption.]—who can believe that the Prime Minister has no plans—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] Yes, it is true. It is true.

With such a record of assiduous mendacity, who can believe that the Prime Minister does not want to take mortgage payments out of the RPI?

Mr. Marlow: The right hon. Gentleman called my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister a liar. He should withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Allow me to deal with this. The right hon. Gentleman used the word in a general sense and not attributable to the Prime Minister personally.

Mr. Marlow: Coward.

Mr. Speaker: I hope that that word was not directed towards me.

Hon. Members: It was.

Mr. Marlow: I was using the word in a general sense, Mr. Speaker, but if you so wish—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman presumed, and I am sure that he would not do that, to call me a liar, I hope that he will withdraw that immediately.

Mr. Marlow: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I did not hear what you said, but if you so wish, I will certainly withdraw it.

The Prime Minister: And we remember when there was a promise to increase pensions by either the amount of inflation or by having regard to earnings. The pensioners got neither, because the actual increase in inflation under the Labour Government was too great for Labour to honour its promises and the Labour Government did the biggest cheat on the pensioners that has ever been known since pensions were started.

Mr. Kinnock: That was a pathetic dodge from the queen of frauds. Even if household costs do not figure large in the Thatcher family, they do figure large in families in the rest of Britain. Will the Prime Minister accept that any British retail prices index which does not include mortgage payments would be fraudulent? Is it that which attracts the Prime Minister?

The Prime Minister: The biggest fraud on the pensioners cost them the equivalent of £1 billion in 1976 under the Labour Government. Pensioners now have more certainty of their basic pension and of its increasing with inflation than they have ever had before. The right hon. Gentleman knows that mortgage costs are included in the retail prices index. If they were not, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, there would have to be some other measure of housing cost in the RPI. Any alternative measure would have to go to the advisory committee for consideration. A measure went to the advisory committee on mortgage interest some time ago and the committee turned it down, so mortgage interest payments are in the present retail prices index.

Mr. Kinnock rose—— [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh no."]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very exceptional Mr. Kinnock. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."]

Mr. Kinnock: This Prime Minister has taken £5 billion a year off pensioners by breaking the link between pensions and earnings. When she starts to give that back, we will start to respect her.

The Prime Minister: May I point out what the then Mr. David Ennals, now Lord Ennals, said with regard to that when challenged about that assessment. When challenged about the inflation or earnings he said:

> "There is a statutory obligation to take these figures and earnings into account which was done, but"— said a previous Secretary of State for Social Services—

> "no statutory obligation to get it right."

The Labour party got it wrong.

Q2. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Gorman: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the run-up to Christmas the Post Office unions are already up to their seasonal nonsense of striking and that nine depots in and around my constituency of Billericay are out on strike? Will she assure the public that, so that they will receive their Christmas post, the Government will remove the one obstacle that prevents the private sector from competing, by lowering the threshold from £1 to 10p, so that private networks can afford to compete with the Post Office in delivering our Christmas cards?

The Prime Minister: I know that there has been some considerable disruption in my hon. Friend's constituency in the counters business and I join her in deploring that. It is extremely ungenerous at this time of year, but, more than that, it is damaging to small businesses, which depend on money and orders coming in for their business to continue. I have taken note of what my hon. Friend said. The Post Office has a monopoly and if this kind of thing continues we shall have to consider precisely what she says —reducing the monopoly threshold from the present level of £1.

Mr. Hume: Given the difficult and emotional relationship between Britain and Ireland over the years, and the serious efforts that the Prime Minister and her Government, together with the Irish Government, have been making over the last number of years to address that issue, what contribution to that process does she think her remarks made on Tuesday—her highly orchestrated pre-judgment of the Irish authorities' attitude before they had taken the decision on the extradition application in accordance with their legal processes? Does the right hon. Lady know that the Belgian authorities were given five months to deal with the same application, which they turned down because the evidence was imprecise and vague? Does the right hon. Lady know that the Irish authorities have extradited 895 people to the United Kingdom throughout the present troubles and in the past 12 months have made the biggest arms finds in our history? How does that square with her accusation that they are only interested in fine words, not actions?

Mr. Speaker: Briefly.

Mr. Hume: Will the right hon. Lady tell her Attorney-General that his behaviour in revealing to the press selected details of a private conversation with his opposite number in Dublin is highly——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is Question Time. The hon. Gentleman should not make a statement.

Mr. Hume rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has had his say.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is aware that the law on extradition was changed unilaterally by the Republic of Ireland. Nevertheless, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General endeavoured fully to comply with the new law. It is now more than five days since all the relevant documents were sent to Dublin and no questions have been raised about the sufficiency of the statements of fact in them. That is an important matter to all of us in the United Kingdom.

Q3. Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jones: Does my right hon. Friend recall that at the time of the passage of the Education Reform Act there were dire warnings from teachers' unions and Opposition Members that parents would not come forward as school governors because of their responsibilities under that Act? Will she contrast that with the experience throughout my constituency, where large numbers of parents have stood for those positions, where there have been high polls and where the quality of candidates coming forward has been superb?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. The extra choice being given by the education reforms of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has been welcomed up and down the country by many parents and they are coming forward in record numbers to be governors of schools, prepared to take full responsibility, recognising the chances of obtaining a better education for their children. That is welcome.

Q4. Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Smith: In drawing up her Government's Official Secrets Bill, the Prime Minister and her Home Secretary have excluded from it any rights of public interest as a defence for disclosure. Why have they done that? Has the Prime Minister forgotten that the public interest is what government is supposed to be about?

The Prime Minister: The Bill has been published. I am advised that there are no such rights now as those to which the hon. Gentleman refers. The Bill has, on the whole, been much welcomed as an advance on the previous measure. There will be abundant chances to debate it on Second Reading and in Committee.

Mr. Lawrence: Is my right hon. Friend aware that shortly after the PLO spokesman in London was convincing the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) that the PLO would recognise the existence of the state of Israel, the BBC reported that the PLO foreign affairs spokesman in New York denied that any such statement had been made and refused to endorse it? Is my right hon. Friend aware also that the whole House is behind her stand against terrorism? It is perfectly consistent with that stand that any Government should say to anybody——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Briefly. This is not a statement, but Prime Minister's Question Time.

The Prime Minister: As far back as 1985, when we were considering speaking to certain PLO executive members, I made clear my position that three conditions must clearly be met. First, that United Nations resolutions 242 and 338 must be clearly accepted; secondly, that Israel's right to exist behind secure borders must be clearly and explicitly accepted; thirdly, that violence must be utterly rejected. When the Palestinian National Council resolution came out, I took the view that, although it was not absolutely clear, what had been done in respect of United Nations resolution 242, although allied to other United Nations resolutions, was a clear step forward. On the other hand, Israel's right to exist has not been explicitly recognised, nor has violence been utterly renounced.

Patrick Ryan

3.31 pm

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon) (by private notice): To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the action taken by Her Majesty's Government to seek the extradition of Patrick Ryan to the United Kingdom.

The Attorney-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): The Government have sought the extradition of Patrick Ryan from Belgium and the Metropolitan police sought it latterly from the Republic of Ireland.

In the Belgian proceedings, which followed Patrick Ryan's arrest in Belgium on 30 June 1988, extradition was sought in respect of the following offences: (1) conspiracy to murder; (2) conspiracy to cause explosions; (3) possession of explosives with intent to endanger life or cause serious injury to property; (4) possession of explosive substances without a lawful object.

Our own prosecuting authorities consulted the Belgian prosecuting authority before initiating the extradition proceedings and were given no reason by the Belgian authority to suppose that the request might fail to satisfy Belgian legal requirements. The extradition of Patrick Ryan was authorised by the Belgian court of first instance on 26 September, subject to the approval of the Minister of Justice, and by the Belgian Court of Appeal of Brussels on 12 October in respect of the two conspiracy charges.

As I understand it, Patrick Ryan's case then fell to be considered by the Belgian Minister of Justice. On 25 November—Friday—the Belgian Government refused to order extradition and ordered Patrick Ryan's repatriation to the Irish Republic. On learning on Friday afternoon of the Belgian decision and that Patrick Ryan was expected to arrive in Dublin that evening, an immediate application was made by the Crown prosecution service at Bow street magistrates' court for fresh warrants for Patrick Ryan's arrest, as was necessary to comply with Irish requirements. Warrants were issued in the late afternoon and facsimiles at once transmitted to the Irish authorities in Dublin at 6.20 pm. Facsimiles of the documentation, which the Irish Attorney-General requires under the provisions of the Irish Extradition (Amendment) Act 1987, were transmitted to his Department between 4.30 pm and 6.30 pm that evening.

That documentation contained a full statement of the facts upon which the allegations were founded, a statement setting out the relevant English law, and a certificate by me that it is the Crown prosecution service's clear intention to bring a prosecution and that that prosecuting authority has satisfied itself that there is sufficient admissible evidence to found a prosecution. The documentation with which I provided the Irish Attorney-General last Friday fulfilled the requirements of the legislation.

On Friday the Metropolitan police had requested the Gardai to obtain provisional warrants for the arrest of Patrick Ryan pending the arrival in Dublin of the warrants just issued at Bow street, which in the event were delivered to the Irish authorities in Dublin in the early hours of Saturday. No provisional warrants, however, were sought.

My Department was in touch with its counterpart in Dublin late on Friday night with a view to enabling me to speak to the Irish Attorney-General, Mr. Murray. That was because we had learnt that the Metropolitan police had been told by the Gardai that no action was to be taken on any warrant until the two Attornies-General had spoken. In the event, I spoke to Mr. Murray for the first time when he telephoned me at 10.30 am on Monday. He informed me that he was still considering the documentation. I drew attention to the risk that Ryan might discharge himself from the clinic where he was undergoing treatment, and asked him to make an early decision.

Mr. Murray acknowledged that risk. I told him that if there were any problem with the documentation or any other question I would be immediately available. No question about the adequacy of any of the documentation sent to him for the purpose of the 1987 Act has been raised with me. I understand that Mr. Murray is still considering the application.

Before the effective warrants were obtained on Friday, warrants in draft form were submitted to the Irish Attorney-General's Office on Wednesday 23 November. That followed a helpful practice, for which I am grateful and which has been developed between the two Departments, the law and practice in relation to warrants being different in the Republic of Ireland from that in England. Those documents were sent on a contingency basis lest the Belgians should decide to repatriate Patrick Ryan. The draft warrants did not constitute the sending of a request for extradition: the very purpose of sending drafts to the Irish is to allow them to comment on the form of the warrant. I mention that because of certain misleading publicity.

Irish officials, apart from drawing attention to two minor details and to certain purely presentational matters, expressed themselves content with the form of the proposed warrants. The Bow street warrants took account of those comments on Friday. On Saturday 26 November, the Irish authorities alerted us to the omission by the Bow street chief clerk of a date in the certificates accompaning the warrants. That omission, which we were advised was not a serious matter, was immediately rectified the same day.

We believe that this matter affected neither the Gardai's statutory power to seek provisional warrants from Friday evening nor the statutory power to back the effective warrants on their arrival in Dublin early on Saturday morning.

Mr. Morris: How far have future applications been assisted by the Prime Minister's hysterical outburst on Tuesday, and in particular by her endorsement of the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates)? Does not the Attorney-General agree that Belgium and Ireland are sovereign states and cannot be treated as erring Cabinet Ministers? As the Attorney-General has acknowledged today that there is a difference in practice in each country, should not—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are matters about which the whole House wishes to hear.

Mr. Morris: I am obliged to you, Mr. Speaker.

Should not the Attorney-General have first advised the House? Surely he should not have allowed the Crown prosecution service on his behalf to brief the press, given the danger of prejudicing a fair trial. The Attorney-General knows of my support for him in extradition matters—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] He knows of it and he would be the first to acknowledge it, but why can he not get his act right? What has become of the Home

Secretary's promise that the Director of Public Prosecutions would ensure personally that warrants were checked for accuracy and sufficiency?

Will the Attorney-General confirm that on Wednesday, when draft warrants arrived, Irish Government lawyers pointed out a number of serious flaws—[HON. MEMBERS: "Disgraceful."]—and that on Thursday the Irish Attorney-General's officials telephoned urging that the correct material be sent over; that on Friday new flaws were discovered, and some of the supporting documents were unintelligible; and that only on Saturday were correct certificates faxed through? If Ryan had been wrongfully arrested, could not that, or future extradition proceedings, be at risk? In any event, he would have had to be released late on Sunday, if arrested on a provisional warrant on Friday.

Will the Attorney-General confirm reports that it was the Irish Government who suggested the possibility of advance warrants and material if things went wrong in Belgium? Why were steps not taken earlier to give them ample time to consider a complicated matter? The Irish seem to have been at fault for five days. The Belgians had five months. What, since Tuesday, is the status of the "close and personal relationship" between the Attorney-General and his opposite number in the Republic, about which he was pleased to tell the House as late as 14 June of this year?

The Attorney-General: If I may deal with the right hon. and learned Gentleman's first question, he knows perfectly well, from his own extensive and distinguished practice in the law, that there is no value in answering a question that is based on a false premise. However, I utterly reject the premise on which he founds his question: that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's observations on Tuesday are in any way to be criticised.

As to future applications for extradition from the Republic of Ireland, I hope that lessons will be learnt from this application which may facilitate what I trust and believe to be the object of both Governments: to bring persons who are suspected of serious offences to justice in the courts of the country where the offences are alleged to have occurred.

I am asked whether I ought to have advised the House first. I do not think that I can be accused of being backward in coming forward with statements. I have volunteered more statements in this House in a shorter time than any other Attorney-General in living memory. [Laughter.] However regrettable it is, the situation today is that I have made an application for the extradition of Patrick Ryan and I am waiting for the response of the Irish Attorney-General.

I was asked whether I should get my "act right." I emphasise what is said in the statement—a copy of which is before the right hon. and learned Gentleman—that no complaint or even query has been raised as to the sufficiency or propriety of any of the documentation that is before the Irish Attorney-General. I believe that I have set out, in what I hope is helpful detail, the whole history of the matter.

Much misleading publicity has been given to what took place in connection with draft warrants, sent on a contingency basis, during the earlier part of the last week. They were sent for the specific purpose of their being commented upon by the Irish Government. The comments that were made were incorporated in the effective warrants that were issued on Friday at Bow street. It is true, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, that provisional warrants—for which there is statutory authority in Irish law, as he knows—can be issued before the original warrants arrive in the Irish Republic for backing. That is possible. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, and rightly has mentioned it, that such warrants have a three-day life. Somebody who is arrested under them has to be released by the end of three days, unless a substantial warrant has been backed.

This case, in which my colleague, the Irish Attorney-General, has already taken five and a half days to consider these matters, gives point to the objections that the British Government raised at the end of last year when the new unilateral legislation was put forward by the Irish Government, giving the Irish Attorney-General the duty to satisfy himself that there is a sufficiency of evidence and a settled intention to prosecute. There will be many cases —and this is not one of them because the Irish Government say that they know where Mr. Ryan is—in which somebody is suddenly arrested and there are three days for the whole of the procedure to be gone through. It is plain that in this case, which has required five and a half days, the procedure is gravely flawed, as we said it would be.

I was asked why, if the Belgians had taken five months, the Irish should be expected to do it more quickly. That is a thoroughly bad point. The Belgian Government requested that we should initiate extradition proceedings. The police then had to investigate the evidence. When the evidence was found to be sufficient to support four charges, the advice of the Belgian authorities was sought, given, and followed through. It was only then, much later, that the proceedings took place in the two courts which authorised the extradition of Patrick Ryan on the conspiracy charges subject to the approval of the Belgian Minister, as I have informed the House today.

Finally, I was asked about my relationship with Mr. Murray. I stand by every word of the description of that relationship that I gave on an earlier occasion. I have a close relationship with Mr. Murray, I trust one of friendship. We each have our duty to perform. I have performed mine and I am quite certain that Mr. Murray will perform his. I just wish that we could reach a decision rather quickly.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Is my right hon. and learned Friend surprised at the attitude of the Irish Government? To put it bluntly, have we not been double-crossed by them? Did they not promise in the Anglo-Irish Agreement to deprive wanted terrorists of immunity from extradition? When they did so deprive them, did they not at the same time give their Attorney-General the power to delay or to veto any warrant—provisional or otherwise—and has not the Irish Attorney-General used that power to the great disadvantage of justice?

The Attorney-General: I appreciate the depth of feeling that lies behind my hon. Friend's question. However, I do not subscribe to the verb he has applied to the Irish Goverment. The power given to the Irish Attorney-General to direct that there shall be no endorsement of an English warrant was given to him in consequence, so it was said by the Irish Government, of the fact that the Irish Government were to ratify the European convention on the suppression of terrorism. Whatever the reason for giving it, we pointed out at the time that it would act as an obstacle to extradition. I very much regret to say that it is so proving.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): While recognising that the Prime Minister's remarks expressing surprise about what happened in Belgium were wholly understandable in the circumstances, particularly in the light of what the Attorney-General said about the advice tendered by the Belgian Government, does he accept that comment about proceedings in Ireland does not help when the matter has not been concluded, and advancing arguments about the adequacy or otherwise of what the Government or the Irish Government are doing can be only for partisan advantage and not to further the course of justice?

The Attorney-General: What my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on Tuesday was that the failure to secure the arrest of Patrick Ryan was a matter of very great concern to the British Government. The hon. Gentleman must surely realise that it is a matter of great concern because proceedings are now in train and warrants have been issued. It is not for me to talk about the facts behind the charges that we wish to bring against Patrick Ryan, but the hon. Gentleman knows from the very nature of those charges which I have read out today, how serious the matter is. Of course it is a matter of great concern and every Member of the House, whether Prime Minister or not, is entitled to express his view.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is it not clear that the decision of the Belgian Minister of Justice not to accede to our request for extradition was taken not on legal grounds but on political grounds? Did not the Belgian Government add to their shame by sending Mr. Ryan to Dublin from Brussels in a Belgian military aircraft? Does my right hon. and learned Friend understand the increasing concern of people within and without Northern Ireland that we should continue to confer upon a Government who harbour suspected terrorists a position of special privilege in relation to that part of this kingdom which has been afflicted most grievously by terrorism?

The Attorney-General: I am afraid that it seems to be the case that the Belgian Government's decision was taken on political grounds. I say that it seems to be the case, because their procedure requires that the Belgian Minister of Justice shall consult the Appeal Court and ask for its recommendation. I have already told the House that we understand that the court of first instance and the Appeal Court had authorised extradition on two conspiracy charges. Therefore, it would seem unlikely that the recommendation of the Court of Appeal would differ from that authorisation. But that is secret, and we do not know whether or not it is so. All that I can say is that it has been reported in the Belgian press, so I understand, that the recommendation was to authorise extradition. If that is the case, it is a very regrettable matter for all who are concerned with the fight against international terrorism, as we have always understood the Belgian Government to be, along with their allies.

It is the case that Patrick Ryan was put into a military aircraft. It is perhaps even more significant that, although we had received several informal assurances that we would have 24 hours' notice between the decision of the Belgian Government and the deportation of Patrick Ryan, we were given no notice at all. That is why, when the warrants were obtained at Bow street, the very greatest haste was necessitated, because he might have been in the air at that time.

I hope that my hon. Friend will excuse me from answering the last part of his question, which he will recognise falls outside my own responsibilities.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): The Attorney-General has confirmed that, for whatever reasons, the Irish authorities are still considering the application. As that consideration is a judicial process concerned with the assessment of evidence, I again ask the Attorney-General whether the Prime Minister's immoderate attempt to apply pressure was unconstitutional, counter-productive and prejudicial to any prospect of a fair trial.

The Attorney-General: No, Sir.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it was deeply regrettable that the Belgian authorities left so little time for the matter to be properly considered? Does he agree that it was an even greater pity that it took so long between Friday and Monday for the matter to be given the consideration that it required on both sides? Furthermore, does he agree that justice is to be found in the interstices of procedure and that, at bottom, we in this country and those in the Irish Republic are both concerned about the repression of terrorism? Is it not the case that, if these matters are not sorted out within the context of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, both countries have an enormous amount to lose?

The Attorney-General: I believe that we must secure between our two countries a more effective procedure for obtaining what we both want, which is the bringing of those suspected of serious offences to justice in the country in which such offences are alleged to have occurred. I have said all that I need to say about the Belgian decision, the reasons why it was taken, and the manner in which it was communicated to the British Government.

As to the procedure that is now going on in the Republic, I have to await the decision of my counterpart, but I draw attention to the fact that, in spite of having asked to be told if there was any difficulty or problem, and having told my counterpart that I would be immediately available if that was of any help, I have heard no word. Therefore, I can only hope that a speedy and favourable decision will be reached.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): As anti-terrorist co-operation from the Dublin Government was the only quid pro quo for the British humiliation of Unionists, is there not an obligation on the Dublin Government to co-operate freely and in a civilised fashion and to make that co-operation on an unconditional and unreserved basis?

The Attorney-General: I believe that no reason can legitimately be given for any failure to co-operate in the fight against terrorism, to which both Governments are committed.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that yesterday, as chairman of the Anglo-Belgian parliamentary group, I saw the Belgian ambassador to tell him of the strength of feeling among hon. Members of this House about what has happened? Can he enlarge on the strength of the evidence about Ryan that was available to the Belgian authorities in this episode, which is all the more distressing following, as it does, the impressive life-saving rescue exercise by the Belgians when the ferry sank off Zeebrugge?

The Attorney-General: I note what my hon. Friend says. I thought it right to send a letter to the Belgian ambassador three or four days before Friday drawing attention to the seriousness of the matters for which we desire to place Patrick Ryan on trial. I cannot talk about the strength of the evidence because, following the issue of the warrant, technically, criminal proceedings are in train.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Is it not important that those against whom there are allegations of being involved in terrorism, whether in Ireland or anywhere else, should be brought to trial promptly? Is it not also true that, whether anyone in the House likes it or not, all the inquiries that I have made in the south of Ireland show that people who do not support the Provisional IRA believe passionately that a fair trial is not obtainable here?

Does the Attorney-General recall that following an agreement made with the Government of the right hon. Member for Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), the Irish Government asked for the Criminal Law (Jurisdiction) Act 1975, under which people may be brought to trial in the country where they are at the time? Would it not be worth considering using that Act? Unless something is done, the man—who has not yet been proved guilty—will not be brought for questioning or for trial.

The Attorney-General: I do not believe there is the slightest justification for any feeling in the Republic of Ireland that there is no prospect of a fair trial in England. We are in no need of lessons on how to devise and implement fair judicial procedures.

The right hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the Irish Criminal Law (Jurisdiction) Act. But that cannot be a substitute for extradition under the terms of the extradition arrangements between the two countries. In some cases it is proper to use provisions of that Act and, in appropriate cases, I am delighted to make the necessary request. I did so only last week in the case of Sloan. The Irish Attorney-General has accepted that request and matters are proceeding. Although the use of the Act has not been raised with me as a possibility by the Irish Attorney-General, it would not be appropriate in this case because there is good reason to doubt whether the Irish courts would have jurisdiction under the terms of that Act in respect of two of the four charges.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): The IRA terrorists must be chuckling with delight at the attacks made on the Prime Minister, the Attorney-General—who fills his office with distinction—and his officials who have been seeking the extradition of Patrick Ryan to the United Kingdom. Sadly, such remarks will be quoted in support of the IRA throughout the world. Will the Attorney-General consider extending another invitation to his counterpart in Dublin to get together to resolve the problems that have arisen frequently in the past? Perhaps he might also be able to refute the allegation that has been made in the House this afternoon, time after time in the media, and all over the world, that an Irishman cannot get justice in a British court. If that is so, why do tens of thousands of Irish people from the Republic emigrate to Britain?

The Attorney-General: While I am grateful for those personal remarks, I know it not to be the opinion of the Irish Government that there is no fair trial to be had for an Irishman in this country, and if it were otherwise, how could we explain the amendment to the Irish Extradition Act in 1987? Why not abrogate it completely? I know that that is not the view of the Irish Government, and no shred of justification for it could exist. I am always ready to talk to my opposite number. I put in train attempts to speak to him late on Friday night, but unfortunately he was not able to speak to me until 10.30 on Monday. I have told the House what transpired then. I hope that we shall continue to have a close and sensible relationship. Before I came to the House, I made arrangements for the answer that I was proposing to give to the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) to be faxed to him, although not long before, and I trust that we shall be able to move forward.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): The Crown prosecution service told us that there were mistakes in two of the warrants that were sent to Dublin. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] The Irish Government have said that there were two mistakes in those warrants. I tend to take the view of the Crown prosecution service, because it has been making those mistakes consistently for a number of years, and seems to be the expert on it. It is his duty to clarify that question, and I ask the Attorney-General to do so. Has he realised the damage that was done to the opinion of moderate people in Ireland when the incompetence of the Crown prosecution service degenerated into prime ministerial vindictiveness? Will he try to get his colleague the Prime Minister to retract the insults that she made against the Irish Government?

The Attorney-General: If the Crown prosecution service was guilty of as much inaccuracy as was revealed in the hon. Gentleman's opening remarks, there would indeed be cause for anxiety. I made it clear, I hope, in my answer to the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon that, on a contingent basis, draft warrants were submitted to the Irish authorities in the early part of last week. I drew attention to the comments that were made by the Irish in respect of those. Perhaps I can amplify them to a small extent, and without wasting time. Of the two minor details that I mentioned, one consisted of a form of description of the charge that had been settled by leading counsel in this country. The other consisted of one superfluous word in the draft court clerk's certificate. The most significant of the presentational matters that I mentioned consisted of a form previously accepted by the Irish authorities in the recent case of McVeigh.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): What my right hon. and learned Friend has said, the manner in which he has said it, and the frequency with which he comes to discuss these issues in the House is wholly acceptable, as is the way in which he discharges his onerous responsibilities. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Will he take note, and perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office will take particular note, that there can be no progress in the fight against terrorism without complete international co-operation? As there have been these difficulties over the technicalities of expressions on documentation, or over the acceptance on either side of the Attorney-General's fence that quick action should be taken, the overall result is a decline in the effectiveness of anti-terrorist measures throughout Ireland, the United Kingdom and the European Community. Will my right hon. and learned Friend make it clear to the Attorney-General in the Irish Republic that if this is the way that things will proceed, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary or my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister cannot maintain the commitment that we have so far shown?

The Attorney-General: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend has said. I agree, as I think will every hon. Member, with what he went on to say. There is no doubt that the attack upon international terrorism calls for sophisticated co-operation, and there is no doubt that vociferous and sometimes powerful minorities will resent such co-operation. I hope that it is agreed on all sides that they must not be allowed to impede that co-operation. There will be no shortcoming in the co-operation that I and Her Majesty's Government offer to our friends, and we hope for no more than the same in return.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Instead of throwing a fit of tantrums last Tuesday afternoon and whipping up the anti-Irish feelings of some of her Back Benchers—notoriously the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates)—the Prime Minister should have shown a greater awareness of the extradition procedures of other nations. Why is it that those two faulty details of last weekend's extradition warrents, which the Attorney-General seeks to dismiss so lightly, have been a feature of a majority of the extradition warrants that have been directed across the Irish sea during the past three years?

The Attorney-General: I do not accept the last part of the hon. Gentleman's observations.

Mr. Duffy: It is true.

The Attorney-General: Certainly not. I would have thought that he would have welcomed the helpful practice that has grown up between our two Departments, which I mentioned, whereby whenever there is time and it is practicable, draft warrants are submitted on a contingent basis for the very reason that the law and practice of the courts in Ireland relating to warrants is different from that in this country.

Mr. Duffy: Why not get it right?

The Attorney-General: I might suggest that the hon. Gentleman gets it right himself.

Mr. Duffy: I have got it right.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Attorney-General: The hon. Gentleman has asked me a question. I assume in his favour that he would like to hear the answer that I am endeavouring to give. He speaks of defects in the warrant of last weekend. There were no defects. No problem has been raised with me by the Irish Attorney-General. It has not been suggested that there was anything wrong with the warrant of last weekend. There was a problem about the omission of a date in the chief clerk's certificate. We were told that it was not serious and could be corrected on Monday, and it was corrected on Saturday. It has had no effect.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) only makes himself more ridiculous by those remarks? If I were to be criticised by some of my hon. Friends, it would be for having been the most ardent supporter on the Government Benches of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister stated quite clearly that there is no sign from the Irish Government that any of the warrants are defective, and as my right hon. and learned Friend has made that abundantly clear, both in his statement and in his answers, and as the Irish authorities allege that they know where Ryan is, is there any reason why he should not now be detained, pending a decision?

The Attorney-General: The crucial distinction of this case is that Patrick Ryan, according to the Irish Government, is in a place the whereabouts of which is known to them. Therefore, presumably it is possible for a warrant, if it is backed for execution, to lead to his arrest.

It is quite true that no problem has been raised with me. If there is one, I remain available to do what I can to help, but I cannot help feeling that, as five and a half days have gone by, any insufficiency would have been drawn to my attention by now, if one had been perceived.

I did not deal fully with what was said about my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's intervention last Tuesday. I have read it and have it before me now. I really cannot see that any objection can be taken to her view, expressed no doubt with feeling, that it is that the arrest has not been authorised.

"a matter of very grave concern"—[Official Report, 29 November 1988; Vol. 142, c. 574.]

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Read on.

The Attorney-General: I believe that some rather offensive and highly coloured interpretations have today been placed upon her comments.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a private notice question and that we have had more than double the length of time that I would normally allow for it.

Business of the House

4.10 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the Leader of the House tell us the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 5 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Elected Authorities (Northern Ireland) Bill.

Motion to take note of EC documents relating to Community finance. Details will be given in the Official Report.

TUESDAY 6 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 7 DECEMBER and THURSDAY 8 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Water Bill.

FRIDAY 9 DECEMBER—There will be a debate on the multifibre arrangement on a motion for the Adjournment of the House. Details of relevant EC documents will be given in the Official Report.

MONDAY 12 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Electricity Bill.

Mr. Dobson: I thank the Leader of the House for his statement.

First, can he yet tell us when we can expect a statement that the Government have changed their policy on the inclusion of mortgage interest rates in the retail prices index?

Secondly, may I remind the Leader of the House that the Standing Orders of the House require the establishment of a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs? He is responsible for this long-running breach of Standing Orders and breach of faith with the people of Scotland. He and his colleagues are quick to chide others for anything that they think contravenes our rules. Will he try to keep them himself, or does he just think that the rules apply to the Opposition? When will he either set up the Scottish Affairs Select Committee or give us the promised half-day debate about not doing so?

Thirdly, 10 December sees the 40th anniversary of the universal declaration of human rights. Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on human rights at a time when half the countries of the world have political prisoners, a third of them use torture and Britain still persists in exporting leg irons to several of them?

Finally, will he tell us when we are to have the first Opposition day debate? We have now had 20 days of Government business of one sort or another since the last Opposition day debate and we did not get a fair share in the last Session. When shall we have the first bit of our share in this Session?

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Answer.

Mr. Wakeham: Yes, I certainly will answer.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) is a hard person to please. We have just completed six days of debate on the Loyal Address, during which the Opposition chose the subjects for debate. However, I recognise that, under our Standing Orders, the Opposition are entitled to days, and I shall see to it that those are provided. I shall do my best to arrange a debate as soon as possible. The exact date is best discussed through the usual channels.

As for the other questions raised by the hon. Gentleman, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister dealt with the question of the retail prices index. As he is well aware, there are no present plans to make a change in that matter. Of course, any change would have to go through the proper processes, if it were contemplated in the future.

With regard to the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, as I have said repeatedly, I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of the events. I have put up proposals that are unacceptable to the Opposition, which I deeply regret. I have also offered a time for a debate and I understand that that was not acceptable either. However, I certainly intend to arrange a debate on this matter before Christmas and suggest that the exact timing is best left for discussion through the usual channels.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that human rights are an important matter. I am sorry that time does not permit me to arrange a debate on the day that he suggested. However, there will be occasions between now and Christmas when hon. Members who believe that there are points to be made on that subject will have the opportunity to do so.

Sir Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): Will my right hon. Friend reflect on the number of "take note" motions on European legislation that we have had recently late in the evening? Such legislation is reviewed by the Select Committee on European Legislation, but, by the time it reaches the Chamber, it is already in force.

Some of those matters, such as that affecting the motor industry, have considerable financial implications. If our colleagues in the European Parliament are unable or unwilling to exercise control over the Commission in this matter, it is most important that Members of this House should be informed so that the interests of their constituents may not be prejudiced by the matter going through without any effective discussion before the decision is taken. Will my right hon. Friend therefore look at the matter and consider finding time for a debate on it, as I am sure that many hon. Members are concerned about the present practice?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the feelings in some parts of the House that these matters do not always work out as satisfactorily as they should, and I agree that they do not.

It is difficult to choose the right moment for these debates. If we have the debates too early in the process, many things have changed before the time for decision has come. Sometimes, particularly at the end of a presidency, things happen very rapidly and we fail to have the debate in the time that we should find it most useful to discuss those issues. The Government believe that these debates are valuable and helpful to negotiations, so it is not I who wish to deny these debates. It is simply a practical difficulty, which I shall do my best to overcome on a day-by-day basis.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Just as the failure of the House to set up a Scottish Select Committee is a reflection of the Government's weakness in Scotland, is it not also a fact that the Scottish provisions for privatisation of electricity, coming in the same Bill as those provisions for England and Wales, are another reflection of that weakness? Will the Leader of the House give an undertaking that at least two days will be devoted to the Second Reading of the Electricity Bill to ensure that the very distinctive Scottish provisions get a proper hearing?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not accept either of those points and, judging from the way in which the hon. Gentleman put his questions, he did not expect me to. I do not accept his interpretation of the position of the Scottish Select Committee. I suspect that we are in this difficulty because of the lack of realism in some parts of the House, but that is another matter. [Interruption.] However, it is a matter for the debate, when it comes.

With regard to the Electricity Bill, the way that the Government are proposing to proceed, by a Second Reading of the Bill as published on 12 December, is the best way forward.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): My right hon. Friend has, as is customary, given us the business for next week, but for no more than next week. Does he appreciate that it would not only be for the convenience of Members, but would enable us to do our job better, if we could sometimes have notice of the programme of business a little further ahead?

I imagine that my right hon. Friend is at present discussing with our right hon. Friends the dates for Second Reading debates on a number of Bills that have recently been introduced. Would it be possible for him to consider allowing us to be privy to what is accepted to be a provisional future programme of business so that we can do our job better rather than keeping it to himself until the Thursday of the week before?

Mr. Wakeham: I have no great secrets that I am keeping from my hon. Friend. Business has not been arranged for Tuesday 13 December or any day after that. It will depend on how we get on.

I recognise the force of my hon. Friend's remarks, but I do not see an easy way of altering the current practice. If my hon. Friend or any other hon. Members have a particular interest, we try to be as helpful as we can and give any possible indication of approximate dates.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): When is the subject of televising our proceedings likely to return to the Chamber? Some of us—particularly hon. Members with certain political views—are deeply concerned at having to sit here hour after hour trying to intervene in debates and Question Time and never being called. Is it not time for the House to be televised so that our constituents and the people in the country can see that we are at least trying to raise matters that they are anxious about, even if we are not always successful?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman is far too modest in these matters. My impression is that, in spite of the difficulties under which he labours, he seems to be able to put across his view forcefully. The House will be the poorer if he does not continue to do so. Like other hon. Members, the hon. Gentleman does not always get exactly what he wants, but he does pretty well for all that.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about televising the House. It would not be right for me to anticipate the decisions of the Select Committee considering that matter. It is a complex matter and we are working hard on it. We are making good progress and those of us who spend every Monday evening on the matter will be happy to bring a report back to the House of Commons as soon as we can and for the House to decide what to do then.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): Will my right hon. Friend undertake to find time between now and the end of the calendar year for a debate on the Channel tunnel fast rail link? Is he aware that options 1 and 2—for north-west Kent—are wholly unacceptable to the people of Dartford? Is he aware that, if the Government allow no opportunity for debate in the near future, the first opportunity for Kent Members to debate the matter for the benefit of their constituents will be on the British Rail private Bill, which will be introduced in the autumn of 1989? That is totally unacceptable to us in Kent.

Mr. Wakeham: I understand the importance of the subject to my hon. Friend and his constituents. I cannot promise a debate before Christmas, but there will be occasions when he will have an opportunity for ventilating the points about which he feels strongly.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Leader of the House reflect on the answer that he gave my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on setting up a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs? We who are not privileged to know the workings of the usual channels are entitled, as the House is, to be given some idea of his thoughts on the matter. Is it not an affront to Scottish opinion—especially when former Conservative Members of the House are talking about a more equal Union—to have, encapsulated in one Bill, the North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board privatisation and the South of Scotland Electricity Board privatisation along with electricity privatisation in England and Wales? It is an affront to our equal Union and the Leader of the House, who has strong responsibility here, will put the Union in jeopardy if he continues to behave in this way.

Mr. Wakeham I do not accept that for a minute. It would be a bigger affront to the House if I sought to make the speech that I intend to make when we have a debate on the Scottish Select Committee in the middle of business questions rather than at a proper time and in a properly arranged debate. A motion will be tabled for that debate and it will be tabled in good time. It will enable the hon. Gentleman, should he be called, to make his contribution. I hope that he will not continue to make sedentary interventions, which do not help matters.

Mr. Douglas: You are a disgrace as Leader of the House——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Douglas —with all due respect.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman asked a question and he is now getting an answer to it.

Mr. Douglas: That is what I am not getting.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman has had the answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Is it not highly regrettable that on Monday, after 10 pm, we shall discuss an important European measure, when this week in Parliament there have been three similar debates after 10 pm? Would it not be more helpful if some earlier time could be made available—perhaps at 7 pm, as for private business—for some of the more important Euro-measures so that the House could consider them properly and Ministers did not have to stay up until 1 am, but could have a reasonable rest and pay the measures proper attention?

Mr. Wakeham: I agree, and that is why such a measure is on the Order Paper today. We shall begin to debate it as soon as business questions have been dealt with.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): In view of the Carlisle report on probation, after a summer in which the police stations of England have occasionally been filled to overflowing with prisoners and after another year in which judicial sentences seem to be becoming longer and the rights of defendants are under even greater threat with the threat to the right to silence, does the Leader of the House agree that it is time that we had a debate in the near future on sentencing and how we deal with convicted persons? Surely the time has come when there must be some other solution. If the other place is allowed to discuss the matter, as happened the other day, this House should be able to discuss it, so that we can at least give some vent to our feelings. That may influence how the judiciary and other authorities deal with convicted prisoners.

Mr. Wakeham: I have some sympathy with that point. It is a perfectly reasonable matter for debate, but I have to arrange Government business and, as the hon. Gentleman will willingly agree, some aspects that he raised will be relevant to a number of Bills before the House. The subject that he raises is eminently sensible for an Opposition day, and I suggest that he talks to his hon. Friends on the Front Bench.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Lemington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that it is becoming urgent that we should have a debate on the future of the Post Office? Does he recall that we had a serious strike in the summer which damaged small business considerably? Is he aware that there is industrial action at post offices now, particularly in the west midlands? People are becoming worried, and I hope that he will take that on board.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise my hon. Friend's concern, but I cannot see how I can arrange a debate in the immediate future. However, I shall bear the point in mind.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): The Leader of the House was good enough to tell his hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) that we should perhaps consider a forward programme. He is introducing the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Bill next week. On the horizon—and suggested in this morning's press—over the next two or three weeks are the Security Service Bill and the so-called reform of the Official Secrets Act 1911. When considering this legislation, one should remember the background of GCHQ and legislation for the prevention of terrorism. We are facing a major question of freedom, as it is under attack in a number of ways. I ask the Leader of the House not to introduce the remaining two Bills on the secret service and Official secrets at least until after Christmas so that some consideration may be given to the totality of repression that is being introduced in so short a time.

Mr. Wakeham: It is to protect our freedom that most of the Bills are being brought forward; that will be made abundantly clear in the debates.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Will my right hon. Friend give the House an early opportunity to remind those who say that it is impossible for an Irishman to receive a fair trial in this country of the case of Shannon and McGlinchey in 1985? They were both extradited from Dublin to Belfast and one of them was accused of murdering a Unicnist Speaker of Stormont and his son. They were both acquitted.

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend makes his point extremely well.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): When will the Leader of the House make time available for an early debate on the important issue of the allocation by the Home Secretary of more officers for the county and Metropolitan police forces? He will recall that, when the matter was last debated in the House, hon. Members from all parties expressed the concern felt by people who live in Leicestershire that no extra police officers had been allocated to Leicestershire for 1988-89. As a decision is imminent, does the Leader of the House agree that we should have a debate on this important issue?

Mr. Wakeham: I agree that these are important matters, but I cannot promise Government time for the debate. However, there will be opportunities that the hon.

[Mr. Wakeham]

Gentleman can use. If the hon. Gentleman is in any doubt about it, I am sure that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner), who is an expert in raising constituency matters, will give him advice.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware that the Order Paper now contains a substantive motion—early-day motion 83—calling for the dismissal of Judge Cassel.

[That this House deplores the recent sentence of two years probation given to a man found guilty of sexual abuse of his 12 year old stepdaughter; considers that the reported statement of Judge Sir Harold Cassel, Q.C., when sentencing the defendant, that his wife's pregnancy 'led to a lack of sexual appetite in the lady and problems for a healthy young husband' effectively condones the crime of sexual assault; and therefore calls for the dismissal of Judge Sir Harold Cassel.]

Is my right hon. Friend aware that Members on both sides of the House wish to discuss that motion at the earliest possible moment so that we can all make it absolutely clear that this House does not consider that a wife's pregnancy is justification for sexually molesting young girls, nor that probation is a sufficient sentence for sexually molesting children of any sort?

Mr. Wakeham: I have seen the early-day motion and I recognise the strength of feeling. My right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor is considering these matters, so it is right for me to make no further comment.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): To return to the point made by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas), does the Leader of the House accept that the workings of the usual channels on the Scottish Affairs Select Committee have been particularly murky since they have denied access to information, not only to individual hon. Members but to parties which wish to see the Committee established? Is his promise of a debate before Christmas to be taken any more seriously than his promises last Session that there would be a debate before the House rose in November? Will such a debate be on a positive motion or will the Government merely give up the attempt ever to establish the Committee?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not accept for a minute that any promises I have given to the House have not been fulfilled. I share the hon. Lady's concern about the workings of the usual channels in this matter, because they have not been able to produce a solution which is satisfactory to both sides. For that reason we shall find time for a debate and it will be on a motion to resolve the matter. I cannot announce the terms of the motion now.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): If we cannot have a debate next week on the Post Office, can we at least have a statement from the Secretary of State for Employment that industrial relations in the Post Office will be referred to ACAS for an impartial report? Is my right hon. Friend aware that my constituents in Melton Mowbray have had no post for the past two and a half weeks and that this is the third such dispute this year? It is absolutely ruinous for small businesses.

Mr. Wakeham: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. I shall certainly refer his suggestion to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who will obviously want to consider the best way to deal with the matter.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I thank the Leader of the House for his kind compliment earlier, but on this occasion my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) needs help from the right hon. Gentleman, not from me: there should be a debate on police resources in Leicestershire and why people in the city of Leicester have been allowed no additional police for the past two years despite requests from the chief constables. Does the Leader of the House agree that there should also be a debate on why we are receiving no help from the Home Secretary when crime has doubled in the county? Can we at least ask the right hon. Gentleman to be kind enough to request a statement from the Home Secretary before the recess?

Mr. Wakeham: I shall certainly refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): Can my right hon. Friend find time to discuss the General Development Order which contains the somewhat surprising proposal that clay pigeon shooting on any one site should be cut from 28 to 14 days before planning permission is required? That was introduced with no discussion either with Members of Parliament or interested parties and should not continue.

Mr. Wakeham: I want to apologise to my hon. Friend on behalf of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment who accepts that the Clay Pigeon Shooting Association should have been among the 250 bodies that have been consulted. In view of that, my hon. Friend proposes to consult the association as well as the Sports Council and others soon on whether an amendment should be made to the order to revert to a maximum of 28 days' permitted use of rights for clay pigeon shooting.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The Leader of the House will know that this House has not debated the spread of AIDS in recent memory. Is he aware that hon. Members like me want to make the point that the Government's record is lamentable, there having been precious few cautionary measures or publicity for at-risk groups, such as prisoners, the armed forces and the business travelling public, and little hospital treatment and community care for sufferers? When can we have a debate on this important subject?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that the hon. Gentleman takes this matter seriously, as do the Government, and I hope that he does not seek to turn it into a partisan issue. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health is appreciative of the co-operation of the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) in discussions and we hope to have as much of a bipartisan approach to this important problem as possible. The tone of the hon. Gentleman's remarks did not quite show that. Not long ago, we had debates on the subject, but the hon. Gentleman's memory may not be as long as mine, and there may well be an occasion for another debate in the not too distant future. It is perfectly right and proper that we should discuss these matters and I shall bear his request in mind.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): In view of the sentence passed by Judge Harold Cassel at Knightsbridge Crown court on a police officer who indecently assaulted a young girl, will my right hon. Friend have a word with the Home Secretary and ask him to invoke the provision contained in the Criminal Justice Act 1987 that would entitle the Attorney-General to refer that lenient sentence to the Court of Appeal for re-examination? It has not yet been invoked. Does my right hon. Friend agree that all the Labour Members who voted against that provision may now rethink their position in the light of this case?

Mr. Wakeham: The Government are naturally anxious about any statement made by a public figure which may be interpreted as condoning the sexual abuse of children. However, the remarks attributed to Judge Cassel were made in the context of his judicial duties, and it would be constitutionally improper for the Government to comment further. I understand that my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor is calling for a report into the matter and I shall make my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary aware of my hon. Friend's points.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): The right hon. Gentleman will realise that since 1979 this Government have spent billions of pounds on the police service—on manpower requirements, earnings and equipment needed to do the job efficiently. Will he on behalf of his Government now seriously consider having a debate on the important question of law and order because my colleagues and I feel that it is necessary? We aim to be helpful. Figures announced today show that crime has increased by 50 per cent. since 1979. That is a shocking record. Let us do something about it.

Mr. Wakeham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his recognition of the substantial amount of increased resources—about 50 per cent. in real terms—that the Government have spent in support of policies dealing with law and order. It is a major problem. We had a day's debate on home affairs during the Queen's Speech debate when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) raised these matters. I agree that we should have another debate, but I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman one, however important the matter, in the near future.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Does my right hon. Friend believe that there is what is called a democratic deficit in the ability of elected representatives at whatever level to scrutinise and amend important European legislation?

Mr. Wakeham: What I do recognise is that, in any House of Commons, as was made abundantly clear to those of us who sat through an interesting debate on procedure last night—I am not sure whether my hon. Friend was able to be with us—one thing is clear: if we increase the amount of time that we spend on one subject, we reduce the amount of time that we can spend on another. I do not pretend for one minute that our present arrangements are perfect, nor do I pretend that each hon. Member might not have a different balance. I shall bring forward proposals for change when I am convinced that there is a reasonable chance of a majority being in favour of them.

I do not think that the issue which my hon. Friend raises is one of the areas where we established last night that we could make progress, but I shall consider it. I read the interesting article written by my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) in The Times last week. I am sorry that he has not been well. I hope that he will soon be better and among us again. Had he been well, I think that he would have made those points in last night's debate.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Will the Leader of the House consider the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) are not alone in wanting a debate on policing? I also would like such a debate. There is much anxiety in Greater Manchester—the police authority and the chief constable believe that there are not enough policemen and women to do the very necessary job of the police. The Leader of the House knows that, from time to time, we have debates in Government time on the Metropolitan police because of the constitutional arrangement which applies to that force. I put it to the Leader of the House as a serious point that it is about time that we had a debate on this important matter of police resources throughout the country.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that that is a serious question. I treat it perfectly seriously. We had a debate on home affairs recently during the debate on the Loyal Address. I would like to satisfy all the demands on our time, but I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman a debate in the immediate future.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Can I be helpful to the Leader of the House in terms of his medium-term planning? Will he take into account the fact that, whenever he decides to slip in the writ for the Richmond, Yorks by-election, some of us will be in our places in the hope of exploring how, if the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) is clean enough, in terms of the deception of the House, to go to Brussels, that can mean only one thing—that she is not clean enough to be in No. 10 Downing street?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make allegations of that kind. Will he kindly withdraw those allegations made against the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) and the Prime Minister?

Mr. Dalyell: I do not want to get into any kind of trouble with the Chair. Of course I withdraw, but I must say that, having looked at Hansard, Mr. Speaker, you may care to reflect on whether what I have said is unparliamentary. The word I used was "clean".

If the Leader of the House's memory is as good as he boasts, could he explain during the debate on the writ why the Opposition Chief Whip, as documented in detail in Magnus Linklater's story of Westland, "Not with Honour", was so vehement that the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks could not continue as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry?

Mr. Wakeham: I imagine that the Opposition Chief Whip will not move the writ for the hon. Gentleman's constituency while he is still a Member; nor will my right hon. and learned Friend the Government Chief Whip move the writ while my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) is still a Member.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) made the most scurrilous and un——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I dealt with that at the time.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Leader of the House have a word with the Secretary of State for Energy and ask him to make a statement at the Dispatch Box on the announcement this week by British Coal that the Union of Democratic Mineworkers is to have negotiating rights at the two new super-pits which have been developed in Britain, although it may not have any members at either pit?

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): Wait and see.

Mr. Skinner: It is scandalous that a party and a Government who brag about democracy will allow British Coal to give negotiating rights to a union even though it has no members, albeit it is a bosses'union. It is almost like telling Tiny Rowland that he can negotiate on behalf of Harrods shareholders.

Mr. Wakeham: I imagine that the hon. Gentleman will be making the same point when he and Arthur Scargill are the only two members left in his union. The question that I think he raises is one for the management and unions of the industry, not for my right hon. Friend.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): May I, as a Westminster ratepayer and Member, ask the Leader of the House whether we can have a statement on the rate support grant settlement implications of the sale of the lease on Conservative Central Office by Westminster city council?

Is the Leader of the House aware that Westminster city council's internal auditors have asked the chairman of the Conservative party for details of the transaction involving the sale of the lease acquired from Westminster city council, and that he had to date refused to provide that information? Westminster ratepayers want that information and are entitled to have it in the public interest. Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that the questions asked by the auditor are fully answered? The public in Westminster want to know about this massive property speculation that the Tory party is undertaking.

Mr. Wakeham: I will not add anything to what has already been said about this except to ask why, as a ratepayer and constituent in Westminster, does the hon. Gentleman not have a word with his Member of Parliament—my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Because he is the chairman of the Tory party.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Cash: Further to my earlier point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have dealt with that.

Mr. Banks: May I bring the Leader of the House back to the televising of Parliament? During last night's debate on procedure, I heard two members of his Committee talking about "if" we have the televising of Parliament rather than "when". Will the right hon. Gentleman give us a chance to discuss the report, a copy of which I have here, produced by the Procedure Committee on the implications for procedure of the televising of Parliament? That would give us something to talk about while we are waiting for the Leader of the House's Committee to give us a report to discuss.

I appreciate that the right hon. Gentleman will not want to get too deeply drawn into the rumours that fly about this place, but will he make it clear that the rumour that it will be at least two years before we have television cameras——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: And the rest.

Mr. Banks: "And the rest," says one of the members of the right hon. Gentleman's Committee. Will he confirm that the rumour that it will be at least two years before we have television cameras in is unfounded?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Member has clearly had a tiring few days. He arrived late for yesterday's debate because he had been addressing the good citizens of Weybridge, I think, in the forlorn hope of bolstering the Labour party in that constituency. He then produced a book about fights in the House of Commons in about 1860 or 1870——

Mr. Banks: 1873.

Mr. Wakeham: —1873, but he did not say whether he hoped to move forward to those days. If the hon. Gentleman had been here for the whole of the debate and if he had not been reading his interesting books, he would have known that we discussed the report which he waved around. My hon. Friends who said "if" rather than "when" were of course quite right, because the Select Committee's report has to come before the House and the House has to decide on the basis of that report.

Mr. Banks: What about the rumour?

Proceedings of the House

4.48 pm

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Do you have anything to add to the statement that you made yesterday about the debate on the Loyal Address? You may recall that a number of my colleagues pointed out in the subsequent exchanges that the House was in some difficulty because it had not had sight of a letter which the Editor of Hansard apparently sent to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) some weeks ago.

Mr. Speaker rose——

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North) rose——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish) rose——

Mr. Speaker: No, I am on my feet.

I have had a letter from the Editor of Hansard. However, before I read it to the House, it would be appropriate for me to give a full account of what took place. My statement is rather long but I ask the House to listen carefully.

It is necessary for me to set out the sequence of events as they have now been established in order to be entirely fair to all involved in this incident. It is clear that there were facts to be established, and that, in the first instance, the wrong information was given about what happened.

The hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) knew that the Official Report of 25 October contained an error. As a result of the matter being raised, it is now possible to set the record straight. On 25 October, in a debate on the economy, the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) intervened in the speech of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) as follows:

> "The hon. Gentleman talks of the need for self-discipline. In view of his party's wild promises to spend money, will he say how much more than £38 billion his party would now spend?"

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) is recorded in Hansard as replying:

> "I do not know from where the hon. Gentleman gets his figures, but they are clearly wrong. If he produces a list for me I shall look at it, but I can tell him that there is no such commitment."—[Official Report, 25 October 1988; Vol. 139, c. 174.]

It is now agreed on all sides that what the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East actually said was, "there are no such commitments."

On 27 October, the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) asked me about the accuracy of the report. I informed the House that the report was wrong and added:

> "On reflection, the Official Report accepts that this change should not have been made and has expressed its regret."—[Official Report, 27 October 1988; Vol. 139, c. 494.]

That statement left the House with the impression that the change had been made at the request of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East and that misapprehension arose because at the time the Editor thought that that had been the case.

The Editor subsequently wrote to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East apologising for the error and explaining that he had since discovered that the change had been made by a member of his staff. The Editor sent me a copy of this letter, but since it was not addressed to me I was not at liberty to read its terms to the House as I was asked to do yesterday. I was, however, in a position to correct the hon. Member for Suffolk, South when he alleged on Tuesday that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East had sought to

> "pressurise the Official Reporters to amend Hansard."—[Official Report, 29 November 1988; Vol. 142, c. 582.]

I also made it clear, in column 583, that this was on the basis of fresh information supplied by the Editor since my statement on 27 October, which I now know to be misleading.

I now confirm that there is no truth in any suggestion that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East either changed the text of what was proposed to be reported or asked for it to be changed.

So that the precise order of events may be placed on record, I have asked for a letter from the Editor which I shall now read:

> "You have asked me for an explanation of how the misreporting of Mr. Gordon Brown on 25 October occurred.
> Initially, the reporter reported exactly the words used by Mr. Brown. That is to say, Mr. Brown's response to Mr. Peter Thurnham's intervention was in the plural. The senior sub-editor decided that the response was more grammatically put by using the singular. On reflection, he reverted to the plural but after more consideration he went back to the singular. These several changes of mind resulted in the typescript being untidy. When Mr. Brown read the typescript, he improved the legibility of that final sub-editorial alteration. He did not make any alteration to what the sub-editor had finally decided. When, following normal practice, the sub-editor checked for any alterations by the Member concerned, he saw that Mr. Brown had merely improved legibility. He saw no reason to assume that an alteration of fact had been made and had he done so, again following normal rules he would not have allowed the change. At no time did Mr. Brown discuss that or any other part of his speech with the sub-editors.
> I stress again that the responsibility for the error is entirely mine. I deeply regret the embarrassment that has been caused to you and the House, especially to Mr. Brown and Mr. Yeo."

That is the text of the Editor's letter to me.

The House is aware that I have already regretted the way in which the issue was raised. I also referred yesterday to the fact that I would deplore it if there were any truth in the suggestions that there had been an organised attempt to disrupt Tuesday's debate. [HON. MEMBERS: "There was."] Order. Perhaps in my own interest I should make it clear that I was not making an accusation that there had been such organisation, let alone suggesting who might have been responsible for it.

I apologise to the House for the length of this statement. It cannot be debated now. If there is a desire to pursue any of the matters my statement contains, I hope that the House will first take time to consider it and then seek advice about the appropriate ways of taking the matter further.

Mr. Robert Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The House is normally an extremely tolerant place. The House understands perfectly well that some hon. Members use intemperate and perhaps unparliamentary language. The House also understands that sometimes in the passion of events some hon. Members behave in a way which, on reflection, they would rather not have done. However, the tolerance of the House is such that if an hon. Member, even on reflection, finally apologises, that is accepted and is the end of the matter. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the way in which the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) refused to do that means that the continued efforts to raise the matter are a sad attempt to rescue the tattered reputation, credibility and future of the hon. Member for Suffolk, South.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the House will do as I said in my final comment and reflect carefully upon the matter. I called upon the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) at the time to withdraw an allegation that he made, and he did so.

Points of Order

4.58 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During Prime Minister's Question Time I made an intervention in the heat of the moment which might have appeared to cast some aspersion on the Chair and yourself. If that is the case, I totally and unreservedly withdraw it. I would not wish to raise a point of order today for that reason. However, as you so rightly said, if points of order are to be raised, they should be raised at the first possible opportunity.

Hansard, page 432—[HON. MEMBERS: "Erskine May?"] —"Erskine May"; I thank the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Page 432 of "Erskine May" lists expressions which are unparliamentary. That includes the accusation of right hon. and hon. Members of "misrepresentation". The Leader of the Opposition accused the Prime Minister of mendacity in various particulars. If one looks——

Mr. Speaker: Order. He did not do that. I made that plain at the time. It was a general accusation which was not made personally. [Interruption.] I suspect that I know "Erskine May" rather better than the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow). He knows that personal accusations against hon. Members are unparliamentary and are not allowed. In the cut and thrust of debate, general accusations are frequently made.

Mr. Marlow: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can I ask you to look at the written text when it appears in the Official Report tomorrow and if you wish to reflect on your judgment, perhaps you would be kind enough to come back tomorrow?

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): On a different point of order, Mr. Speaker. About nine months ago, you made a statement following four questions having been asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition during Prime Minister's Question Time. There may not be many Labour Back Benchers sitting behind the right hon. Gentleman who wish to cross swords with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, but many Conservative Members wish to participate in Prime Minister's Question Time. Nearly 10 minutes passed today before any Back-Bench Member had the opportunity to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker. Will you say that you will not allow the Leader of the Opposition so much time during future Prime Minister's Question Times?

Mr. Speaker: This occurs from time to time. It occurred when the hon. Gentleman's party was in opposition. I cannot do what he asks.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which you said, when the matter arose, could be dealt with a little later.

Mr. Speaker: I said that I had dealt with the matter at the time. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to raise it again, I will hear him.

Mr. Cash: I understood the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) to say that he did not wish to get into trouble with you, Mr. Speaker. That was not necessarily a withdrawal of the allegation in itself. It is a matter on which we should have at least some further consideration.

Mr. Speaker: I shall read Hansard tomorrow, but I heard what the hon. Gentleman said.

BALLOT FOR NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR MONDAY 19 DECEMBER

The Members successful in the ballot were:

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens
Mr. John Greenway
Dame Jill Knight

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the three motions.

Ordered,

That the draft Advice and Assistance (Scotland) (Prospective Cost) (No. 3) Regulations 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

Ordered,

That the draft Advice and Assistance (Assistance by Way of Representation) (Scotland) Regulations 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

Ordered,

That the draft Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 Amendment Regulations 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. John M. Taylor.]

Mr. Speaker: I shall now take the point of order of the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin). I hope that it is a matter with which I can deal.

Mr. Mullin: It is, Mr. Speaker. You may have noticed that the Attorney-General packed up his files to go home before you announced, Mr. Speaker, that you were calling time on the private notice question. Is it in order for the Attorney-General to know in advance how long you intend to allow for such a question?

Mr. Speaker: I have no idea how the Attorney-General would know that. Only I know when I shall call time, and I do not pass on that information to anyone else.

Fisheries

5.4 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): I beg to move:

That this House takes note of the Commission's amended proposals on total allowable catches and quotas for 1989 described in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's un-numbered Explanatory Memorandum of 30th November 1988, European Community Document No. 9312/88 on total allowable catches and quotas for 1989, the Commission proposal on the 1989 Reciprocal Fisheries Agreement with Norway described in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's un-numbered Explanatory Memorandum of 23rd November 1988, the Commission proposal on mesh sizes described in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's un-numbered Explanatory Memorandum of 30th November 1988, European Community Document No. 9185/88 on fishery guide prices and of the Government's intention to negotiate the best possible fishing opportunities for the United Kingdom fishing industry for 1989 consistent with the requirements of conservation of stocks.

We are grateful, as on previous occasions, to the Select Committee on European Legislation for its consideration of documents referred to in the motion. I am sorry that complete proposals were not available for its meeting on 23 November, but we were able to provide these for consideration at its meeting yesterday. I realise that the Committee and the House have been asked to address the fisheries opportunities for 1989 with only short notice of the Commission's full proposals. I agree that that is unsatisfactory. With advice from the scientists delayed until the autumn surveys, and the December Council of Fisheries Ministers meeting having been brought forward, we have all been squeezed. That explains the short notice. This is, however, a very important debate, and we thought it right to have it in good time to enable us to take full account of the views of the House in our preparations for the Council of Fisheries Ministers meeting next week.

First, let me report to the House the outcome of the Community's annual consultations with Norway which concluded in the early hours of this morning. The details of this are in an explanatory memorandum which was placed in the Vote Office earlier today. Briefly the agreement confirms the Commission's proposals for total allowable catches of North sea cod and haddock. which are jointly managed with Norway. It modifies the Commission's proposals to reduce the TAC for western mackerel by 20 per cent. to a 12·7 per cent. reduction, but a reciprocal cut in Norway's own quota has been achieved. Importantly, Norway has agreed to flexibility in catching the western mackerel stock east of 4 deg west to which I will refer later. Our herring opportunities will be slightly greater than last year. Our quota for cod in north Norway will, however, be almost halved under the agreement because of the state of the stocks but our distant water fleet can look forward to increased opportunities off west Greenland. I shall return to some of these matters later.

1988 has been a mixed year for the United Kingdom fishing industry, and one not without its difficulties. The total value of landings during the first three quarters of the year was 5 per cent. lower than in the same period in 1987, but that was a record year. Fishermen are fully aware that the fisheries management decisions are certainly not the only reason for that slight decline. In some cases, the fish, for purely biological reasons, have not always been sufficiently plentiful for legitimate quota opportunities to be fully exploited. And there have been cases where the industry itself has found it difficult to manage its own sectoral quotas to the satisfaction of all those directly involved.

During this year we have seen cuts in quotas of cod at north Norway and Svalbard, although that has not unduly fettered the industry as there is still some quota left to take. We have found the quota for Channel cod inadequate but have not been able to take anywhere near the quota for North sea haddock because of the state of the stock.

There are, however, plus points. We achieved a change in the minimum landing size for nephrops which has helped the west of Scotland and northern Irish industries without adversely affecting the North sea. We have changed the price arrangements for herring so that the withdrawal system can operate and carry-over premia obtained. We have secured a ceiling on expenditure on the costly tuna regime. We see on 1 January 1989 the final step to the introduction of a 90 mm mesh size in the North sea, which should assist conservation of the stocks.

The main purpose of this debate, however, is to look to the future and in particular the prospects for 1989. The Commission's proposals present a clear picture of what these might be. I do appreciate that in some respects these are a cause for concern.

As I have often stated, not least on the last occasion that we debated fisheries, the Government are firmly committed to the conservation and efficient management of all the fish stocks on which our industry depends. We must ensure that short-term gains do not imperil the longer-term viability of the industry, and that point cannot be repeated too often because it is of such importance for the long-term stability and prosperity of our industry.

The Commission's proposals on total allowable catches where available reflect the objective advice of international scientists. Where sufficient scientific data is not yet available, less stringent though equally important precautionary TACs are recommended. These are designed to reflect the needs of the industry provided that the level of effort by the fishermen shows no significant growth.

The TACs for the main whitefish stocks in the North sea are, as I have already said, subject to agreement with Norway during the annual consultations. The Commission and Norway in provisionally fixing the TACs for 1989 have had very much in mind the scientific advice which seeks a general cut in mortality rates for these stocks of 20 per cent. This approach is necessary in order to improve the exploitation pattern in the North sea for what is essentially a mixed fishery. The proposal is intended to have the very desirable effect of minimising the quantity of discards, particularly in the whiting and the hard-pressed haddock fishery.

The proposed TAC for North sea cod is 124,000 tonnes and for haddock 68,000 tonnes. These proposals reflect the fact that we are heavily dependent upon individual year classes and a poor year class spells serious consequences for quotas. The spawning stock biomasses are at unprecedentedly low levels. The Government are well aware that both these proposals will present the fishing industry with severe cuts in their fishing opportunities and this is an issue which we will be examining with particular care in the Council meeting. However, we shall have to take proper account of the biological imperatives. We must ensure that we do not settle for short-term gains which will make the long-term losses even greater. The possibility of the collapse of those important fisheries might be at stake and we must bear that in mind and probe it particularly closely.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: Many hon. Members wish to speak in this debate which has now been truncated. It might be better if I did not give way and allowed my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to respond to the points that have been raised.

Mr. Wallace rose——

Mr. MacGregor: If I gave way once, I would have to give way again. It is probably better that I do not give way in view of the shortness of time.

Mr. Wallace: The right hon. Gentleman is frit.

Mr. MacGregor: No, not at all. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary will reply to as many of the points that he can in the short time available.

For saithe and whiting where the proposed TACs are only very marginally different from last year at 170,000 tonnes and 115,000 tonnes respectively, the fisheries will be less restrictive, whilst for plaice the proposal is to retain the current TAC level of 175,000 tonnes. For North sea sole, which is not jointly managed with Norway, the Commission is proposing a TAC of 14,000 tonnes, as in 1988. In addition, given the close relationship between sole and plaice fisheries, the plaice TAC is recommended at a level which would require conservation measures to protect the associated sole fishery. On Monday the Commission therefore presented proposals for both a restriction of the size of beam trawlers in the North sea and an increase in minimum mesh size for the first six months of the year. I am aware that that is causing concern and we are urgently examining the likely impact on our industry in order to strike a balance between the difficulties that it might present to our industry against the long-term gain of healthy sole stock levels. As on previous occasions, we shall be exploring the possibility of enhancing our quota through a swap with another member state.

We are disappointed that the Commission proposal for a precautionary TAC for Channel cod is no higher than this year's original TAC, prior to the upward adjustment made subsequently which we pressed for and achieved at the October Council meeting. We shall be pressing the Commission for a more realistic approach to such precautionary TACs. I am pleased, however, that the precautionary TAC for plaice in the Channel has been increased.

On the north-west coast of the United Kingdom the proposals are for a slight decrease in quotas of haddock, saithe, hake and anglerfish, which reflect mainly the annual variations in stocks that we have to expect with biological and environmental factors.

One of the most intractable problems facing the Community and Norway in recent years has concerned western mackerel. The House will be familiar with the difficulties which our own industry has faced in not being able to pursue the shoals as they have crossed the 4 deg west line from the western area into the North sea. It was with considerable disappointment that, notwithstanding the fact that the Commission negotiated the principle of flexibility with Norway a year ago, the Council failed last December, in spite of our considerable efforts, to agree to the implementing of this technical solution to a major Community problem.

In the interim, the difficulties have not gone away. If anything, they have increased. I therefore welcome the fact that the Commission has been able to negotiate again the principle of flexibility with Norway. The package this year is somewhat more comprehensive than formerly in that the Commission has now agreed with Norway to recommend to the Council that the autonomously determined western mackerel TAC should be set at a limit which will reduce the level of catches. That, however, is in line with scientific data available for this important stock. It is helpful therefore that the Commission has also been able to negotiate a more restrictive level of Norwegian catches in its exclusive zone north of 62 deg and that both parties are agreed on the desirability of protecting that stock.

At the Council last June when we found no support for flexibility around 4 deg west we warned that we would be raising the matter again. We did that strongly in October pointing out that the problem, far from going away, was, if anything, deepening and a solution had to be found. That prepared the way for the consultations with Norway and strengthened the Commission's resolve to secure the principle of flexibility. At the Council meeting next week we shall be pressing very strongly for the principle of flexibility around the 4 deg line to be implemented. I think that it is fair to say that with our unceasing efforts the Commission and other member states are very much more alive this year to the necessity to resolve this important technical problem.

Finally, on pelagic opportunities, I wish briefly to mention herring in the North sea. For 1989, scientific advice suggests a cautious policy in respect of the level of TAC. Consequently, the Commission has agreed with Norway that for 1989 that should be set at 514,000 tonnes. This should enable the spawning stock biomass to recover from current levels. In those circumstances, the Commission has again agreed the zonal attachment for Norway should be 29 per cent., representing 149,000 tonnes. However, the level of transfers by the Community to Norway will be considerably down on the 1988 figure of 53,000 tonnes to 17,000 tonnes, thus enabling opportunities for United Kingdom fishermen to be slightly above current levels.

Of course, once the TACs and United Kingdom quotas have been agreed, we have to decide on their allocation among our fishermen. For the main North sea and west of Scotland stocks, that involves allocations both to those producer organisations which have taken on quota management responsibilities, and to other fishermen in the so-called non-sector. We shall be aiming to better last year's timetable and, provided that we get the necessary information from the industry, we expect to notify interim allocations at the end of January.

We have also continued our strenuous efforts to deal with the quota hopper problem. The Merchant Shipping Act 1988 provides for new tighter registration arrangements for fishing vessels. I am glad to say that those arrangements came into effect today. They require that vessels on our fishing vessel register should be predominantly owned and controlled by British citizens resident in this country. I fully share the strong concern that has been felt in this House and among our fishermen on this issue, and I know that the new arrangements have been welcomed by our fishermen.

At the same time we have continued to defend vigorously the licensing conditions which we introduced to regulate the crewing and operations of fishing vessels with United Kingdom licences. The Advocate-General's recent advice to the European Court in the Agegate and Jaderow cases has been encouraging and we now await the court's decisions.

In addition to our national measures, we have also pressed for Community action. I am very pleased that the October Fisheries Council agreed new control measures which will allow us to require other member states to report to us on a vessel-by-vessel basis landings there by United Kingdom vessels and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary for the vigorous efforts that he made to achieve this. These measures were originally set out in document 4893/88 which is amongst those under discussion in the debate today.

The proposals for guide prices for 1989 were agreed at the Council on 28 November following the advice of the Scrutiny Committee that this debate need not hold up adoption. I am very pleased that we have been able to secure a seasonal price for herring which, coupled with the facility to use carryover premium for herring which we secured earlier this year, means that our industry now has a real chance to take advantage of the market support arrangements. The House may recall that the Community have had three reports on the herring market, the third of which is mentioned in the motion, which addressed the problem of herring marketing. That has been of particular concern, I know, to our pelagic fleet in Scotland. I am sure that the measures that we have now secured should give them a firm base on which to build. Other changes were comparatively minor, generally 1 per cent. or 2 per cent. difference or no change. From the comments that we have had from the fishing industry these prices would seem satisfactory.

To sum up, I recognise that this will not be an easy year for some of our fishing industry. Opportunities will be more limited, because of the position of the stocks. Nevertheless, by making the most of the swap mechanism, we hope to maximise usable opportunities to our industry. Let us remember that overall the common fisheries policy is serving us well as the value of landings has increased by 50 per cent. between 1983 and 1987 with only minor fluctuations in the tonnages landed.

Looking to the future, strong measures taken now on TACs should ensure better TACs in the future. We in the Community must also continue to develop sensible ideas on technical conservation measures which are complementary to TACs.

Mr. Archie Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: In fairness I said that I was not going to give way. I know that many hon. Members wish to speak. This is their main opportunity in the year and it is important that they should have the chance to express their views. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary will respond at the end. We shall both be at the important Council meeting and I shall be listening throughout the debate.

[Mr. MacGregor]

All this can be done within the framework of the common fisheries policy, to which we are fully committed. I shall listen carefully to the arguments and my hon. Friend and I shall be reflecting on all the points made during the debate.

I can assure the House that my colleagues and I will do all that we can at next week's Council to ensure that we maximise the opportunities for our industry within biologically safe limits so that we also preserve its future prosperity. I hope that that approach will have the support of the House.

5.20 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Here we are yet again at the tail end of the year—I almost said at the tail end of the bank—debating total allowable catches and quotas for the new year. I have a great deal of sympathy with the Select Committee on European Legislation which noted that

> "late publication by the Commission of its fisheries proposals is a perennial problem and reiterates the concern it expressed last year about this and the prejudicial effect on the chances for proper Parliamentary scrutiny."

That is a significant problem for the House. Here we are, four weeks from the end of the year, and we are just debating the proposals for TACs. That is no way to manage an ice-cream cart, let alone an industry which gives employment to 120,000 people, many of whom live in remote constituencies.

Most of our 17,000 fishermen are facing a bleak—not an uneasy—new year with some of these TACs. In May this year, speaking at the annual general meeting of the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations, the Minister said:

> "The Common fisheries policy has brought the British fishing industry stability and prosperity . . . under the CFP the industry can look to the future with confidence."

Not many of them can look to the near future with any confidence.

The Minister has repeated today that the CFP appears to be working fairly well, but British fishermen are much less sanguine than he appears to think. White fish prices are down. They continue to decline and here we are facing a savage cut in certain quotas.

I feel deeply sorry for our fishermen. We cannot blame them for some of the hostility that they are now displaying towards the CFP. Among fishermen, the CFP commands the growing disrespect and lack of trust that many of our farmers show towards the common agricultural policy.

One stark example of that anger and distrust has been expressed recently by the English Channel fishermen who depend largely upon cod, but, unlike the French, are denied reasonable and fair access to the stock. I think that I am correct in saying that the French share of that particular cod quota is 76 per cent., while our fishermen are given a miserly 8·3 per cent.

The British fishermen suffered a closure of the Channel cod fishery in the middle of April. It was opened for two weeks in October and, I am pleased to be able to say, thanks to the prompt delivery of the press release from the Ministry, it was reopened yesterday at 2400 hours.

That two-weeks fishing effort was damaged, as many other cod fisheries were damaged, by the supply of Icelandic cod, principally to the Humberside markets. Fishermen in England and Scotland have sufferd from those Icelandic supplies. Is it the case, as many fishermen allege, that supplies are coming in from Iceland below the reference price? If so, it is a disgrace.

There is no way that the French will agree to any revision of the share of the cod fishery catch. They will defend the CFP with all the charm that they display in their defence of the CAP. However, changes should be made to give our Channel fishermen a better deal. We should also be demanding a better deal for fishermen throughout the United Kingdom.

Following the Minister's excellent lead, let me hurry along without too many interventions to talk about the proposed TACs for 1989. First, trying to be even-handed in what I have to say about TACs and quotas, I am pleased that the United Kingdom vessels will be able to harvest 2,700 tonnes of west Greenland cod. I should declare a family interest since I have a brother who is the mate of a freezer trawler and that may give him some employment. Naturally, I am pleased about that, but why he wants to go fishing in those dreadful waters God alone knows.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): The hon. Gentleman has a better paid job.

Dr. Godman: I am the fair-weather fisherman in the family.

As the Parliamentary Secretary says, that figure, in one of these infernal numberless documents, represents an increase of about 200 per cent. Will he give an assurance that that Greenland catch will be equitably shared among those vessels which have the safety provisions to fish those harsh waters? There should be a fair share of that Greenland catch.

Another sensible proposal referred to by the Minister and contained in another of the documents is the introduction, for the first half of 1989, of a mesh size of 120 mm for the beam trawlers. Despite the problems to which the Minister referred, that is a good proposal and it should enable the growth of the depleted spawning stock.

There is precious little else to commend in the documents. For those fishermen who harvest North sea haddock and cod, the prospects are exceedingly bleak. As Mr. Robert Allen, the chief executive of the Scottish Fishermen's Federation, has recently observed:

> "There is no doubt that the latest scientific advice about the state of the North Sea haddock and cod fisheries is extremely pessimistic and, as fishermen with a vital stake in the future well-being of these stocks, we have to take cognizance of this and be prepared to discuss the relevant conservation issues in proper and reasoned consultation with our scientists."

Mr. Richard Banks of the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisation has also expressed serious reservations about the proposed TACs. It appears that the United Kingdom fleet faces the dismal prospect of a fishing quota of 46,000 tonnes of haddock compared with 128,000 tonnes in the current year, and for 55,000 tonnes of cod compared with this year's total of 71,000 tonnes. Those are wild and dismal fluctuations from one year to another, which is unscientific.

Fishermen must adhere to the needs of fisheries management and must listen to what the scientists have to say. Our fishermen acknowledge the need to do so and are not as avaricious as, for example, Japanese whalers. They will listen to scientists' warnings and predictions, but sometimes I think of such utterances and statements as being as elegant, accurate and precise as an old side-trawler staggering and wallowing through the Pentland Firth in a force eight gale. I believe that is how such statements are viewed by many fishermen.

Scientific assessments of the state of valuable fishing stocks should be examined in a tough-minded and realistic way. Current scientific dependence on precautionary TACs are an example of what I mean. They are based on guesswork and not on rigorous analysis of the fishing stocks. Again I quote Mr. Allen:

> "If there is no change in the proposed agreement terms on cod and haddock, the Scottish white fish fleet will be faced with the prospect of a prolonged programme of tie-ups in 1989."

Both the SSF and the NFFO have expressed fears that a drastic reduction in the domestic catch will encourage Icelanders to send even more fish to the United Kingdom. That view is shared by the Grampian regional council. A letter from its chief executive that I received yesterday informs me:

> "With the threatened serious reduction in home supplies of fresh fish in 1989 the case for better control of Icelandic imports appears overwhelming. The Council trust that Government will be able to secure a formula, in collaboration with the EEC, which allows in sufficient supplies to keep the processing industry active, but at a price that does not further depress the earnings of the British catching fleet."

I say to the Minister who will be winding up this debate that, as part of such a formula, it might be worth while examining with the Icelandic Government the possibility of resuming British fishing activity in Icelandic waters. I know the Icelanders well, and as they are overwhelmingly dependent on fish, I have the idea that they will refuse to discuss such an innovation. However, raising the subject will at least show them that the House and the Government are deeply concerned about Icelandic imports and their effect on the livelihoods not only of fishermen but of those working in ancillary industries.

I do not want to keep the Minister too busy, but I have another question to ask. I remind him that, in agriculture, overproduction has led to a plethora of remedies, one of which is the set-aside scheme. With their savage cuts in the fishing effort, it seems that the Government are agreeing to a fishing set-aside scheme. Are they currently considering proposals for a fisheries set-aside? If so, fishermen should surely receive the same sympathy that is extended to hard-pressed farmers; why should fishermen be treated differently? Do the Government have any such proposals —I nearly said, on the stocks?

In truth, too many fishermen are pursuing too few fish. That is acknowledged throughout the Community, with the exception of the French and the Spanish. Recently, it was conceded by the Danish fisheries Minister, Lars Gammelgaard, in a speech he made in Esbjerg, that

> "The Danish fishing fleet is too large in relation to the amount of fish it is permitted to catch."

That problem is shared throughout the Community. He added that at the beginning of 1987, fishing vessel tonnage amounted to 136,000 gross registered tonnage but it had since been reduced to about 127,000 GRT at present, and predicted a fall by the end of 1989 to 117,000 GRT. That is very different from the British experience.

In that regard, the British Government failed to act decisively. In the task of matching the fishing fleet's capacity to the viability of the fish stock, they have been incompetent.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Godman: No, I shall follow the Minister's exemplary lead.

How will the Government meet their obligations to the multi-annual guidance programme for 1987-91? Is it not the case that, in the absence of a fair and reasonable decommissioning scheme, the United Kingdom fishing fleet will remain at its present level? In his latest annual report, the chairman of the Sea Fish Industry Authority comments:

> "Expansion was the 1987 theme for the UK fleet. By the end of December it had 1,951 vessels of 40 ft and over."

Elsewhere in the same report, he observed:

> "Ageing continued to be a problem, with more vessels crossing the 26-year-old threshold. At 646 boats, this total increased by 68. Almost two-thirds of Northern Ireland's boats were in this category."

That means that instead of there being a noticeable reduction in the fleet's capacity there has been an increase. We are heading in the wrong direction.

Is it not the case that, if the Government are to honour their obligations, they must implement a reduction in fleet capacity in excess of 11 per cent. before the end of 1991? If so, how will it be achieved—by natural wastage, or by tying up ships because of the savage TAC reductions?

We supported the Merchant Shipping Act 1984 which sought, among other things, to reduce the number of Spanish-based vessels fishing under United Kingdom quotas. We were happy to support the Secretary of State in that respect, but unfortunately that sensible Act has been challenged in the European Court and certain sections may have to be repealed. In addition to removing vessels that are not engaged in fishing, the Government must reintroduce a decommissioning scheme.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): On decommissioning grants, is my hon. Friend aware that when those grants were given before they were given exclusively to owners and that the fishermen who served on the vessels received nothing? There has been pressure on the Government to provide some form of compensation; one is only talking about 3,000 or so individuals. Does my hon. Friend agree that some cases have been outstanding for five or six years and have not been heard by the courts? There is terrific concern and a feeling of betrayal—certainly in the port of Hull. Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be a good thing for the Minister, with his new responsibilities, to talk to his counterpart in the Department of Employment and ascertain whether a political decision can be made to solve a problem that has existed for many years?

Dr. Godman: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. Of course, he is absolutely right: the trawler owners who received decommissioning grants did fantastically well out of them. The owner of the Pict received over £500,000, in addition to the £500,000 or so that he received in construction grant. The owners laughed all the way to the bank, but the fishermen were treated very badly.

In the short run, the Government must do all in their power to mitigate the appalling effects of the severe reductions in the 1989 North sea catch figures for haddock and cod. The Minister must reduce the effects of the cuts by referring to The Hague preference, which limits the reductions imposed on United Kingdom fishermen if they lead to social and financial difficulties. The imposition of The Hague preference in regard to haddock should mean that the TAC should not go below 60,000 tonnes for

United Kingdom fishermen. Even that is an appalling reduction, but I think that the industry would survive such a drastic measure, and I should be grateful for such a commitment from the Minister.

I hope that the clearing banks involved in the fishing industry will act sensibly and sympathetically towards their fishermen clients, who do not need harassment from the banks at this time.

The industry itself has offered radical solutions to the problems bedevilling the Government and the catching sector. They include the acceptance of a tighter licensing scheme which would involve the licensing of all bona fide fishing vessels, including those with an overall length of less than 10 metres. The Government must also reintroduce a fair and reasonable decommissioning scheme that will encourage older fishermen with aging vessels to leave the industry in a sensible way. They deserve no less from the Government and from the House.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): There is a great deal of interest in the motion, and in the best interests of all concerned I hope that hon. Members will respond to my appeal for short speeches.

5.42 pm

Sir Michael Shaw (Scarborough): I will do my best to follow your advice, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is only fair to all those who wish to speak.

I agree with much of what the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) has said about the worries that beset our fishermen. That is not surprising, because they are well known and I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's knowledgeable interest in the subject.

Our views are voiced out of concern for the fishermen. I speak on behalf of the inshore fishing fleet of Scarborough and Whitby. Despite all the worries, there is still a great respect for my right hon. Friend the Minister, and an understanding that he is doing his best in very difficult circumstances. My local fishermen are also grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary for having taken the trouble to meet them personally as soon as he took office. That was much appreciated.

My hon. Friend will have discovered the deep concern that was felt, particularly about North sea cod quotas. In 1985 the quota was 250,000 tonnes; last year it was 160,000, and this year the Commission's proposed quota —as recommended by the international scientists—was down to 124,000, a further drop of some 22·5 per cent. That is bound to create serious difficulties, which I hope will not be made worse by late announcements of quotas for the various parts of the country. I know that that will depend on how quickly the figures are available.

That latest quota reduction will cause my local fishermen real hardship. I have always said, and I still believe, that the Community agreement had to be reached: even if we had not been in the Community there would still have had to be an agreement with the countries bordering on the North sea. But, having reached that good agreement at the outset, we must ask whether the quota system is working. Many fishermen feel that it is not, and that unfairnesses are creeping in. I do not think that there are any deliberate unfairnesses, but the exact methods of calculation must be explained as fully as possible so that there are no more mysteries about the results.

The truth is that there are simply not enough fish in the North sea for everyone to catch as many as they want, but perhaps we can find a close season for spawning. I understand that there are difficulties, but we finally managed to arrange a close season and a ban on herring fishing off the Yorkshire coast. More particularly, is it not possible to find a close area for the "nurseries" so that the young fish can grow and there is a better catch in the long run? That idea seems to have a good deal of support among local fishermen.

Are other factors, perhaps environmental or biological, involved in the absence of sufficient fish? I have made some inquiries, and I do not believe that there are enough facts to make that theory believable. One or two fishermen, however, have raised it in connection with the quality of fish that they are catching.

I know that the Minister is doing his best despite great difficulties, and I hope that the local fishermen will find that they can pull through despite the new and greater restriction imposed on them. If quotas are reduced and fishermen's livelihoods are made more difficult, it is even more important that the conditions under which they fish and the port facilities should be the very best that can be made available.

If fishermen are obliged to catch fewer fish, it is important that the fish that they are allowed to catch should be of the highest quality that can command the highest price. The port and handling facilities, the arrangements with the processors and the marketing of fish should be brought completely up to date. Scarborough and Whitby want all the help that they can get. They are going through a difficult time.

I wish my right hon. Friend every success in the negotiations. Our good wishes go with him. I hope that he will fight as strenuously as I know he has fought in the past to ensure that further quotas are obtained for those who fish for cod in the North sea.

5.51 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I welcome the opportunity of this debate in advance of the meeting of the Council of Ministers which is to be held on 12 December. It will help the Minister to understand how anxious hon. Members on both sides of the House are about the drastic cuts in the total allowable catch, particularly those for cod and haddock. I had thought that the presence of the Secretary of State for Scotland on the Treasury Bench showed that at last he had begun to take an interest in the fishing industry, but unfortunately he has gone.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wallace: No, I do not intend to give way.

These cuts in the total allowable catch, particularly of haddock, in Scotland will have a devastating effect on the economy and on the communities who live around the Scottish coast. It will have as devastating an effect on those communities as, for example, the redundancies that have been announced at Bishopton. That is the relative scale of the problem. It is regrettable that the Scottish Office

Minister who usually answers questions about fishery matters in this House has not bothered to turn up for the debate.

I have already referred to the savage reductions in the TAC, particularly of haddock, which could lead to a £40 million withdrawal of income from the fishing industry. Many people might argue that the fishing industry is overreaching itself and that it does not have the interests of conservation at heart. Fishermen realise, however—perhaps more than anybody else—how important conservation is to the long-term interests of the industry. They know that tomorrow's short-term easy gain jeopardises the long-term benefits to the industry.

It is also important to point out that the TAC for haddock in all but one of the last five years has been no higher than that recommended by the scientists, and that in none of those years has the catch been higher than the TAC. When it was announced last year that there was to be an increase in the TAC for haddock, many people in the fishing industry queried the wisdom of that increase. Therefore, they have every right, when such a savage decrease is announced, to query its wisdom also.

There is something very wrong with the way in which the TACs are set. Such wild fluctuations from one year to another do not allow the industry to develop against a stable background. For that reason the Minister must grasp the importance and seriousness of the proposals, particularly those relating to haddock and cod. Their effects will be serious. Boats could be laid up, with devastating implications for the communities concerned. There will be a knock-on effect on the fish processing industry. The industry stands to lose £40 million on its haddock catch, but the loss of income to the processing side of the industry could be very much more and that would also affect the fishing communities.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) asked about The Hague preference. When I sought to intervene during the Minister's speech, that was the very point that I intended to put to him. It would have been useful if the Minister could have told us whether he intends to raise the question of The Hague preference when he goes to the Council of Ministers' meeting on 12 December.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The Hague preference was raised at the last meeting of the Council of Ministers. It will be raised again at the next meeting. I shall deal with that matter in my speech.

Mr. Wallace: I am grateful to the Minister for making that clear. It is useful to know that The Hague preference will be raised by Her Majesty's Government at the meeting on 12 December.

I understand that The Hague preference sets a bottom line limit of 60,000 tonnes of haddock. If the agreed amount for the whole of the North sea, shared between the EEC and Norway, is 68,000 tonnes and Norway gets its share, and if we allow for any industrial by-catch, that leaves about 1,500 tonnes to be shared among all the other EEC countries. That being the case, is the Minister able to deliver on The Hague preference? If he is not prepared to give the House an assurance that he can deliver on The Hague preference, is he prepared to say that he is willing to open up again the agreement on the 68,000 tonnes between the EEC and Norway and to renegotiate that amount? We must know the answer to that question if the fishing industry is to be reassured. Even 60,000 tonnes represents a very serious decrease in the total allowable catch for the current year. It will put enormous strains on the industry.

The Minister may say that he will seek a mid-year review. I suppose that that would be better than nothing, but it would still put enormous strains on the industry. It would have to look forward to working during the first six months under tight constraints and with no real expectation of an increase. We want more than just the possibility of a mid-year review.

The Minister referred to fishing for mackerel east of 4 deg west. He knows that that is important to my constituency. He referred to the agreement that has been reached with the Norwegians and to the number of occasions on which Her Majesty's Government had suggested at Council of Ministers' meetings that there should be flexibility. He also said that an agreement had been reached with Norway for the forthcoming year. I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary will say why he thinks that there will be even greater prospects in 1989 of the United Kingdom being able to achieve agreement with her EEC partners on flexibility.

I have received representations from my hon. Friend the Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) about the cod quota for the United Kingdom as it affects fishermen in Devon and Cornwall, particularly those who can fish only inshore. They feel that the United Kingdom quota should be increased to take account of the fishing needs of that area. I should welcome the Minister's comments on that point.

When does the Minister expect a decision on the current licensing review? If the fishing industry is expected to reduce its capacity this year by 16 per cent., by how much more is the industry to be asked to reduce its capacity by the EEC to take account of lower total allowable catches? That fear must be in the hearts and minds of those who are engaged in the fishing industry. This Bench and the industry never had much confidence in the previous licensing system as an effective means of conservation. I look forward to the Parliamentary Secretary saying when we can expect an announcement about the Government's proposals for a future licensing system.

The Minister showed remarkable complacency. It cannot be denied that in recent years the income of the fishing industry has gone up, but the Minister cannot stand at the Dispatch Box and say that the common fisheries policy is working well when in 1988 the haddock TAC shoots up, and in 1989 it shoots down. Something is fundamentally wrong, and it is sheer complacency for the Minister to say that all is well.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): The purpose of the debate, coming just before the annual meeting of the Fisheries Council, is really to gauge the feeling of fishermen around our coasts. I follow the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) quite often, and I am always struck by the fact that there is almost a uniformity of opinion among fishermen, be they from my part of the world in the far south-west of the United Kingdom or from his part of the world in Orkney and Shetland. Let me acknowledge straight away that fishermen in the south-west do not face the cuts that face fishermen in the

[Mr. David Harris]

North sea. However, one has to recognise that cuts or pressures on one species or one area often have a knock-on effect on other species and in other areas.

Although in his concluding remarks the hon. Gentleman was somewhat critical of my right hon. Friend, no Minister, whatever his attitude—and we have an excellent Minister in my right hon. Friend—can create fish when there are no fish. We all have to acknowledge that the catching capacity of the United Kingdom fleet has increased dramatically, as have the catching capacities of the fleets of other nations in the European Community. Unfortunately, fish stocks in general have not increased by anything like the same amount, and in some species stocks have decreased. That is a problem we face today.

Because of those factors there has undoubtedly been a marked change in attitudes expressed in the debate and the attitudes of fishermen in the past few years. In the past couple of years this debate has been quite optimistic. Everyone has recognised that the fishing fleet has done pretty well. In the past 12 months, there has been a change in mood.

A couple of weeks ago, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State was good enough to come to a Committee Room and meet representatives of fishermen of Devon and Cornwall and hon. Members representing Devon and Cornwall. I am sure that it was clear to him that a change of mood has taken place this year. I am glad to say that he is coming to Newlyn in my constituency on Monday and I believe that he is going on to Brixham in Devon later that day. The fishermen there will have an opportunity to tell my hon. Friend exactly what they feel. I suspect that the Minister will have a robust meeting because the mood has changed and the unease which existed perhaps even a year ago has now given way to deep disquiet, and, among some fishermen, to anger.

The concern of those fishing the waters off south-west Cornwall and Devon has centred largely on cod, which appears to be in some abundance. The quotas are not fixed on precise scientific evidence or data—although I share the views of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) about some of the attitudes of scientists. However, the cod quota is certainly based on a precautionary TAC. The evidence faced by the fishermen does not bear out the thinking behind that precautionary TAC and the quotas that stem from it.

For historical reasons, the United Kingdom quota for cod in the Channel is very low compared with the extremely large French quota, and that is a constant source of anger. There is nothing worse for a fisherman than to catch fish, sometimes by accident, and because the quota has been exceeded or because a stop has been put on catching, to have to throw those fish back. I believe that that is one of the main sources of anger felt by many fishermen in Devon and Cornwall today.

If one word can sum up the hopes of many fishermen in Cornwall and Devon, it is "flexibility". We do not like it, but we realise that it is difficult to get larger increases in quota. We have had a small increase this year and we hope that the Minister will press for a larger quota for Channel cod in particular. I was a Member of the European Parliament for five years and am aware of the constraints involved for any Minister in negotiating quotas with our partners in the European Community. Frankly, sometimes there has to be horse trading, and that cannot always be easy.

I am convinced that better management of the existing quota for cod in the Channel is not only possible but absolutely necessary and that there is a greater need for flexibility in the management of that quota. I urge my right hon. Friend to consider that point.

Time is pressing, so I shall mention just a couple of other issues. First, the mackerel box fortunately has not been a great matter of contention between me, as an hon. Member representing the south-west, and Scottish Members, as it has been in the past. Without trying to provoke a row, I must say as gently and as nicely as I can that I utterly reject the views of one Scottish fisherman reported in Fishing News who claimed that the mackerel box, the conservation area for mackerel off the south-west coast, was a political box. It is not. It is a genuine conservation measure to safeguard and protect the juvenile mackerel which are found off the south-west coast.

Frankly, I should like some relaxation of the box if, and only if, that were possible within the framework of conservation. I am dreadfully conscious that the few processors in the south-west are feeling the very marked effect of the box on their activities. If it were possible to have a small local fishery without driving a coach and horses through the conservation aspects of the box, nothing would give me greater pleasure than for a local fishery to be opened, but we cannot afford to have the Klondikers back in the box servicing a bigger fishery, as that would be a dreadful mistake.

I now turn to a theme which I have raised in every fisheries debate since I entered the House and at every opportunity in the European Parliament—the scourge and the scandal of the Spanish flag of convenience. I am very pleased indeed that, as my right hon. Friend has said, on this very day the Merchant Shipping Act 1988 comes into force. We hope that its provisions will deal once and for all with the scandal, and will result in the Spanish boats being taken off our register so that they no longer fish against our quotas to the detriment of our own fishermen. I hope and pray that that will be the outcome of that piece of legislation.

However, putting legislation on the statute book is not enough. It also requires application to ensure that the legislation is implemented. My earnest plea to my right hon. Friend, and through him to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport who has the duty of implementing that legislation, is that strenuous attempts should be made to rid our register of the Spanish boats which have caused so much harm to our fishing industry. How we have put up with it for so long is really beyond my comprehension. If he gets rid of the boats, in a year of uncertainty, disquiet and even anger among our fishermen, that will be one really positive step forward.

The Minister has a difficult task at the Fisheries Council. I know that he will fight for British fishermen. He knows that behind him is the feeling in the industry that I have tried to describe, and I urge him to remember that when he attends the Fisheries Council meeting.

6.10 pm

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I shall focus on one area in the interaction between the Government and the Commission—one that belies the claim in the motion that the Government will negotiate fishing opportunities "consistent with the requirements of conservation of stocks." I refer to the Government's failure to prevent the moratorium on FEOGA assistance for the construction of fishing vessels in the United Kingdom. If we are to develop fishing opportunities consistent with the conservation of stocks, we should think about building up fleets that are undercapitalised, work with old and small boats and pursue stocks that could withstand larger catches. They are not pressure stocks. One example of that is the fleet in my constituency, and the same is true of many areas in the west of Scotland. The moratorium has hit such fleets especially hard and unfairly.

I say "unfairly" because the moratorium was a consequence of the general catching overcapacity of the United Kingdom fleet this year. The fleet in the Western Isles does not contribute to that overcapacity. It pursues nethrops, lobsters and crabs, which could easily withstand an expansion of catching capacity. Stocks of lobsters and crabs would benefit from more catching capacity. It is unfair that those fleets should have been so affected, and the responsibility for it lies squarely with the Government.

Earlier this year I visited Brussels to talk to people in the fisheries directorate of the European Commission to discover the thinking behind the moratorium and to see whether an exception could be made for the boats that do not affect overall capacity. That was impossible, but the clear message that I received was that the moratorium had been imposed reluctantly. It was imposed because of the Government's failure to meet the capacity agreement that they had reached, and their clear failure to give any practical signs that they were serious about resolving the problem of overcapacity.

An important short-term measure could be the introduction of decommissioning grants. The EC would be more than helpful in setting up a scheme. It is not good enough for the Government to decline to consider their introduction on the basis that the previous scheme was not used and did not work well. The failure of the earlier scheme was entirely the fault of the Government, and the use of the failure as an excuse not to proceed with the scheme now greatly compounds the Government's overall failings.

The Government's responsibility is clear. The problems have hit many fishermen who, using their limited capital, have made plans to develop their boats and fleets, with the assistance of the EC. The Government's failure to resolve the problem has cut their legs from under them. It is incumbent on the Government to pursue all possible solutions to the problems, especially of the fishermen who were caught out this year.

May I make one suggestion in relation to fishermen who had applied for FEOGA assistance this year but who were not even considered for such assistance? Some of them were on their last application for FEOGA assistance, and I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to urge upon the EC the possibility of fishermen whose cases were not heard this year having their applications rolled over into next year. Those fishermen do not pursue pressure stocks and work with small boats. They desperately need the capital. It is not fair that their applications, whose merits have not been heard because of the Government's failure to resolve the problem, should fall by the wayside.

I apologise to the Front Bench spokesmen for the fact that I shall not be here for the closing speeches because I must be elsewhere. I hope to return to the Chamber later tonight.

6.18 pm

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): I support the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) in saying that we cannot allow the problem of fishermen's compensation to go away. I urge my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to do what he can to persuade his colleagues in the Department of Employment to consider these matters once the latest court cases have been dealt with.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) that a difficult year lies ahead and that we must take every opportunity to use the facilities that are available to our fishermen.

The extensive documents involved in the proposals make for difficult reading and illustrate one of my main points: that too many bureaucratic regulations have a detrimental effect on our fishermen. I urge my hon. Friends to call for greater simplicity and a more straightforward approach. I hope that my plea is heard not only by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, but in Brussels.

There is little doubt that complications in obtaining licences and transferring licences from one vessel to another, to say nothing of their intrinsic value, regardless of which vessel they are attached to, make life difficult for skippers and vessel owners. Therefore, I should like to see flexibility in the interpretation of the regulations and their enactment to take into account the difficult position in which individual fishermen find themselves.

In that context, I thank my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary for the way in which he recently dealt with a problem arising from the transfer of a licence from one vessel to that of a fisherman in Fleetwood in my constituency. The solution was satisfactory, and it was a correct interpretation of the regulations used sensibly.

I thank my hon. Friend also for taking the time recently to visit Fleetwood and to see at first hand the state of the fishing industry in that port today compared with what it was like many years ago. There is little doubt that, on the west coast and elsewhere, the industry needs all the support it can get from his Department to ensure that it remains viable within the context of the European community's fishing regime.

During his visit, my hon. Friend was interested in the initiatives that had been shown by the local council—the Wyre borough council—in setting up the fish dock management company, which is already taking steps to make the port of Fleetwood a better port and, in particular, improve facilities in the Channel. Another initiative is being taken by the council and by Associated British Ports to widen the scope of activities in the port of Fleetwood, in particular to build a marina.

I am keen to see at least one scheme that is already on the drawing board go ahead as soon as possible. The borough council and I want a scheme to be chosen that has in mind the interests of the fishing industry. Such a development has potential not only further to improve navigation and port facilities but to reduce the cost base of fishing activities out of that port—that is important—and, in so doing, make fishermen operating out of Fleetwood more able to compete with fishing fleets from countries abroad. There is little doubt that such developments will result in more employment both within the industry and elsewhere in the local community.

I stress the importance of one aspect, and that is stability within the quota system, as far as that is possible, bearing in mind the points that my right hon. Friend the Minister made earlier. Obviously, fishermen recognise the need for restraints on their activities to maintain fish stocks. They find it hard to understand the wide fluctuations that take place in their quotas almost from month to month. Additionally, the lateness in the year when provisional quotas are turned into firm quotas causes hardship.

As my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary knows, as late as September, the 1988 provisional quota for one skipper in my constituency was reduced by nearly 20 per cent., which effectively meant that he had to stop fishing. I sincerely hope that, in future, we can avoid that circumstance.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend is taking such a close interest in fishing activities in Fleetwood and elsewhere. I urge him to continue to fight for simple, understandable regulations based on relatively stable, flexibly enforced quotas.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I am sorry that the Minister is no longer in the Chamber, as the burden of my remarks about the financial state of the fishing industry would leave him under no misapprehension at all. The Parliamentary Secretary will have to act as a substitute for the time being. I, too, detected a note of substantial complacency in the opening speech.

Fishing income depends on four factors: quantities, prices, interest rates and fuel costs. Already, two of those four vital factors are extremely adverse for the industry. I refer to the high level of interest rates and the low level of prices. My constituency has the largest concentration of white fish landings in Europe, never mind the United Kingdom.

I have a bundle of letters addressed to the Prime Minister. For the benefit of the Parliamentary Secretary, I shall read extracts from two of them. All constituents' letters are important, but those letters are particularly important because they say something not only about the financial state of the industry but about the character of the industry in Scotland. Our fishing industry is not composed of a small number of people or companies with extremely large boats. The fish-catching industry in Scotland is composed of small family-run businesses, share ownership, and people who work for those businesses.

One letter is from a young skipper's wife in Fraserburgh, who writes:

"The industry merits recognition but we feel that it has largely been neglected. What will happen when our men can no longer meet their bank interest payments and the banks start to repossess the boats, which no one will want to buy because they are no longer viable? The N.E."—

of Scotland—

"will be left with a fleet of useless vessels and our livelihood will be gone. I won't go into lengthy personal details, but suffice to say that because my husband is struggling to maintain his bank interest payments on the boat I am not receiving enough to manage my household accounts etc. The fishing is the only way of life we know and there is little else in Fraserburgh for our men to do. We don't want to be wealthy, all we want is to be able again to manage."

I have another letter from a group of fishermen's wives in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing):

"Our husbands are hunters—hunters of vital food supplies to a nation, hunters who must work in dangerous conditions and who must leave the comfort of their homes and the company of their families for long periods with the knowledge now that even 16 days at sea no longer secures even a living wage."

There are many other examples in my correspondence. I shall take the liberty of sending that correspondence to the Parliamentary Secretary.

I refer to small businesses that are already facing extremely adverse economic circumstances in the last six months of this year. They involve people who have invested and modernised and are now facing penal interest rates. We cannot blame the Parliamentary Secretary for the misguided policies that are pursued by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but we should have the answer to the questions. What possible benefit can there be for the United Kingdom economy to have interest rates at a level that will bankrupt vital fishing businesses? What possible merit can there be in driving out share-owned fishing businesses?

The focal point of the correspondence that I have received is Icelandic imports. People in the fishing industry strongly believe that such imports are undermining prices in the home market and are coming in at below reference prices. The research that I have been able to do suggests that the central problem is the grading system. Surely it must be looked at by the Parliamentary Secretary. Even in my limited research, I have been able to uncover examples of imported fish presently coming in at under reference prices. Therefore, it is with some surprise that I see no sign of Government action.

According to the Sea Fish Industry Authority's trade bulletin, the latest figures were released in September. That is a scandal. How can the Government possibly monitor developments in fish imports if the latest statistics are two months old? In imports of frozen fish from non-EEC countries there are three categories, one of cod and two of saithe, for which the average price quoted in the bulletin is lower than the reference price.

For example, the average price of other cod is £709 a tonne. The reference price is £869 a tonne. What is the Parliamentary Secretary going to do about this? Why is he not invoking the countervailing measures that are open to him, or going to the Commission to ask for countervailing action against these imports? Even on this dated evidence —there is every reason to believe that things have deteriorated since—imports are undermining the home market.

I take it that the Government realise that, if effective action against non-EEC imports is not taken, as is allowed in the Commission regulations, we face the prospect, with the quotas announced in these documents, of having the home-produced product further compressed, with the price not responding because of the flood of imports from Iceland and elsewhere. That would be the most serious position of all for the fishing industry.

I repeat the question asked by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman). The Iceland Government and people have every right to conserve their natural resources as they see fit, but it is for our Government, and other EEC Governments, to monitor and protect against the penetration into the EEC market from Icelandic imports. The Icelandic Government cannot have the bun and the penny. They cannot both secure their own natural resource and demand complete access to EEC markets. What will the Parliamentary Secretary do about the clear evidence that Icelandic imports are undermining the home market and are the cause of the collapse in prices that we have seen over the past three months?

As a means of control of fishery, the TACs are an extremely blunt instrument, as blunt as interest rates as a means of controlling the national economy. The Scottish Fishermen's Federation has made a number of strong points to me and other Members, but one of the strongest is that we have enforced the recommended quotas for the past five years for both cod and haddock, and that on only one occasion—and that marginal—have the landings exceeded those quotas, imposed as a result of the original scientific advice given to the Community. Why is it, then, if TACs are an effective way to manage fishing stocks, that we now face a crisis in cod and a disaster in haddock?

To set TACs impossibly low risks the danger of a perverse effect because of the likelihood of increasing the number of discards. The Government will have to re-examine the management of fisheries to see whether TACs by themselves are effectively controlling fishing. Surely the fishing industry has to be controlled by effective management of capacity and the enforcement of protection for the spawning stock. It is not adequate for the Government to say that, just because the last decommissioning scheme was a national scandal, that is a reason not to have another. That is a reason for having a fair and honest decommissioning scheme and not repeating the mistakes of a few years ago.

The main point for Scottish Members in this debate is the dramatic and catastrophic decline suggested for the haddock TAC. I am sure that even the Parliamentary Secretary needs no reminding—if he did need reminding he would have to cope with the lack of a Minister from the Scottish Office to give him that reminder—that haddock is the mainstay of the Scottish fleet. It is the dominant species both by quality and by value. The proposed cut of 62 per cent. will strike at the heart of the Scottish fishing industry.

I have been looking at the Community documents and the documents presented to the House on this subject, because I, too, am interested in the "Hague resolutions" and what practical effect they can have on our difficulties. What is interesting is not just the meeting in The Hague in late October 1976, or the Council resolutions published on 3 November that year, but what was said to the House of Commons in the explanatory memorandum that was presented with these EEC documents.

The Foreign Office was negotiating the rights of Scottish and other United Kingdom fisheries, and it was painting a reassuring picture. The House of Commons was assured that was one of the three main thrusts of the embryo common fisheries policy, which was being discussed. It was made clear that the vital needs of fishing communities in Ireland, northern Britain, and Greenland would be protected in the application of the common fisheries policy. It was also made clear that the Commission was thinking of further assistance to fishing regions, such as money from the European Investment Bank, or from the regional fund or the social fund. That is money that, incidentally, the north-east of Scotland has long been deprived of because of the Government's own regional policy.

> "the need to maintain the level of employment and income in coastal regions which are economically disadvantaged and largely dependent on fishing"

It was said that the vital needs of northern Britain would be protected in the application of the common fisheries policy. We want to hear from the Parliamentary Secretary how these vital needs will be protected and whether the "Hague preference" and commitment will be redeemed. What does it mean in practice? Does it mean that the first 60,000 tonnes will be available for northern Britain to fish as part of the haddock quota? What guarantee has the House that that is his aim and intention, and that he intends to secure that 60,000 tonnes when he goes to the negotiations in Brussels? Will he give us a guarantee that, if that 60,000 tonnes is not forthcoming, he will renegotiate what has already been negotiated? As has been pointed out, even 60,000 tonnes would be a disastrously low figure for the Scottish fleet.

It is ironic that, only a few months ago, the Secretary of State was making a speech in Europe on Saturday 7 May, which was headed:

> "CFP brings stability and prosperity".

The fishing industry in Scotland, and the documents that we are discussing, do not promise stability and prosperity. The talk in the fishing industry in Scotland is of viability and survival. I suggest that the Secretary of State changes not only his speechwriter but the method by which, and the vigour with which, he pursues the defence of Scottish fishing interests in Brussels. I welcome the Minister back to our proceedings. Unless we hear from the Parliamentary Secretary that he will take positive and fighting action to defend the vital needs of the Scottish fishing industry, we shall have no hesitation in dividing the House on these documents.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): It is not my intention to speak on many of the technical issues raised in the debate, which have been dealt with adequately by my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) and by many other hon. Members representing constituencies all over the United Kingdom. It is appropriate that I speak as a woman representing a fishing constituency, because my hon. Friend read out letters from the wives of many of our skippers and fishermen in Banff and Buchan and Moray. Many of these people are my personal friends, while others are constituents whom I do not know. This much I do know: they are women who are committed to the work that their husbands undertake. They are aware of the dangers and adversity that they face. They are not people who complain. It shows the depths of concern within our communities that the wives of our fishermen are at the stage of writing to the Prime Minister to state their views and to ask for assistance.

The fishing industry is not composed of people who belong to a breed of moaners. The fishermen do not come begging, time after time, for assistance. They are men who work against adversity. They are used to the difficulties of the industry, but the situation is now so critical that positive action to assist our communities is necessary. The fishermen in my constituency have put it to me firmly that they see the situation now as being worse than that which preceded the famous blockade in the 1970s in the north-east of Scotland. That surely must bring home to the Minister the strength of feeling among our people.

When women write to us, they are conscious of the investment made in the fishing industry by individuals, families and shareholders in our small communities. Boats now cost well into six figures; in some cases, it costs £1 million to buy a new boat. Mention is made of the possibility of tying up some of those boats, but the men cannot afford to tie up their boats because they are staring financial ruin in the face. They have to keep working to pay the interest and to ensure that the boat can continue to go to sea.

Many of the fathers in my constituency are now being asked for advice by their sons who want to follow in the family tradition of owning a boat, going to sea and making their living through the fishing industry. Those fathers are now placed in the impossible position of saying, "I would not advise you at this stage to contemplate coming into the fishing industry" because everything seems to be loaded against them. Prices have plummeted and it is now possible that we shall not have catches that make it worthwhile going to sea. There have been problems with licences and lack of grants for our fishermen. The whole quota situation needs to be reconsidered because of the difficulties experienced. That is the atmosphere in our small fishing communities in the north-east of Scotland and I am sure that it is reflected in other such communities round the coast.

Those communities need people to fight on their behalf. They deserve people arguing on their behalf at the Commission in Brussels. It is not good enough to say that The Hague preference will be put on the table. We want to know what kind of a muscle will be used to ensure that it is implemented. Here I echo the point of view of my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan that we need a satisfactory response and, if we do not receive one, we shall press the matter to a Division.

We do not want to see the heart torn out of our communities. It is a matter not just of loss of jobs and earnings, but of the heart being torn out of our communities. We need action now and I hope that the Minister will argue most effectively on behalf of those women and fishermen.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): It has been a very good debate this evening and I have listened with interest to every word. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) apologises for being absent, as does the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark).

I work closely with my noble Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: Where is he?

Mr. Thompson: He is in the other House.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): He does not exist.

Mr. Thompson: Let us get on with the debate. It is very important. The noble Lord spends a great deal of time and energy explaining the problems and advantages of Scotland to my right hon. Friend and myself. I resent the attacks made upon him, but will not take the matter further. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) started with a fierce attack, but I shall not comment on that further as I do not want to stray from the issue.

I wish to say a few words about the great wodge of papers that hon. Members have collected from the Vote Office. The figures are still emerging and Opposition Members have been telling us tonight that we must change the figures in those documents. The Scrutiny Committee has been most generous in its acceptance of the documents at the last minute so that this debate could take place in an orderly and proper manner. The Committee's generosity was also displayed when it referred in one of the documents to the helpful information given by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

That leads me to thank all hon. Members for their understanding of our desire to provide the documents so that they can make relevant and informed speeches, as they have done. That would not have been possible without a great deal of hard work and dedication from my officials and those of the Scottish Office who have brought these documents to our notice very quickly.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) referred to Channel cod and Icelandic fish, as did many other hon. Members. He asked about Greenland cod and whether we would do all we could to catch our total quota. I can assure him that we shall do our best to catch our total quota of Greenland cod this year, although we have not done so every year.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned scientific advice, as did other hon. Members. The scientific advice is the best advice that we have. As many hon. Members have said, the problem is that, in some respects, the advice fluctuates greatly. That does not give us a proper basis upon which to build an industry.

I fully understand the concerns of the hon. Members for Banff and Buchan and for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) who read us letters from their constituents. Those people may doubt the wisdom of scientific advice, but that advice, the quotas and the TACs are intended to protect not only the fishermen and their families, but their children's future.

As I have visited various fishing communities throughout the country, I have been impressed by the way in which various fishery committees and fishermen ask for greater conservation measures. I shall continue to visit those communities and, if I am invited by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, I shall come to Scotland too. I know that I shall be welcomed when I do. In Scarborough, for example, they are requesting a three-month moratorium on cod fishing. They also suggested an extension of boxes in which people could not fish, so that there could be conservation in the first three months of the year.

Mr. Salmond: The Minister is missing the point about the administration of the fishery by quotas alone. Surely, if he accepts that the scientific advice has by and large been followed over the past five years, that shows that the advice could not have been accurate during that time. The burden of managing the fishery cannot rest on quotas alone. Why do the Government refuse, for example, to introduce a decommissioning scheme?

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Gentleman has made his point twice. I shall not say that I was coming to it because I was in the middle of dealing with it, saying that there were other matters that we must consider, such as net sizes. The net size has been increased from 1 January 1988, but many fishermen contend that it has not been increased.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Gentleman wanted me to answer his questions, but I shall give way to him.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Minister appears to be arguing reasonable academic cases that will have to be addressed in the longer term. Everyone understands that, but he appears to have missed the point that there is no time left for some of those fishermen, particularly those fishing for haddock in constituencies such as mine, because they will not survive next year to take advantage of those decommissioning schemes.

Mr. Thompson: I intend to deal with decommissioning schemes and the money that we have spent over the past six years in commissioning and bringing the fleet up to date.

In response to the question by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow, I see no possibility at present of a set-aside scheme for fisheries. Quotas have gained the same sort of value in the hands of fishermen as have milk quotas in the hands of farmers. That means that the chance for decommissioning is most precarious. It will be difficult to draw up a sensible decommissioning scheme while, in many parts of the United Kingdom, licences are changing hands at inflated prices.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) spoke about the licensing of vessels under 10 m and I expected to hear more demands for their licensing. However, as soon as we license them—they seem to catch a small proportion of our fish—we immediately give a value to that licence, which would make it more difficult to introduce a decommissioning scheme.

Dr. Godman: Might it be the case that the measures outlined in the Ministry's consultation paper will ensure only that fishing capacity will stay around its present level? Is it the case that, by the end of 1991, the Government will have to bring about a reduction in the fleet of about 11 per cent.?

Mr. Thompson: It is right to bring about a reduction in the fleet of about 11 per cent. It is right to say that the only countries that are tackling the job at present are Denmark and Portugal. Under the Merchant Shipping Act 1988 we have given parliamentary time to tackling the job. The register has started today and we have had a favourable initial decision from the Advocate General which gives us hope that the policy will work. The quota-hoppers will then leave the fleet and we shall start to reduce it. We have held consultations and we must find positive ways to reduce capacity.

Before hon. Members become too impatient, I shall deal with The Hague convention. They will be pleased to know that we managed to raise the matter of The Hague convention at the last Council meeting in Belgium. [Interruption.] Let me get three sentences together. We did so under difficult circumstances. I understand the great anxieties of the people who want to fish at the same levels as last year.

Mr. Kirkwood: At viable levels.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Gentleman asked for 60,000 tonnes—that is 22,000 tonnes less than last year. That is a viable level. If the hon. Gentleman wants to write that down, I shall read it out.

Mr. Home Robertson: I am intervening in case anybody feels it necessary to alter Hansard's record. There has been a spot of bother about that recently. Is the Minister talking about The Hague preference or The Hague convention? The two are very different.

Mr. Thompson: I am talking about The Hague preference. I shall fight for The Hague preference. We started to fight for it at the last Council meeting. I fully understand the importance that hon. Members give to the preference.

Mr. Salmond: What does the Minister mean by fighting for The Hague preference? Is he telling the House that he will accept nothing less than 60,000 tonnes of haddock and will he invoke The Hague preference to achieve that? If not, what will he do?

Mr. Thompson: I shall not tell the House how I intend to proceed. If I tell the House, I tell the Germans, Dutch, Danes, French and Italians how I intend to proceed. I have given hon. Members the assurances that they were seeking on this matter.

Mr. Wallace: I am not asking the Minister how he will go about the negotiations. I seek an assurance that at least 60,000 tonnes of haddock will be made available and that that will be the bottom line.

Mr. Thompson: I cannot give an absolute assurance.

Mr. Wallace: What is the status of the preference then?

Mr. Thompson: I shall argue about the status of the preference. The Hague preference must be argued about.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister understand that there is confusion among our sister European nations about our position? Haddock is an essential national resource in terms of the common fisheries policy for Scotland and the United Kingdom. We do not seem to be fighting our corner. If we did fight for a TAC for haddock, we should get support for that. From the Minister's tone this evening, I have the impression that he has no stomach for a fight.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Gentleman is wrong in his insinuations. I realise the value of the haddock stock and our European colleagues realise its value to us. We need a balance on all stocks throughout the United Kingdom. It has taken a year's hard negotiation to maintain the 4 deg west provision. I know of the difference between last year's quota and this year's.

Mr. Salmond: Will the Minister speculate on how the fisheries Minister of an independent Scottish Government might treat The Hague preference and the Scottish fishing industry's vital need for haddock? Would such a person treat it as a vital matter, or with the Minister's casual attitude?

Mr. Thompson: That is a hypothetical question.

Dr. Godman: This is a serious question. I must have an assurance on the supply of fish from Iceland and The

[Dr. Godman]

Hague preference. The Minister must assure the House that the Icelanders will not be able to exploit a reduction in the domestic catch of cod.

Mr. Thompson: I reiterate that the question put by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan was a hypothetical question.

The United Kingdom delegation, with my noble Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office sitting next to me, will fight as hard as anybody for Scottish rights. I was pleased that the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow gave the House some figures about Icelandic cod. There are various technical difficulties about the figures and they must be seen over a period of time. If he sends me them, I shall look at them carefully.

We have no evidence to date that imports from Iceland were below the levels. It will be difficult to negotiate with the Icelanders about fish because their livelihood depends wholly on it.

City of London (Spitalfields Market) Bill

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the Promoters of the City of London (Spitalfields Market) Bill may, notwithstanding anything in the Standing Orders or practice of this House, proceed with the Bill in the present Session and the Petition for the Bill shall be deemed to have been deposited and all Standing Orders applicable thereto shall be deemed to have been complied with;

That the Bill shall be presented to the House not later than the seventh day after this day;

That there shall be depositied with the Bill a declaration signed by the Agents for the Bill, stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill at the last stage of its proceedings in this House in the last Session;

That the Bill shall be laid upon the Table of the House by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office on the next meeting of the House after the day on which the Bill has been presented and, when so laid, shall be deemed to have been read the first and second time (and shall be recorded in the Journal of this House as having been so read) and shall be ordered to be read the third time;

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during the last Session.—[The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

7.10 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): We are discussing what I think is called a revival motion. It is an effort to revive in this Session discussion of a Bill on which we have had a Second Reading debate in a previous Session. If the motion is passed, a badly designed Bill, which is damaging to the interests of the people of Spitalfields, will head towards the statute book. This is a good moment to halt its otherwise inevitable progress.

I hope that, at the end of the debate, my right hon. and hon. Friends will support me in the Division Lobby and oppose the Bill's revival. The Bill received a Second Reading on Thursday 12 May, after which it was sent to a Committee of the House, which had 10 substantial sittings. In Committee, the petitioners who had petitioned against the Bill were called and gave evidence. They put their case for not proceeding with the Bill.

I have read all of the Committee proceedings and have no complaint against the Committee. It conducted its hearings with admirable fairness and thoroughness. The Committee was sufficiently impressed by the evidence that it heard to require substantial amendments to be made to the section 52 agreement concluded by the City of London corporation and Tower Hamlets council as a condition of its approval of the Bill. I thank the Committee for that and congratulate the petitioners, especially those who spoke for the campaign to save Spitalfields from the developers, on putting the case of the bulk of residents of Spitalfields so persuasively and tenaciously.

Alas, the Committee could not respond to the petitioners' central point, which was that the Bill should not be proceeded with. The Committee could not respond to that request because the House had already given the Bill a Second Reading.

It falls to the House today to take up the issue again and, I hope, to decide not to proceed with the Bill. I am sure that the people of Spitalfields would be glad if the House decided not to proceed with the Bill, which is narrowly drawn. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg), acting for the City of London, summed up the Bill on Second Reading. He said:

> "I shall briefly explain the purposes of the Bill. It is to relocate the present market in Tower Hamlets to a fresh site in the London borough of Waltham Forest . . . It is to adapt and to amend many of the local enactments that are applicable to Spitalfields so that they apply to the market on its new site . . . to make no significant changes to market regulation law. It is also to require the corporation to offer accommodation in the relocated market to traders at Spitalfields market and at Stratford market, which is about one and a half miles from the relocation site."—[Official Report, 12 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 521.]

On the face of it, the Bill is concerned only with the relocation of Spitalfields market. That raises such issues as market planning in London and the problems of traffic congestion. Almost any substantial market site has such problems.

I do not dismiss the important arguments about market planning and traffic congestion, but by far the most important issue—and that with which the Bill does not obviously deal, but which it is in fact all about—is what will happen to the 11 acres of prime land covered by the present market which sits cheek by jowl with the City.

If the Bill were designed simply to transfer the market to a new site, I do not think that the motion would be before the House today. One quite remarkable feature of the report of the City of London corporation of 22 October 1987 on the future of Spitalfields market is the assertion that there is > "no overriding reason to relocate the market . . . despite these factors"— that is, heavy traffic congestion—

> "the market is relatively successful and it has to be said that not all the problems are insurmountable: e.g. with the co-operation of the local authority (Tower Hamlets) and the Metropolitan Police much could be done to alleviate rubbish dumping and traffic congestion respectively. More space could be found in the area for vehicle parking and the Corporation could consider taking control of the surrounding streets in order to regulate the whole trading area."

There is no question of an over-riding case for transferring Spitalfields market. No such case was argued by the City of London, and none would stand up if anybody tried to sustain it. We have the Bill because of the 11 acres of land that are so near to the City of London.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I have listened carefully to the right hon. Gentleman. I do not wish to be rigid or to restrict the scope of debate unduly, but we are not discussing the content of the Bill, merely the motion on the Order Paper. The right hon. Gentleman should get back to the motion.

Mr. Shore: I shall try to do that, but whether the Bill should be revived and whether it should be proceeded with is closely linked. I find it difficult to imagine a closer link.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It was the right hon. Gentleman who reminded the House that the Bill had been given a Second Reading.

Mr. Shore: Indeed. The Question now before the House is whether the Bill should be revived and allowed to proceed. I am simply arguing the case and shall not do so at great length. It seems to be an appropriate moment to arrest the course of the Bill.

There is no overwhelming reason why, in relation to the operation of the market, the site should be moved. The strong reason given for moving it is related entirely to the value of the 12-acre site and what is to be done with it. The City of London and the Spitalfields development group presented Tower Hamlets council with a major plan for office redevelopment in the area. There were some other facilities but is was basically for offices. They had chosen to do that in an area which is, on all the indices of poverty, deprivation and overcrowding, whether governmental or local governmental, the most deprived ward, not only in Tower Hamlets but in London. That ward has more problems—especially those related to homelessness, miserable and wretched overcrowding in housing and unemployment—than any other ward in London.

Is it justifiable to go ahead with a Bill which blocks off the land from the residents of Spitalfields in order to bring about yet another substantial office development in the area? It is not that the borough of Tower Hamlets is rich in land—it is not. At one time it looked as though we had found a solution to most of our problems when the London dockland area became vacant as ships moved down the Thames. However, as the House knows when the London Docklands Development Corporation was set up, the land was transferred to it and, therefore, was not available to the borough of Tower Hamlets for its pressing and urgent housing problem. The issue has raised the question of how we should go about inner city development. Nobody is arguing——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not relevant to the motion before the House.

Mr. Shore: All right. However, it relates to it and, even if I did not raise the matter, it would be on the minds of those concerned about it.

I wish to put to the House a matter that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may think is more closely related to the motion. The original plans—which were part of the deal behind the Bill and which the Spitalfields development group submitted to and negotiated with the City of London corporation and Tower Hamlets council—contained some proposals, including the development of some major offices.

In the Estates Times, on 28 October, we read:

> "A complete re-design of the redevelopment proposals for Spitalfields Market in Tower Hamlets could include the City's first major shopping centre."

Apparently the group is now considering a revamp of the plan to enable the group to develop a 250,000 to 300,000 sq ft shopping centre in the proposed development. This will be a major challenge to other shopping developments in the Whitechapel area and it puts an entirely new complexion on what is being proposed.

That change of plan has not been discussed in Committee, nor has it been reported to the House. Nobody is to blame for that because it became public only in the last few weeks. However, it is an important consideration.

The House has good reasons for not proceeding with the Bill and for sympathising with the plight and needs of the people of Spitalfields. It has good reasons for deciding that the Bill should be dropped and allowing the promoters—in the ample time that they will have—to sort out the proposals and, if they wish, to return with new proposals that are far better designed to serve the needs of the area.

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): A number of concessions were made in Committee and people in the local community welcome the extra money for community gain and the covenant ensuring that two pieces of land, Elder gardens and Horner square, will remain open spaces. However, they are dismayed that no concession was made about Allyn gardens which is the largest park in Spitalfields, which is a heavily populated area with insufficient open space. The local people believe Allyn gardens will be developed by Tower Hamlets council.

The Committee Chairman said that he recognised the impact that the development will have on the community. If the Bill is allowed to proceed, it will indeed have a massive impact. The monetary concessions that have been made will not compensate for the devastation that will take place.

In addition, Holland estate, which is nearby, is to be taken over by a housing action trust unless the [illegible] are allowed to vote against it. That means that the [illegible] area will be heavily developed.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) referred to the article in the Estates Times from which it seems that important changes will be made. There will have to be substantial amendments to the plans because the demand for office space is falling and the amount of office space will be surplus to requirements. The article says that about a quarter of the space will be used for a shopping mall and that the new plan is that the shopping centre will have 300,000 sq ft and that the design will be based on the > "Galeria in the centre of Milan."

The local authority already has a plan for a big shopping centre in Whitechapel, which is not far away. That plan would be destroyed and that shopping centre would no longer be viable if the Bill is allowed to proceed.

The plans are confused and the Bill should be returned and rethought. There are also plans for Whitechapel library, which is near the site. It is to be closed down and a compulsory purchase order will be imposed on the land behind it. That will be used for even more office space.

If the Bill is allowed to proceed there will be office space development gone mad. There will be two types of enterprise culture opposing each other. The Government purport to support small-scale firms in Spitalfields but they will be opposed by international high finance, with computer screens linking the City of London to the money markets of the world. That will change the nature of the area. The lives and livelihood of thousands of people, as well as the nature of the community and character of the area, are under threat. The Bill should not be allowed to proceed when there is such confusion and it seems that there will have to be a major change of plan.

Summer Time

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 7876/88, on Summer Time arrangements; and supports the continuation of the existing arrangements for a further three years to enable the Government to consult and give careful consideration to future summer time arrangements.—[Mr. Fallon.]

7.40 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Do I assume that the motion has been moved and that because no hon. Member has risen to speak, and if I had not risen, there would have been no debate? I am not quite sure about the procedure at this stage. Perhaps you can enlighten us because I believe that the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) wants to speak. I am not sure whether he can move his amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I apologise to the House. I have proposed the Question rather than put it. I have not thwarted anyone's hopes of participating in a debate. I should have told the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and his hon. Friends. If the hon. Member for Southend, East is trying to catch my eye, I will call him.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I beg to move, to leave out from first 'arrangements' to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'but regrets the decision of Her Majesty's Government to accept that the Directive falls under Article 100A; and urges Her Majesty's Government to reconsider the issues raised by the European Scrutiny Committees of both Houses and the opinion of Mr. Speaker's Counsel as expressed in Annex B to the report of the Select Committee on European Legislation of this House before engaging in further discussions on the Directive.

I apologise for the fact that I am moving the amendment rather than one of my hon. Friends because, unfortunately, we have the impression nowadays, sadly, that European matters of significance are debated only very late at night. I am sure that you are aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this can be a bit embarrassing. I am sure that we should all be aware that Mr. Speaker and Mr. Deputy Speaker always maintain their very good general relations with hon. Members despite our very late hours.

Basically we are debating a simple issue of principle which affects everyone in our country. Over the years summer time has caused major debates and disagreements in the House. It relates to human safety, the lives of children and adults and we all know that if we get the date wrong, that could result in a serious loss of life. To that extent the House has torn itself apart. I remember delegations from the north of Scotland and the north-east of England pleading with the House to move in a certain direction. We know, for example, that if we make summer time in a certain way, children in the north tend to go to school in the dark. Sadly those issues have dominated the House and caused enormous controversy.

We are worried because the European Community has put forward a directive, the object of which is basically to try to ensure that the decision on summer time will be made not by the United Kingdom Parliament but by the majority vote of the Council of Ministers.

I am delighted that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the hon. Member for Calder Valley (Mr. Thompson), is here because he is one of the most conscientious attenders in the House. I am sure that he will be aware from our many previous discussions that, sadly, there is a whole range of issues on which the House does not make its own decisions and about which the European Community takes a decision by a majority vote. It is very sad that the average person in Britain is probably not fully aware that laws are being passed by the majority vote of the Council of Ministers and Parliament must simply abide by them.

That is only one part of a whole scene of shifting responsibility from national Parliaments to the EEC. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister expressed concern about that in her recent important speech in Bruges.

Sovereignty is slipping away in three ways. First, there has been a huge increase in the powers of the European Court of Justice. Only recently the Government were instructed by the European Court of Justice to levy VAT on hearing aids, spectacles and new commercial and industrial buildings. That is one sign of sovereignty going away.

Secondly, sovereignty has been slipping away through the powers used by the Commission. The Commission is simply the EEC's civil servants, but it has been taking more and more power. We have seen that recently in the ban imposed on the import of all apples into the EEC without consulting excellent Ministers like my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary for their opinions.

Probably the most dangerous and worrying transfer of sovereignty has been through the Single European Act which, sadly, Parliament discussed on a guillotine very late on a Thursday night continuing through to Friday. As a result of that, decisions may be made in certain areas on laws to apply to all member states by a majority vote.

At the time, the Government said that they would be very careful to ensure that only those laws requiring majority vote were actually transferred. That is why the excellent Select Committee on European Legislation has looked carefully at the way in which the Commission is seeking to extend article 100A which means extending majority voting to issues which should not normally go that way. For the first time in my experience as an hon. Member for many years, I was fascinated to see in the report of the Select Committee on European Legislation the actual guidance from Mr. Speaker's counsel who stated specifically and categorically that the summer time order should not fall under article 100A. If it had stayed under article 100A, we would still have the right to say no if we did not like it.

We know that under this proposal the EEC is allowing the United Kingdom—[Interruption.] I am delighted that a Scottish Member has arrived in the Chamber. The Scottish people feel very strongly about this issue. They passionately believe that Scottish lives are threatened. Not only has the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) arrived on the Scottish Nationalist Benches, but as always —and we take this for granted—my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) is present. He is protecting Scottish interests and looking after the interests of his constituency. My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North should be an example to all hon. Members, with the conscientious attention that he pays to the debates in this House.

The Commission and the Council of Ministers have agreed that the United Kingdom can have three years during which it can basically go its own way on summer time. If we want to have a different date to end summer time, we can go our own way. Many of us are worried that because that is being done under article 100A, after the three years the EEC, by majority, can state what summer time will apply in Britain. Even if we did not like that, even if 650 hon. Members said that it was rubbish and put lives in danger, the new date would apply because of article 100A.

I appreciate that summer time is a very controversial issue which will divide hon. Members. I know that hon. Members from Scotland have very strong feelings because they know that their constituents feel desperately strongly about the dangers to children if we get summer time wrong. The papers presented to us from the EEC acknowledge that many lives could be put at risk if we get summer time wrong.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department promised in our last debate on this matter to look very carefully at the issue of the use of article 100A. I am now worried because it appears that the Government accept that article 100A is appropriate. How can anyone say that this issue involves freedom of trade or the internal market? Surely the fixing of summer time is a question for the Parliaments of each member state. Whether one is an enthusiast of the Common Market or a critic of it, there must be some issues on which national Parliaments must make up their own minds. I accept that some people would say that it would be more convenient if everyone in Europe had the same time. Of course it would, in the same way as that argument applies in the United States where there are wide variations in time. Even so, that does not upset the internal market.

Why on earth do the Government agree to article 100A? If they agree to it, do they not accept that there is a whole range of issues on which we can simply move to majority voting? We heard Mr. Jacques Delors say in Brussels recently that the time would come when 80 per cent. of our laws would be made in Brussels by majority vote. Mr. Delors was wrong. That time has come and that is obvious from the flood of Euro measures. We have considered three this week. If hon. Members took their jobs terribly seriously—as all hon. Members do—and studied this weekend the mass of papers for the debate on Monday night, they would be horrified to see what is proposed.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): The hon. Gentleman will realise that many years ago we said that if we decided to join the Common Market this kind of thing would happen. Slowly but surely our rights are being taken away. We shall soon be told when we can get up and when we can go to bed. We are being told exactly what to do. Slowly but surely, the decisions that we have to make for the people of this nation are being taken away from us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a debate on summer time, not bed time.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is right. Many people feel that. However, in fairness I should say that all the sovereign rights that have gone—the hon. Gentleman and I have been in the same Lobbies in opposing them—have been approved by the House of Commons. We must ask ourselves tonight whether more sovereignty is going than Parliament has agreed to.

In the Single European Act and in our own legislation we have defined what was included under article 100A. That is not just the view of some strange nut speaking from the Back Benches; that was the crucial issue raised by the Scrutiny Committees of the House of Commons and the other place where wise people look at such matters with great care. They said that on this matter article 100A did not appear to be appropriate. We have the expert advice of Mr. Speaker's counsel that article 100A should not apply. Anybody who studies such matters would also say that article 100A was not appropriate.

What worries me is that if this measure goes through we have no idea what the Council of Ministers will do in three, four or five years' time. What we do know is that the right to decide summer time has gone from the House of Commons and will be decided by the majority vote of the Council of Ministers.

That is even more worrying when we realise what is involved. It is not just a matter of whether we have an extra hour's sleep; we are talking about real-life issues—the convenience of industry, the lives of children and what happens on our roads.

Some may say that that is silly and that the Common Market will always do the sensible thing. However, some take the view that it does not always do what is sensible, and I am among that number. But whether we think that or not, the crucial point is that Parliament is passing the power to decide to a group of Ministers. It would not be so bad if those Ministers considered every issue on its merits, but we all know from previous experience that if, for example, we want Holland's support on an agricultural matter and Holland wants our support on issues affecting health and safety, people say, "We will support you on this if you support us on that." That is an unsatisfactory form of democracy, but we cannot discuss that tonight because that decision was taken by Parliament a long time ago.

In view of what was said when we last discussed this matter, and in view of the importance of the issue to people throughout Britain, are the Government willing to say that article 100A does not apply? If not, will they say why? If we agree to this, oher matters can be similarly decided upon.

The Government have said that we shall have a new thinking period of three years in which to decide which way we want to go. There are several options. We all know them. The crucial one is whether to stop summer time in September or October. I do not want to go into the rights and wrongs of this because those views have been expressed by hon. Members in Parliament time and again. The crucial issue is why we should allow an issue such as this to be decided by a majority vote of the Council of Ministers, about which we can do nothing.

We have seen time and again recently that, irrespective of the views of the Government and Members of Parliament, if the Council of Ministers decides something by a majority, that is that and we have to implement it. Only a few weeks ago we had to pass an order abolishing origin marking. The right of people to know where something is made has gone, not because the Government wanted that, but because the Commission said that it was wrong to discriminate between European goods. The Government took legal advice and were told that they should accept that ruling.

I appreciate that the battle over the loss of sovereignty was, to some degree, decided when we passed the Single European Act. I opposed it, but the majority voted for it and that is settled. What worries me is that we are adding a crucial matter to what has already gone and that is tragic. Therefore, I appeal to the Government to think carefully about the amendments and about standing firm on this occasion. Even if they lose the battle—we appreciate that the change will be difficult to get through the Council—at least the British people will know that the Government are speaking up for Britain and for Parliament.

Hon Members on both sides of the House were greatly heartened by what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in Bruges. However, words are one thing, actions are another. Therefore, I appeal to the Minister on this occasion to stand up for parliamentary sovereignty and the rights of our people, and stand up against the threat to the lives of our children. Try to make sure that on this occasion we say that this matter should be decided by the United Kingdom Parliament, not by the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I shall take only a couple of minutes, but it is regrettable that I should have to take even that time. The summer time issue should have been settled when we last rejected the experiment in the early 1970s. My predecessor in the House made his maiden speech in that debate and it is regrettable that we should still be discussing the same old issues.

My main objection is to the option to change winter time to British summer time and to have summer time plus one hour. That experiment was tried in the early 1970s and it failed. It was hugely unpopular in the north of Scotland, particularly in my constituency, where discontent was such that there was a grassroots movement to go on to our own time zone which we were also to call BST—British Stornaway time. I am sure that if the Government take up this option seriously, we shall see the same grassroots movement against it.

I draw the Minister's attention to the recent survey by the Association for the Protection of Rural Scotland as recently as the early summer of this year, in which it asked its various affiliated organisations their preferences on the various options being canvassed by the Government for the alteration of summer time. Of the 28 organisations that replied, 19 said that they preferred the status quo; only two wanted British summer time during the winter. Those organisations that wish to retain the status quo had their bases in Scotland and their members in some way or other made most of their living off the land, whether through farming, forestry or even tourism. The two organisations which wanted a change were the Ramblers Association and the Royal Automobile Club Motoring Services, both of which have their headquarters in London. That is instructive.

The notion that the change suggested in the Government's list of options has anything to do with the need to develop a single market is preposterous. It is as preposterous as the notion that we must have a uniform sales tax across the EEC. The example of the United States shows that it functions perfectly well with differential sales taxes in different states. Several different time zones also operate across that continent. There is no reason why we cannot do the same, even in the context of a united states of Europe and a movement towards greater European unification in respect of other matters.

The application of a central European time from the most northern part of Europe down to the Mediterranean will not make any sense. At this early opportunity, I record my constituents' opposition, which is shared, I am sure, by most of the north of Scotland.

8 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I support the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), because there is no question—I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take this on board—that the view in Scotland is almost totally unanimous. I say "almost" because one usually finds that organisations that do not support the Scottish view have their roots and origins in London. Scottish-based organisations, and certainly my own constituents, have posed more questions to me on this subject than they have on the community charge, which gives an indication of their depth of feeling.

Summer time has been an issue for many years, and whenever there have been proposals for experimentation, Scotland has wanted the status quo to continue. I hope that, during the three-year respite, the Government will have second thoughts about the way in which they deal with the directive and accept that it does not come under article 100A but is something on which they should take a stand.

It is not the great issues that mostly affect people's attitudes but the small matters that impinge on their everyday lives. A change in British summer time will doubtless have an enormous impact on everyday life. The hon. Member for Western Isles, using the United States as an example, argued that it is nonsense to claim that such a change is necessary to make the market more efficient.

That certainly is the most nonsensical argument anyone can produce. The finest markets operate worldwide. The Japanese would not work any more effectively and efficiently if they observed a different time zone. They operate under a very different time zone from ours, yet they manage to penetrate our markets successfully. It is ridiculous to suggest that a change in summer time will help the market place. It is instead an administrative notion, from bureaucrats who like everything nice and tidy and who want us all to be the same. It is time people realised that Scotland likes to be different. We enjoy being different, and we want to be different. There are good reasons why we are different, and those differences will be impinged upon by a change of the kind proposed.

8.3 pm

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): The House will note the exceptional Scottish interest there is in this matter. That is not surprising when one remembers that Scotland was the place of the previous British summer time experiment, which was far from relished. The strength of feeling now being expressed results from that earlier experiment, which caused major problems for Scotland.

The hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) pointed out that his predecessor, the right hon. Donald Stewart, used his maiden speech to emphasise his opposition to British standard time. Scotland's geography has not changed, and the arguments used then still hold true.

In the British Isles, the sun rises on a line roughly south-west to north-east. In the middle of December, it is 10.15 am before Scots begin to see a blink of daylight. That is why there were demands for the abolition of British standard time from a host of sources, including the National Federation of Building Trade Employers, worried about the consequences for the building industry; the National Farmers Union, whose members faced special problems rising from the adoption of British standard time; the National Union of Agricultural and Allied Workers; the Union of Post Office Workers; the Scottish Inshore White Fish Producers Association, and others. Opposition was clearly expressed by a whole range of Scottish organisations. I am certain that if they were asked again, they would express a similar view.

Scotland's geographic realities mean that uniformity with more southerly European states will create major problems in rural areas for farmers, the construction industry and others. Scotland's lower temperatures will combine with the penalties imposed by extra hours of darkness to increase industry's costs and its energy and light requirements. It will place an extra stress on the population. I ask the Government to note the problems that women and children in rural areas will face if they are forced to walk great distances in darkness. The earlier objections to the proposals stand, but today we live in a very different society, posing even greater dangers to the individual.

I want to get over to the Government the message that Scotland would face many problems if such a change is made. It is not beyond the wit of humankind to take into account the geographic realities of Scotland's northern areas and to act accordingly. The Soviet Union and the United States have different time zones, and it should not be beyond the wit of the Community to devise a solution that will suit its members. The last experiment showed that a change will bring major problems for Scotland. There was desperate opposition to it, and nothing has changed since then. I hope that the Government, in all their dealings in this matter, will take account of Scotland's plea and the nature of the problems that a return to British standard time would create for it.

If the Government question whether there really is such opposition they have only to ask, for I am sure that they will receive exactly the same message. Scotland requires a time structure that suits its special needs, not one that is imposed for external reasons.

8.6 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I cannot be as brief or as wide ranging as some right hon. and hon. Members who have spoken for the reason that has already been given by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor): I am Chairman of the Select Committee on European Legislation, whose two lengthy reports on the subject I draw to the attention of the House.

I wish to address points of legal and constitutional significance. Important though the considerations are to which my hon. Friends and other hon. Members have referred, ultimately it will be for its constitutional and legal aspects that this case will be remembered. Unfortunately, the proceedings of the House mean that the Minister did not open this debate. I suppose that that is the responsibility of those of us who did not take the opportunity to permit him to do so by drawing to your attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the method that would make that possible. I regret to say that, but for a point of order, this matter could have gone through on the nod. However, the Minister will have one go and my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) also has one go.

I want to clear the ground, and the Minister will correct me if I am wrong. We are discussing a number of points relating to summer time, but we are really discussing the EEC's fifth directive. As I understand it, if voluntary agreement is not reached by 1993 the consequence will be that we shall be dictated to not only as to GMT plus two, and when that finishes or changes, but also in respect of the voluntary arrangement for its start, and that those decisions will be made for us by the Council of Ministers by majority vote. Important though that is to all right hon. and hon. Members, it is a striking example of the way in which decisions—including the time at which we shall go to bed—are being made for our country by majority vote of the Council of Ministers. Meanwhile, the Government are arranging a survey. When the Minister replies, no doubt he will tell the House something of the results which —surprise, surprise—might mean the Government presenting proposals fitting in with those of our European partners across the Channel. In that case there would be no need for that vote. I rather suspect that such an arrangement may emerge, although I do not wish to be too cynical. I am trying to clear the ground. As I have said, we are discussing the fifth directive, which the Select Committee considered of sufficient legal and political importance to be debated in the House.

I must now revert to important and detailed constitutional matters which may be difficult to describe and even more difficult to understand. But the example that I shall give may reveal not only to the British public but to hon. Members the extent to which majority voting will replace our own legislation, not just on summer time but in a sphere as yet undefined.

I believe, as I said in a speech the other day, that when the House passed the Single European Act and authorised the insertion in the treaty of Rome of article 100A, no one —including myself—understood the implication. If anyone did, we were not told. Certainly no one told the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I was then a Member, and no Minister mentioned the implication with which I shall deal tonight. Either they did not know or they were concealing it from the House. I am one of those with a charitable turn of mind who believes that they did not know.

I am not suggesting that the Minister will venture tonight into those lofty areas of politics and constitution, although as a lawyer he will probably understand their importance. It was because he understood such matters that, when they were raised in a debate on 28 April by the hon. Member for Southend, East and myself, he doubted whether the use of article 100A would be appropriate. That, at least, was my interpretation of what he said. Since then we have corresponded with the Home Secretary. I should like to quote some of that rather lengthy correspondence in a moment, as it is very significant.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I do not want the hon. Gentleman to misunderstand my stance at the last debate, and I am sure that he did not intend to do so. I chose my words very carefully. What I said was:

> "I do not propose to express a concluded view on the issue, if only because I do not think that I am competent to do so."

I went on to say:

> "I am not irrevocably persuaded that article 100A applies to the directive. Clearly, that matter requires further consideration. I most certainly do not concede that the directive is intra vires article 100A."—[Official Report, 28 April 1988; c. 617.]

Mr. Spearing: I wholeheartedly concur, and I am grateful to the Minister for putting that on the record. I think that I referred to "doubt", and it is fair to say that there was doubt across the Floor of the House about the suitability of the article in relation to summer time.

I must now go into the details of the written constitution under which the House now operates, which will, I am afraid, take some time. Article 8A of the treaty of Rome, on which article 100A hangs, states:

> "The internal market shall comprise an area without internal frontiers, in which the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital is ensured in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty."

To that extent it defines the internal market. Article 100A, to which it gave life, is much longer, but the important paragraph for our purposes reads thus:

> "The Council shall . . . in co-operation with the European Parliament and after consulting the Economic and Social Committee, adopt the measures for the approximation of the provisions laid down by law, regulations or adminstrative action in Member States which have as their object the establishment and functioning of the internal market."

The important word there is "functioning". Any law or regulation in a member state that impinges on the functioning, or non-functioning, of the internal market comes within the ambit of article 100A, or would at least appear to. I should mention that article 100A is subject to majority voting, whereas article 100—the original article in the treaty—speaks of > "the establishment and functioning of the common market."

That article was subject to unanimity. There is, of course, a difference between the functioning of the Common Market and that of the internal market, and they are governed by slightly different articles.

Mr. Speaker's counsel drew the attention of the Select Committee in Report HC43 No. 15 to the use of article 100A in respect of what was then the fourth directive, which, as I have said, we discussed on 28 April. Mr. Speaker's counsel, who advises Mr. Speaker on legal matters, told the Committee—and we thought it important enough to note his advice in annex B—that the Government, who are responsible to the House, should not have been content with the choice of article 100A for the directive in question. In being so content—as I shall illustrate by quoting from a letter from the Home Secretary—they are making the directive subject to majority voting; if it had remained under article 100 it would have been subject to unanimity.

It is an important choice for any Government to have to make. The Council of Ministers can, if it wishes, challenge the basis of a regulation chosen by the Commission. The Commission is much more powerful than some hon. Members who have made speeches recently: it alone can produce draft laws and regulations. Any one of the 600-odd hon. Members in the House can present private Members' Bills, but the Prime Minister herself cannot put a draft proposal before the Council of Ministers.

The Commission is the eye of the needle. Moreover, it not only puts forward the law but cites the article of the treaty of Rome—which is our written constitution—on which it is based. If it is based on an article that requires unanimity, that gives every nation a veto. On the other hand, if article 100A is cited, a qualified majority of 23 votes is required to stop or block it. The United Kingdom and West Germany have only 10 each. Even two major states are not sufficient on their own to block a proposal under article 100A.

Hon. Members may say that it all sounds a bit legal and complicated so far, but so what? If article 100A is chosen for the summer time directive there may be a few chunterings from a few hon. Members, but what does it matter? It matters very much, because if the Commission is able to cite article 100A for this directive, what will they not be able to cite it for? We are not talking just about the length of daylight, the number of hours in GMT plus or minus or the date on which it should finish. Strange though it may seem in an unexpectedly early debate in an almost empty Chamber, we are really talking about the powers of the EEC to pre-empt the legislative authority of the House.

I have said on radio and in speeches that we do not know the perimeters to that power. I do not think that the Government know, either. I certainly do not think that the Home Office knows.

The Select Committee has embarked on a study of the choice of treaty base after the Single European Act comes into force. We have taken evidence—in HC 178—iv and v —from Government spokesmen, including evidence from Home Office spokesmen. The report is not yet complete and I do not intend to quote from it, but the witnesses appeared to be somewhat at variance with one another. We are still conducting that inquiry, so I shall not pursue the matter. It is still, as it were, sub judice. However, the Home Office spokesmen gave evidence as to why the Home Office thinks that article 100A is suitable in this instance. We are to take evidence from other witnesses before we publish our report.

In the meantime, the Government are steaming on and using that article, despite the fact that in the original report on the matter—HC 43-xv—we questioned its use. After the debate on 28 April to which the Minister referred I wrote to the Home Secretary and asked him why, in the fifth directive—the one with which we are dealing—the Government accepted article 100A in their explanatory memorandum and why they also accepted it in the Council of Ministers. I also asked the Home Secretary to explain why, after the doubts that had been expressed on various occasions about the use of article 100A, the Government went ahead with it.

In our next report that was published last week—HC 43 xxxviii—we published the correspondence that I have had with the Home Secretary on the topic. I shall read to the House the last part of our report so as to put the matter into context. On page 6 we say:

> "The Committee's concern about this point arises from the inference to be drawn from the arguments used by the Home Office, namely that, if any perceived internal market element found recourse to Article 100A, only political considerations restrict the scope of Community action under this Article in areas not specifically excluded. The Legal Adviser points out that this could have implications for national competence and, more significantly, draw the outline of a massive area in which Member States' freedom of action may be inhibited pending Community action. Furthermore, acceptance of this approach in one case may have implications for the Government's position regarding other proposals. The Committee therefore intends to pursue this question in the context of its current studies on choice of Treaty base.
> The Committee demonstrates above that this proposal raises important legal questions. It considers that important political questions are also raised and recommends further consideration by the House on the occasion of a debate on Summer Time Arrangements."

That is this debate.

I revert to the original note of Mr. Speaker's counsel and to the reasons why he doubts whether this regulation ought to come under article 100A. The point is fairly clear.

Summer time does not affect the physical movement of goods or the movement of telephonic communications. The establishment of the internal market depends upon the breaking down of physical and legal barriers. We have to ask what physical or legal barriers are impeded by different time zone arrangements. I put it to the House that there is little evidence of that. "Ah," say those in favour, "yes, there is. Business men, speaking from one side of the Channel to the other, or from one time zone to another, are inconvenienced by different time zones. Therefore," say those who are in favour of using article 100A, "there are commercial and market elements that justify the use of 100A." They say that it is justified, even if the British people believe that matters such as agriculture and daylight are important, apart from the importance of this House deciding for itself what should be done. It is a constitutional issue.

Whether one consideration justifies the use of article 100A over all other considerations is a moot point. We debated that matter on 28 April. After that debate there was the Home Office's decision and the fifth directive. The Home Office said that it was content that article 100A should be used, but it did not tell the House at that time. We found out by looking at the explanatory memorandum, where we saw that article 100A had been accepted and that the Home Office had not objected to its inclusion. Therefore, we shall have to accept a majority decision in due course.

I want to take the House one stage further. If the Home Office believes that that is acceptable, which other Government Departments will accept article 100A when only elements of commerce or the market are involved instead of commerce and the market being absolutely overwhelming or dominant?

Mr. Teddy Taylor: The matter is even more serious than that. According to the Home Secretary's letter, which is published in the report, he does not argue that it comes within article 100A. He states simply that he finds it difficult to argue that it does not fall within article 100A and that even if it did he would not win the case before the Council of Ministers. As the Government are allowing it to go through—not because they agree with it but because they think that it might be difficult to prove that they do not agree with it—does that not mean that a much wider scope of legislation will be passed from this Parliament to Brussels?

Mr. Spearing: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He takes me in this arcane but fundamentally important area to my next point. The correspondence that

[Mr. Spearing]

I have had with the Home Secretary—published in our latest report, HC43-xxxviii—reproduces in length what the hon. Gentleman has just said. The Home Secretary said:

> "To understand how the Fifth Directive would contribute to the establishment and functioning of the internal market, it has to be read alongside earlier Directives in the series, especially the First Directive of 2 July 1980/737/EEC, the recitals of which clearly indicate that the objective pursued is to facilitate transport and telecommunications between Member States."

As I have just demonstrated, transport is not impeded by a time zone boundary. A ship or an aeroplane does not stop at a boundary for an hour or so, or even for a day, and then proceed on its journey. All that it does is to change the time. Similarly, there is no impedance, other than electrical, in the electric current of the airwaves or those of the telephone. There is no immediate interruption or pause, as there is at a boundary.

The Home Secretary went on to say that the presidency had been helpful in delaying matters to allow time for the Select Committee to look at the matter and to allow the debate to take place, but the Home Secretary does not dissent from the belief that this regulation is well founded on article 100A, whereas the Committee believes that it is not.

I hope to persuade the House—whatever we do about this particular regulation—that the Home Secretary is wrong and the Government are wrong and had they gone to the EEC Court they would have had a very good argument. If we look at countries which cover a very wide latitude and constitute a single internal market, whether or not it is regulated—particularly the United States of America, the USSR or other countries divided by fewer commercial or political boundaries—it is clear that physical requirements require them to have a time zone because of the latitude that they occupy. However, nobody would suggest that that impedes the claimed economic effectiveness of a single internal market.

How can the existence of time zones intrinsically affect the internal market? It may be that people are inconvenienced socially. It may mean that a man in Paris or a man in London may find it less convenient to telephone at a particular time, but no doubt he would find it inconvenient to telephone Madrid at lunchtime, even if they were in the same time zone. That is a social inconvenience which has nothing to do with time zones or statutes. It is a matter of social habit.

In conclusion, the Government have not, in the view of the Select Committee, made a good case for article 100A. In fact, they have made no case at all. If they have been content to allow article 100A to go through on this matter, when in our view there was an excellent case to resist it, why and on what basis are they accepting article 100A on many other issues in the Cockfield package, and no doubt in the years ahead, without saying, "No, we object to that. It must come under another article where the Government's powers will be stronger and we are not likely to be outvoted by the Council of Ministers."

That is the nub issue. Is it that the Government have not woken up to the fact that the choice of treaty base is fundamental to determine whether the House or the Council of Ministers decides? If they have not woken up to that, they had better do so pretty quickly. If they have, why did they let article 100A through on summer time when we believe that the case was minimal? There must be an answer to that, and the answer bears fundamentally on the constitution of this nation, on the freedom of its subjects and on the power of the House to decide on laws in the United Kingdom. The debate has arisen, as it were, by accident at an unexpected time, but I believe that the issues are fundamental ones with which we have been attempting to grapple. I do not believe that the Government have understood them, and they certainly have not grappled with them inside the Council of Ministers. If they had, we would not be debating the issue here tonight.

8.33 pm

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): This has been an important debate and, ironically, it has been quite short, given the two important matters which it raises. The extremely important question of summer time causes a great deal of concern, especially in Scotland and in the north and west of Britain. My hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) have touched upon those points. The debate also raises a very important constitutional issue for the United Kingdom which the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) have raised. It is ironic that the proponents have changed, that those who support the measure are not here tonight and it looks as if the Minister is on his own. I wonder whether the Government are using this measure, which is uncontentious in certain parts of the country, as a bridgehead and as an experiment to see the reaction of the House to the use of article 100A. It is setting a precedent which worries many of us.

The proposal illustrates the perils of centralisation. I believe that we are being pushed towards accepting what is best for the centre of Europe after 1993, rather than having regard to the needs and wishes of all parts of the United Kingdom.

The Commission at least has accepted that there is a problem and that the case for change is not proved. We have a breathing space of some three years to debate the matter further and to decide what to do. The directive proposes no change for three further years, and to that extent we are certainly not opposed to it.

Before examining the merits or otherwise of summer time, may I say that a preliminary point has been raised at some length by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South. The directive is made under article 100A, which is directed towards measures which have as their objective the establishment and functioning of a single market. However, the article seems to be a catch-all, rather like a breach of the peace in criminal law. If one cannot get someone under something specific, one can go for breach of the peace. The idea that a common time system is part of the scope of the single market, and an essential part of it, seems a very broad interpretation and lends weight to the belief that this measure is being used as a bridgehead to try something out.

The 38th report of the Select Committee on European Legislation, dated 2 November, states:

> "The Committee continues to doubt the general appropriateness of Article 100A as the Treaty base for Summer Time Directives. Whilst it notes the arguments advanced that the objective pursued is to facilitate transport and telecommunications between Member States, it finds it difficult to accept that time differences per se either constitute > an impediment to such services or to free movement or constitute 'internal frontiers'. If this contention is accepted, it is consequently difficult to see how such proposals can 'have as their object the establishment and functioning of the internal market', the test for recourse to Article 100A as a Treaty base."

Of course, that is absolutely right. It is difficult to see why article 100A has been relied upon by the Government except that it provides a bridgehead and means that it is extremely difficult for us to go against the Commission were it to decide against us.

I remind the House that article 4 of the directive clearly states:

> "The Council, acting on a proposal from the Commission, shall adopt by 1 January 1992 the arrangements to apply from 1993 onwards."

That means that, no matter what may be the wishes of the House, no matter what the Government may care about it, the Commission can do what it likes. The Commission is in Brussels, and I believe that, in common with the ideas in this country being dictated from a certain corner of the United Kingdom, what comes from the EEC is often conditioned by the way things are seen from Brussels rather than from anywhere else. We must have some regard to that and it should be a matter of some concern and I hoped that more hon. Members would have paid attention to it. If article 100A is to be used in such a broad manner, it has significant implications for the sovereignty of this Parliament.

I was not here when the Single European Act and other European measures were debated, but I wonder whether right hon. and hon. Members appreciated what they were doing, and in particular the impact of article 100A. As the hon. Member for Angus, East spoke in the debate, I must stress that there is a clear indication of how preposterous is the notion of Scotland within Europe. If we are subject to article 100A under which majority voting decides, the very idea of a country with three votes having any great influence is utterly preposterous. I very much hope that the hon. Member for Angus, East will tell his chums when he sees them later that what they are proposing is preposterous and does not stand up.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: I must point out the alliance between the Conservative party and the Labour party. The hon. Gentleman is echoing the statement made by the Secretary of State for Scotland when he was rudely dismissive of Denmark, Greece and other nations in Europe. What is important is that Scotland has a direct voice, unlike the present situation in which we are represented by delegates of delegates. It is important that Scotland is in Europe in its own right, and the hon. Gentleman should appreciate that.

Mr. Darling: The short answer is that if Scotland was an independent country it would have only three votes and would still be subject to the majority wish. If the majority was against Scotland, it could do nothing about it. Now that we are in the EEC and have subjected ourselves to article 100A—there is no reason to believe that all member states will not be subjected to it—we are surrendering much of our sovereignty to that body.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in terms of entry into Europe and influence in making decisions, many Scots have been represented in both Conservative and Labour Governments? When a Labour Government are in office, it will contain many Scots.

Mr. Darling: I am glad to hear the hon. Gentleman welcoming the idea of a Labour Government with so many Scots in it.

Article 100A has been discussed at some length. I hope that the Minister will reply to the points that have been made and that the House will have an opportunity to discuss the matter again.

One's view of British summer time or double summer time depends on whether one lives north and west of a line running from Devon to Teesside—a new variation of the north-south divide. There are two options for change: first, to adopt the continental end date of September. I see no advantage in that. The longer nights will start one month early. It will hit tourism, prove difficult for industry, add to costs and affect the safety of children who live north of the line running between Devon and Teesside. Some of us still think of September as summer. The only justification for adopting a common end date in September must be the blinkered view that everything should be the same throughout Europe. If there must be a change, the end date should be in October.

The second option needs more attention because I suspect that that is the one towards which the Government are trying to edge us. That is to have British summer time in winter and double summer time in summer. It sounds good, but on closer examination I wonder whether it is. In December, from south-west Ireland to Berwick, the sun would not rise until 9.35 am and would set at about 5 pm. In Oban, the sun would rise at about 9.55 am and in Lerwick it would not rise until after 10 am and would set at 4 pm. In the south-east of England, the sun would rise at about 9.10 am and set at about 5 pm.

Many people would be travelling to work or going to school and returning in darkness in the north and west of the United Kingdom. That worries many people and the Government will have to consider it seriously. It is not good enough to say, "It will be fine for the majority of the country who live in the south and east. Never mind the rest." It is important to recognise the serious risks to people travelling to work in the morning, and especially children travelling to school, on roads that are still covered in ice.

It is not as though our later mornings will be compensated for by longer evenings in the winter. For much of the winter, the sun will set at 5 pm or 6 pm, which means that children and people coming home from work will do so in darkness, or at least when the light is fading. As my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles said, people were badly hit by the change in his constituency. No wonder that an attempt was made to establish Stornoway time instead of the time to which the rest of the United Kingdom was operating.

I am sceptical about the benefits for leisure and safety. The case for safety has certainly not been proved and much more work must be done. The idea that in the winter we shall all be outside playing games and enjoying leisure activities is preposterous. No matter what one does with the time, we can do nothing about the British weather. For much of the year, especially in winter and sometimes in summer, it is not especially pleasant to be outdoors in the evenings.

Lest some may say that I have taken an example in December, when the evenings are darker anyway, let us consider the position in February. West of a line between Penzance and Edinburgh, the sun will not rise until after 8.20 am, so the position will not be that much better.

[Mr. Darling]

It is worth examining the arguments deployed in favour of double summer time, although we have heard none tonight. That emphasises again that the result will not be longer hours of daylight in the evening. We are told that there would be a reduction in the number of fatalities in road accidents, and that the increase in accidents in the morning will be more than offset by the likely reduction in the latter part of the day. That is no comfort to someone who may be injured in the morning. The Government should consider the experiments conducted in Sweden, which have found mornings to be the peak time for injuries and fatalities in road accidents. The fact that most people live in the south and east of England, where the mornings are lighter, twists the statistics for the United Kingdom as a whole.

Another argument is that there will be a small reduction in the number of burglaries and other criminal offences. That is wishful thinking.

The Government and those in Brussels argue that the change would create a substantial improvement in all aspects of trade and travel. But their argument does not stand up. If a British business man wishes to telephone his counterpart in France or Germany, it is not too difficult for him to arrange matters so that he telephones at a time when that person is at his desk. The United States struggles by with five time zones, yet no one has said that its economic performance has been adversely affected. The USSR manages to struggle by with 11 time zones.

It is nonsense to suggest that we should have the same time across Europe. We are encouraged not to use our telephones before 1 pm, and most people are used to arranging their affairs so that they speak when they know that people are there. It is a mere excuse for tinkering with the present system. What about the British business men who want to speak to people in Japan or to do business on the New York stock exchange? Should we have a world time?

The argument about harmonisation is flawed. There is no problem in having a Europe with great differences, whether they are cultural, political or based on time. No one is crying out for a change, so why do it? It is ironic that a Conservative Government, who are supposed to be about conserving things, want to change the present system. Even in July in Greece it gets dark at about 7 pm —that is one of the nice things about it. No one suggests that the Greeks should change their system to get longer evenings, even if that were possible.

The case for change has not been made. There are strong arguments that must be considered, and I hope that the Minister will tell us who has been consulted and the progress of his review. Most of the people to whom I have spoken on both sides of the House believe that the review is being carried out in a less than open manner. To whom is the Minister speaking, and in which areas of the country? Will he bear in mind the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles that organisations that function in Scotland and are based in London may not be the best ones to consult? I want an open period of consultation during which everyone in the United Kingdom can make his views known. Many people are unaware that this measure is being discussed tonight. Many hon. Members are unaware of the debate. The Government will have to give more publicity to the fact that a change is contemplated. For many people, especially those living in Scotland and in the north and west of England, the changes will have a great impact.

I hope that the Minister will deal with the basis on which the directive was made under article 100A. What happened when Ministers discussed the matter in Brussels? The exercise seems to be shrouded in secrecy. Of course, that is a characteristic of the Government. Little that they do is open, especially when they do not want us to know about it.

The Minister has a duty to tell the House what fight was put up and to give a categorical assurance that, before any other directive on summer time comes forward, the House will have an opportunity to debate at length the premise on which the matter comes forward, based as it is on article 100A, and the merits of summer time. If he gives such assurances, we shall certainly not divide the House. If he does not do so, he can rest assured that the matter will come back again and again, because of its serious implications for the way in which people live and for the constitutional issues that it raises.

8.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I begin with an apology—an apology that I owe to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). I regret to say that I came into the Chamber a trifle late. Although I heard, I think, 95 per cent. of his speech, I missed the opening few sentences. I profoundly apologise to him. I hope that he will accept that I intended no discourtesy.

The House will accept that my hon. Friend set the tone of the debate. The points that he made have been echoed by several hon. Members, and they need to be addressed today and subsequently. My hon. Friend began by stressing the importance of the matter we are debating, and, in particular, focused on the choice of article 100A as the treaty base of the directive. The House has heard his arguments, and I shall seek to deal with them shortly.

My hon. Friend's arguments were supported by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who is concerned about the choice of article 100A as the appropriate treaty base. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East understandably drew attention to the concern of the peoples of Scotland and England, and in that particular he was powerfully supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) and other hon. Members, including the hon Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling). The people of Scotland's concern about this matter is serious, and we clearly must address it before we come to final conclusions.

I hope to explain why the Government have decided to take the action that we are now taking, and I hope that I will be able to reassure several hon. Members. But, before I address the particular points that I intend to address, it would be helpful if I were to spell out the nature of the directive and its consequences.

The proposal does not require that we make any change to our arrangements for summer time during the lifetime of the directive. It provides that the status quo shall continue for a further three years. Moreover, and because we are carrying out a review of our summer time arrangements, the directive enables us, if we so choose, to depart from the status quo and harmonise our dates with other member states during the lifetime of the directive. But again I stress that the choice is ours.

The directive provides that, for a further period of three years, 1990, 1991 and 1992, the existing arrangements for starting and ending dates of summer time will continue throughout the Community. Thus, as now, summer will start throughout the Community on the last Sunday of March, but, in the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic, it will end on the last Sunday after the fourth Saturday in October. In other member states, it will end on the last Sunday in September.

Continuation of the status quo in that way means that we are out of phase with other members states in two respects. First, we end summer time one month later than others, except the Irish Republic. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central has made observations about that matter with which I have considerable sympathy. Secondly, the effect is to place us in a different time zone from continental member states. We are, with the Irish Republic and Portugal, one hour behind central European countries.

The European Commission and other member states have never pressed us to change in that respect, but, because the Government have detected a widespread feeling in this country that more summer time might be beneficial to us, we have commissioned a review in which one option would be to move into the central European time zone. That would give us more summer time and, at the same time, enable us to harmonise time with the Community throughout the year. But that is an idea—we could properly describe it as an option—which the United Kingdom Government have brought forward. It is not an idea—it is not an option—which the Commission has either proposed or advocated. However, if adopted, it would enable us to meet the Commission's objectives of all states finishing summer time together if we left October as it now is.

Mr. Spearing: It might be right to clear up a point that I made, from which the Minister has not dissented. Whatever may happen between now and 1992, is it not a fact that, if we do not voluntarily harmonise in the way in which the Minister is suggesting may or not be possible subsequent to that date, by use, if it were chosen, of article 100A, we would be subject to the majority decision on the matter, as I outlined at the beginning of my speech? Is not the cessation of the regulation at the end of 1992 just as much an important feature of the proposal as any other?

Mr. Hogg: I can entirely understand why the hon. Gentleman raised that point. It is a bit premature to speculate on what might or could happen at that time. Clearly, several possibilities exist. One possibility is that, of our own volition, we might decide to move to central European time, in which case we would consider primary legislation. Another possibility—I stress that these are only possibilities, to meet a question from the hon. Gentleman—is that we might consider the possibility of moving the end date forward one month. That would require secondary legislation in this place.

We might—it is another possibility—decide to maintain the status quo. In that event, we would, it is true, require a directive to achieve that objective, but we might very well achieve it by persuasion. I would be surprised if we were unable to persuade member states to adopt a view which, in the end, we would wish to put forward.

There is a range of possibilities. As yet, the Government have come to no firm conclusion. The nature of the possibility that emerges at the end depends upon constitutional consequences. If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I cannot go down the road that he pointed me to, but I hope that I have given a fair indication of the kind of options that the House will have to consider after the expiration of the directive.

Mr. Darling: The Minister talked about the various options that the Government are considering, and the various options that might come forward. Can he tell us a little more about who is being consulted and what the nature and scope of the review is, or is it something that Ministers are discussing among themselves? Our concern is that all parts of the country are not being consulted and therefore have good cause to be concerned.

Mr. Hogg: I can reassure the hon. Gentleman on that point. I was going to come to it shortly, but this is as convenient a time to mention it as any other.

It is our intention to publish a consultation paper within the next few months, which will include the options that I mentioned in reply to the question from the hon. Member for Newham, South. We will publish the consultation document, which will open the discussion wide and will involve anybody, and I hope everybody, who has a view that they wish to express. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central asked me to give an assurance that there will be a wide discussion. There will be a wide discussion on the basis of the consultation paper and the Government will once again display their skill in their desire to ensure open debate on matters of major importance.

The treaty base underlying this directive is, I believe, the concern that has motivated hon. Members who have spoken in this debate. There have been other questions, but article 100A has been very much to the fore of the debate. It might be useful to remind ourselves that the first three directives were introduced under article 100 and, as the House knows, article 100 provides for unanimous decisions. The fourth directive and the present draft directive have been brought forward under article 100A which, as hon. Members have rightly pointed out, calls for and provides for a qualified majority.

As I have always believed in the power of persuasion, and I made my living from it for some time, I am not so pessimistic about these things as some hon. Members appear to be. It is worth reminding the House that the object of article 100A, as the hon. Member for Newham, South rightly pointed out, is to deal with measures that have as their object the establishment and function of the internal market. That is the phraseology that the House is bound to have in mind when we consider the appropriate treaty base.

Inevitably, the present draft directive and the fourth directive have to be read in the context of the first and second directives. Hon. Members will, I know, have studied this, particularly the hon. Member for Newham, South and my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East. They will know from their study of the first and second directives that in the preamble express reference is made to the objective of facilitating transport and communication. That is the background against which we have to focus our considerations.

We have to ask ourselves whether we can sensibly say of this draft directive, or indeed the fourth directive, that it has an objective different from that which was the objective of the first and second directives, which we accepted. The House will, I think, accept that when one poses that question, one has to conclude that the objective of the present draft is the same—it must be the same—as the stated objective of the first and second directives and consequently what we are debating today is a draft directive that has as its purpose, or one of its purposes, the facilitating of transport and communication.

When I wound up the debate on the Summer Time Order 1988 on 28 April 1988, I said—I have made this point before—that I was not "irrevocably persuaded" that article 100A was appropriate to the directive. However, I also said that the matter needed "further consideration". I shall be candid, as I have always tried to be candid with the House. I was not then willing to make a concession as to the vires of article 100A. I had formed clear preliminary views, but I wanted to test those views once again before I made a concession, which I recognise is a concession that is likely to bind us, certainly with future directives of this kind, and perhaps with other directives. Therefore, I was extremely cautious because I did not want to make a concession from which I might feel that I subsequently had to resile.

We have done what I said that we would do. We have considered carefully the vires of article 100A, and whether or not this directive falls within it. Our careful, considered view is that the directive falls within the scope of article 100A. If we were to win and assert the contrary, as the hon. Member for Newham, South and my hon. Friends the Members for Tayside, North and for Southend, East want us to do, we would have to be able to say that the purpose of the directive was outside the scope of article 100A. We would have to prove that it was ultra vires. That means to say that we would have to establish that it was not a measure for the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulations or administrative action in member states which have as their object the establishment and functioning of the internal market.

I do not believe that we could prove that article 100A was ultra vires partly because, in our judgment, it is intra vires, partly because, as a matter of evidence, we are stuck with the preambles to the first and second directives, and partly because, when we come to consider the consultation document, the House is likely to find that the views recorded in that document are to the effect that the present system of time is a constraint on travel and telecommunications. That will be a recording of other people's views and not necessarily, at that stage, the considered view of the Government.

Mr. Darling: Is the Minister already anticipating that, as a result of the review that we have not yet had, the majority of people will argue for the change that I suspect he wants? Surely, when we are considering the vires of this directive, it is for those who are promoting it to prove that it falls within the vires. I cannot see how the directive facilitates communication or transport, and I shall be interested to hear the Minister's comments. So far as I can see, it makes no difference.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman is not focusing precisely on the question. The consultation document is only a consultation document. It is designed to open the debate as wide as possible, but it likely that a substantial number of views will be recorded in the consultation document to the effect that the present time systems are a constraint. I know that, because I have a broad idea what the likely terms of the consultation document will be.

This is yet another evidential problem in our way because, when there is a recording of views to the effect that the present time system is a constraint and we accept, as we must do, that the first and second directives have as their objective in the preamble the facilitating of communication and travel, we have great difficulty in arguing that this directive is outside the scope of article 100A. If we have to challenge that, we have to prove that it is ultra vires. The business of any Government is to form a view. The view that we have formed is that the appropriate treaty base is article 100A. That is not to say that it would be ultra vires article 100. It may be within article 100, but it is not ultra vires article 100A.

Mr. Bill Walker: As a non-lawyer, I sometimes find it difficult to follow what is ultra vires and what is intra vires, but does my hon. Friend accept that a change in the time system, so that we have a longer period of darkness in the morning in Scotland, will mean that we have more black ice on the roads? That is the greatest constraint of all on travel and transport. We have to face that every winter and, if we have one more hour of darkness, I can assure my hon. Friend that that constraint will be visible and noticeable.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North puts his case with considerable force. However, he would be well advised, before he rests on that argument, to consider in detail the views of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents and to consider the documents that were available on British standard time in the early 1970s. The one point that was plain—which was mentioned in the last debate—was that British standard time resulted in a saving of lives and a reduction in injuries overall. It follows a fortiori that if British standard time had that effect, changing to central European time would have an even more pronounced effect.

Mr. Spearing: The Minister will probably agree with me on one point. Now that we are under a written constitution, the choice of articles and their interpretation are major legal matters. In justifying his choice of article 100A by earlier use of article 100, is the Minister suggesting that the two are conterminous? If they are conterminous, why is there a need of article 100A for derogation? That shows clearly that, in theory at least, there is some difference between the two articles, otherwise there would be no need for the A.

The Home Secretary sent me a letter dated today in which he said:

> "In our survey of summer time, we have received evidence, particularly from organisations dealing with Europe, that the present arrangements, and in particular different ending dates for summer time, impede transport end telecommunications."

That is the nub of the Government's case. Does the Minister agree that the present arrangements do not physically impede transport and telecommunications, because they cannot? They are an inconvenience and may be a social inconvenience. Habits may be an inconvenience between countries in the same time zone. However, impedance does not mean physical obstruction.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman is fixated with the phrase "physical obstruction". The words he should use are "constraint" or "fetter" and constraints or fetters can take a number of forms. I have no doubt that in certain circumstances a difference in time zones which makes communication difficult or makes travel more complicated is a constraint or fetter that is capable of interferring with the proper performance of the internal market.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the letter he received from my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, which makes my point that there is evidence. Evidence will be appearing in the consultation document and that will make it extremely difficult, once that evidence is recorded as a fact, to contest the vires of article 100A.

In making his second point, the hon. Gentleman was being less subtle than he is normally. Words such as "conterminous" are splendid, but they do not add up to much. But this point does add up: the preambles to the first and second directives state the specific objective clearly—the facilitation of communications and travel. That concept brings us four square within article 100A and this is within its scope.

Mr. Macdonald: Does the Minister accept that his words about what he expects will be in the consultative document have sent a chill through the Opposition and Conservative Members with a knowledge of Scottish constituencies? I shall return to my constituency and tell people to prepare for a Government directive—on which the Minister has already made up his mind—that will attempt to foist central European time on the people of Scotland. Will the Minister give us an assurance that the Government will not impose central European time against the majority will of the people of Scotland? I hope that the Minister will take the votes of Scottish Members as an indication of that majority will.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman does both me an injustice—although I do not suppose that he cares about that—and his constituents, because he intends to deceive them about the position. I made it wholly plain. I said that we were about to publish a consultation document which would set out the options. They include doing nothing, which is maintaining the status quo, bringing the end date of summer time one month forward or going into the central European time zone. The Goverment have come to no conclusion. We are putting out the options so that people can express their views and Parliament and others can form a clearer opinion as a result. If the hon. Gentleman speaks to his constituents as he has just spoken to the House, he will be deceiving them which I hope he will not do.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hogg: I have given way sufficiently often and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is getting cross, which I have always found a compelling reason for sitting down. On that happy and conclusive note, I commend the Government motion to the House and ask the House not to accept the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East.

9.16 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor: With the leave of the House, I shall be brief.

We are grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for his usual courtesy in establishing the position. It is frightening constitutionally and means that the Government are saying that it must be article 100A if we cannot prove that it is not. That opens up a huge range. Secondly, they are saying that it is article 100A although the directive makes no changes and establishes the status quo. The Minister has been honest enough to tell us what the score is.

This is an important night for the constitution and I hope that every hon. Member, following the lead given by the Select Committee, will realise the dangerous constitutional issue that we now face and the whole series of legislation which is now sadly being transferred from here to Brussels. I hope that the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) will not warn his constituents about what a Conservative, Labour or Liberal Government may do, but will tell them that, sadly, in three years' time, irrespective of what transpires, the decision on what happens to them will be made by the Council of Ministers by majority vote. That is the real issue tonight and it is a worrying one.

Again I thank the Minister for being so clear. My five colleagues who signed the amendment are coming to the House at 10 o'clock for the debate and it would be discourteous to them to force this to a Division in their absence, so I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 7876/88, on Summer Time arrangements; and supports the continuation of the existing arrangements for a further three years to enable the Government to consult and give careful consideration to future summer time arrangements.

Roads (Northern Ireland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

9.17 pm

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): As I have heard that the Minister to reply to this debate is cross, I may temper some of my remarks because it will be twice in two consecutive weeks that I shall see him cross and I do not want that.

I welcome the opportunity to draw attention to a matter which is dangerous in a Northern Ireland context —as it would be in any other context—and that is the results of what is known as the Snaith report in relation to the abandonment of some rural roads in the north of Ireland. First, I should put the term Snaith in context. Those who have an abiding passion for the turf will remember the days when there was a jockey of that name, who never rode from the front, always won his races from behind and was never seen by the other jockeys until the post, when they were pipped. This one seems to be akin to the jockey. He seemed to come from nowhere, produce a report that nobody knew anything about, cause mayhem among the rural community and evaporate into thin air.

This is a dangerous report because it recommends to people in rural areas that some roads which they have used for generations will be closed because someone came from England, had a look and decided that farmers and people living there did not particularly need them. Perhaps I put the case cynically, but that is how it is viewed by those affected.

Several of my constituents were surprised, to put it mildly—shocked would not be an overstatement—when they got word from the roads executive that the road on which their house was built or adjacent to their land was being abandoned and that—believe it or not—they had a right of objection, although no one told them what would happen if that objection was received.

Somebody who replied to a parliamentary question about the Snaith report on behalf of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said that it was to investigate the implications of adopting a positive abandonment policy in respect of low trafficked rural roads. Like many other people, I have great difficulty envisaging what a positive abandonment policy might be. It seems a remarkable contradiction in terms. It seems that a great deal of brain power has been used to arrive at such a definition of something as simple as abandoning roads and refusing to maintain them.

The idea of abandonment is bad for the simple reason that the North of Ireland is a rural country. Our biggest industry is farming. Most people who are employed—not that many are employed, of course—are employed in farming, and rural areas have always been the most stable part of the North of Ireland.

Among civil servants and others who advise Ministers in the North of Ireland, there has always been tension between spending on urban areas and pushing people into towns and keeping the rural infrastructure maintained.

Those of us who have lived to see the debacle of the creation of the new city of Craigavon, or rather the attempt to create a new city of Craigavon—a Milton Keynes in the middle of Northern Ireland—realise how silly and expensive it is and how counterproductive it is in human terms. Among all the economic and security problems and the problems of division, the rural community is one of the real stabilising factors.

I am glad that the Minister is here, as he is one of the people in the Northern Ireland Office who has realised the importance of what I and many others are saying. I should like to take this opportunity to thank him for taking a courageous decision about people in a very disadvantaged area of my constituency. They did not have a mains water supply. He made the sort of courageous decision that is required. Guidelines laid down by the Department are only that. They are designed to guide; they are not absolute. I ask the Minister to have a good close look at the Snaith report. If there is anything of advantage in it, that should be discussed. Above all else, he should discuss the issues.

I have here a copy of a letter which Armagh district council sent to the divisional roads manager in the Craigavon area. The divisional roads manager is assiduous in helping people and replying to queries, but he is in difficulty—he does not understand the Snaith report either, or he does not understand its context. The letter is dated 10 November. A reminder was sent by the clerk on 28 November, but there has not yet been a reply. I do not blame the divisional roads manager for that.

The letter asks three questions, the first of which is whether the traditional arrangements will be adhered to, and whether, if the district council receives objections to an abandonment, the proposal will simply stop. Secondly, is Armagh district council area being used as a pilot scheme? Thirdly, why were there no discussions with district councils and public representatives about something which was seriously to affect the lives of people, especially at a time when the whole thrust of EC directives is towards helping those in disadvantaged areas? I have no doubt that, following this debate, a reply will be received by Armagh district council. Will the Minister address his mind to those three specific points because they are the kernel of the matter and will be crucial for us all?

I was shocked when I received the figures for the road closures as of 31 October 1988. I want to compare like with like and shall use the figures for areas which are as rural as Armagh. I found out that one road was closed in Down district council area, two in Limavady, two in Omagh, three in Fermanagh, two in Dungannon, one in Ballymena and 23 in Armagh district council area. That seems to be more than a coincidence.

For that reason, people on Armagh district council—as I am—the clerk of the council, myself as Member of Parliament and all those affected are asking what we have done to deserve the attention of Mr. Snaith. I know that we are guilty of many sins of commission and omission, but I do not know of any that would merit this type of comparison with other district council areas. Will the Minister make some observations about that?

The matter does not stop at abandoning a road. It concerns people's livelihoods. As we know, farming nowadays is not a matter of driving a horse and cart up a lane. It is a mechanised industry, with combine harvesters. When the milk is collected, great tankers have to use the roads and if a road is abandoned it deteriorates quickly. What do farmers do then?

They are also being denied the provision of street lighting because of what I regard as a most remarkable anomaly in the administration of the North of Ireland. I want to take this opportunity to point the matter out to the Minister. If I am wrong, I know that the Minister will correct me and, if I am right, I ask him to correct the policy.

A large proportion of the budget for street lighting in the North of Ireland goes towards lighting in privately developed housing estates, where a builder will make huge amounts of money from building and selling houses. He must lay down the roads and sewers at his own expense and provide the electricity, but the Department of the Environment puts in street lighting for him. I find that remarkable. I do not see any circumstances that justify that continuing. If people are building a development from which they will make a profit—as is their right—let them provide all the amenities and let them pay for providing the street lighting. That is reasonable. If it is not done, the very people to whom I am referring—those who live in isolated areas—who need lighting more than anyone else, will not receive it. One of the reasons why they are not receiving lighting now is the iniquitous policy I have mentioned.

I hope that the Minister will bear in mind that many of us have been pushing for an integrated rural policy for the North of Ireland. Such a policy has been formulated by the EEC and proposals have been set out. We must try to implement an integrated policy so that we can talk about the lives of those who live in isolated areas, not merely about roads, street lighting, infrastructure, water, sewerage or whatever. We must never lose the integrity of rural life in Northern Ireland.

9.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Richard Needham): I can assure the hon. Member for Newry and Amagh (Mr. Mallon) that I was cross only on his behalf. I realised that, having been in his place since 8 o'clock, mainly because I sent out messages to find him, he might have been looking forward to his dinner. After the kind words that he used towards me, I can say with even more force that I am certainly not cross.

In 1986, my Department, following many criticisms that it had received and following the many problems that it had faced, appointed Professor Snaith—he is not a snake in the grass in Newry and Armagh but an eminent consultant on transport matters and an authority on highway engineering—to examine road conditions in Northern Ireland and all aspects of the Department's road maintenance policy.

We have decided, for good and sensible reasons, to keep confidential some of the findings which he brought to our attention, but most of his suggestions which involved improvements to engineering practice my Department is implementing. Professor Snaith recommended that we should develop a system that would give priority to the most important routes in an economic sense, the roads which would have A and B classification, and achieve the best value for money. I have accepted his advice, and we shall give priority to the most heavily trafficked roads. These are the major inter-town routes and the accesses to the ports. I can assure the hon. Gentleman, however, that that does not imply that other roads will be neglected. Professor Snaith suggested that the Department should take a hard look at the entire road network. We have 14,500 miles of public roads in Northern Ireland, which, per head of population, results in the highest ratio for any comparable area in the United Kingdom.

We have the puzzling and bureaucratic phrase "policy for abandonment", which I let slip through the net instead of using my usual, fairly simple English. The issue is that we should concentrate on improving the maintenance of the existing road network and investigate the possibility of abandoning roads which have exceptionally low usage. I use the more elegant phrase that was adopted by the hon. Gentleman, which I am sure would be used by my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), the Under-Secretary of State for Industry, who I am pleased to see in the Chamber. As the hon. Gentleman knows, many of these roads are in sparsely populated areas.

I would hate to accuse the hon. Member for Newry and Amagh of gilding the lily in any way. To test the practical implications of giving up responsibility for these roads —perhaps that is a better term than "abandoning"—the Department decided to undertake a pilot study. It was decided that the study should take place in a country district, and the district selected was the one with the greatest concentration of roads that have exceptionally low usage. Unfortunately for the hon. Gentleman, the district happened to be in the area which he represents. It was for that reason only that the study took place in the Craigavon division of the hon. Gentleman's constituency. My officials did not go round threatening abandonment. They tried to find out what people actually thought about the proposals. Many of the roads do not have people living in them. Of course, as the hon. Gentleman said, they lead to farm buildings that are in use and that is why the pilot study was undertaken.

The results of the local consultations clearly showed that even the lightly trafficked roads serve a distinct need. Following the findings, I decided that the limited savings which might be forthcoming did not justify any change in our present policy. I hope that that will considerably reassure the hon. Gentleman. His constituents need not worry, as any proposal to abandon such a road would require consultation and general agreement. My Department has no intention of adopting a programme of withdrawal from the public road network in any part of Northern Ireland. Of course there will be some circumstances where it is perfectly sensible to give up a piece of road—for example, when a loop is taken out following some kind of realignment.

In the hon. Gentleman's constituency over the past five years nearly £5 million has been spent on major road works and a further £8·5 million worth of schemes are planned for the constituency in the current five-year programme. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that that represents a very large investment in the Newry area and underlines my determination to ensure that there is an improvement in the quality of life of all its citizens through the road network that we shall support and maintain.

We spend about £750,000 each year on minor works in Armagh and Newry and Mourne district council areas. That is fully comparable to any other constituency in the Province. In addition, we spend approximately £5·5 million each year on maintaining the roads, street lighting and car parks in the Armagh and Newry and Mourne districts. Of course I will bear in mind the important points that the hon. Gentleman made about street lighting. I thought that he perhaps slightly undermined his case when he reminded the House about horses and carts and the fact that farmers have tractors and harvesters. Horses and carts did not often have headlights, while tractors and harvesters do. I take the hon. Gentleman's point that we are talking about a balance between people living in urban areas and those living in the countryside. It is not very nice for kids to have to walk up dark lanes in the winter.

I hope that I have succeeded in allaying any doubts that the hon. Gentleman may have had about my determination to maintain to the highest standard the splendid asset of Northern Ireland's road network. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is also aware that we announced yesterday substantial additions to the funds that we shall spend—following Professor Snaith's report for which I give him credit—on the maintenance of roads in the Province over the next three years. Most of that money will be used for the upkeep of the main roads, but other parts of the network will obviously benefit as well. I am sure that we would all regard that as a sensible investment and a token of my Department's commitment to maintaining the efficient road system in Northern Ireland.

Of course I am happy to make available to the hon. Gentleman a summary of the principal recommendations by Professor Snaith and together with that tell him the action that my Department is taking to implement those recommendations. I will do that now.

I hope that I have reassured the hon. Gentleman about the position for his constituents. He is always meticulous in raising with me any matters that affect his constituents and I will always do my best in those circumstances to assist him and them. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me at this late stage in the evening, considering the possibility of our dinners, if I do not consider integrated policy but leave that for another day.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-one minutes to Ten o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

9.34 am

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): I wish to present a petition bearing 2,049 signatures, sent to me, and collected, by Messrs Ian and David Rodham of Middleton in my constituency, and from David Marsden in Beeston —not a few yards away—which was in my constituency. The petition makes the point—which worries a lot of people, as we have learnt this week—that the Settle-Carlisle railway must be preserved and maintained. It is essential to the transport system from Leeds to Scotland. It is important for freight and for the hundreds of thousands of people who enjoy the scenery in that remarkable part of the world, crossing over into Westmoreland.

I humbly present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I wish to present a petition signed by 2,000 constituents of Berwick-upon-Tweed and elsewhere in the same terms as that presented by the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees). It seeks the continuation, as part of the national railway network, of the Settle-Carlisle railway, which is an important part of our engineering heritage and a necessary part of the railway system.

I strongly support the petition. I would not wish to see the line go the way of the famous Waverley line in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), who is here beside me. I present the petition with my full support.

To lie upon the Table.

Parliamentary Accommodation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Neubert.]

[Proposed subject for debate: First Report of the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services) of Session 1987-88 (HC 561) on New Parliamentary Building (Phase 2): The Next Steps.

Relevant documents: Second Report of the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services) of Session 1986-87 (HC 378) on New Parliamentary Building (Phase 2); Casson Conder Partnership, Phase 2 Parliamentary Buildings Design Study (January 1987); Property Services Agency, New Parliamentary Building Phase 2 Alternative Strategy (February 1988).]

9.36 am

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): This morning's debate provides an opportunity for the House to consider the recommendations made in the first report by last Session's Services Committee on what is generally known as phase 2 of the new parliamentary buildings; that is to say, the site bounded by Bridge street, Cannon row, Derby gate and the Victoria embankment.

Although I am Chairman of the Services Committee, I am not a member of the New Buildings Sub-Committee, and rely on my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) to keep me informed. This report is really the work of the New Buildings Sub-Committee, and I should like to pay tribute to the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) and his colleagues for their splendid work. Our thanks, too, are due to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) and his officials in the Property Services Agency, and to Casson Conder's project team, who have produced the two valuable design strategies before us today. It is the intention of my hon. Friend, the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment to wind up the debate today—subject to catching your eye, Mr. Speaker—and respond to any detailed comments or questions which arise during the course of this debate.

Parliamentary accommodation has long been felt to be unsatisfactory. The Palace was first said to be overcrowded in 1852, the year of its opening. I know that, almost 140 years later, this is still the case.

Most Members have their own horror stories, but the plain facts and figures on overcrowding are contained in the the report before us today. In short, about 500 Back Benchers have access to only 150 single rooms. To some extent this overcrowding has been brought about by improvements in our other circumstances. The increasing office costs allowances of recent years have meant that Members have been able to employ more secretarial and research staff, all of whom add to the pressure on accommodation. Moreover, the increase in the Short money for the Opposition parties has already, quite naturally, enabled them to take on more staff to help them with their work. I understand, though, that it has simply not been possible to accommodate them near the Chamber.

The 1987 Services Committee report recommended that by 1995 every Member should have a room of their own, if they wanted one. The building work which is currently under way, and the proposed building under consideration today, should go some way towards this.

[Mr. John Wakeham]

It may be of help to the House if I summarise the general background to the Committee's report and the present activity. Over the past 30 years, many abortive schemes have been put forward for the Bridge street site. In 1960, the then Minister of Public Building and Works, now Lord Glendevon, announced that the Government had decided to apply for designation of the Bridge street site for parliamentary development. Prophetically, he added:

"As the House knows, this is bound to take a bit of time."

The House devoted much of its time and effort during the 1970s to discussing plans for an entirely new building, but the scheme eventually foundered owing to lack of money.

In 1978, however, the president of the Royal Academy, Sir Hugh Casson, and his firm, Casson Conder and Partners, were commissioned by the Department of the Environment, on behalf of the House, to conduct a further study into the Bridge street site. The objective was to retain and restore what was of quality, and replace the rest to a coherent design. In his report, Sir Hugh recommended that the most practical approach would be a phased development extending over a period of years. As a first stage, which came to be known as phase 1, he proposed the development of the area bounded by Parliament street, Derby gate, Cannon row and Bridge street.

As hon. Members will be aware, work on that phase is well under way and is broadly on schedule for completion in time for occupation at the end of the summer recess in 1990. When finished, it will provide accommodation for the research and public information activities of the Library, residential accommodation for the Serjeant at Arms and four other Officers of the House, all of whom presently live in the Palace. There will be offices for 60 Members and 100 Members' secretaries, as well as refreshment facilities and a parliamentary bookshop. Moreover, nearly 30 further rooms for Members become available in the Palace as a result of the transfer of Library and residential accommodation to the phase 1 site.

The temporary refurbishment for parliamentary use of the former Cannon row police station is taking place concurrently with phase 1 development, and is due for completion by summer of next year. Unfortunately, there have been delays to the scheme, caused most recently, I understand, by the listing of the building by Westminster council, but, when finished, it will provide office space for 41 Members' secretaries and about 20 research assistants, in addition to space for PSA and Crown Suppliers staff.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Am I to interpret that as criticism of Westminster council's decision to list the building?

Mr. Wakeham: Absolutely not. The hon. Gentleman was quite right to bring that matter to my attention if it sounded in that way. It certainly was not meant to be a criticism.

These developments will still leave about 100 Members without a room of their own. Thus, the report recommends that provision should be made in phase 2 for at least 100 Members' offices, together with additional space for Members' staff.

The most pressing task before the House today is to consider the design strategy for phase 2. The Casson Conder partnership has produced a design study for the site, and the PSA has put together an alternative strategy. The two are not in fact mutually exclusive, nor is the House being invited to approve or reject either strategy in toto. Elements of one could be combined with elements of the other.

There are common proposals in the two strategies. Both involve the rebuilding of Palace Chambers. That is unsurprising, as only the ground and first floors remain after the rest was demolished to relieve pressure on the supports holding the building over the underground railway. Both strategies adopt a refurbishment approach to Norman Shaw South and Nos. 1 and 2 Bridge street, because those buildings are listed.

Perhaps I should say at this stage that the word "refurbishment" does not just mean a lick of paint. Rather, it would involve restoring the original fine features of the building, both internally and externally, while bringing it up to modern office standards. So there would be as high a quality of finish and furnishings, and of the environment, in terms of heating, daylight, and so on, as if it were a completely new building.

However, there are some differences between the proposals. The Casson Conder proposals would raft over the underground railway at an early stage. The principal advantage of that would be a reduction in noise, and perhaps a better visual environment. But, on the down side, it would add about a year to the project timetable, in addition to the extra time needed to negotiate on air rights with London Regional Transport. The Committee believes that it is more important to press ahead with the first stages of phase 2, the rebuilding of Palace Chambers, and the refurbishment of Nos. 1 and 2 Bridge street. A raft could, if necessary, be added later.

The second difference in the proposals is over St. Stephen's House, which Casson Conder would rebuild and the PSA refurbish. No final decisions are needed on that just yet, as that stage of the project is some years away.

Mr. Dalyell: The right hon. Gentleman said that a raft can be added later. May we have some idea of the extra costs of doing it in double phase rather than in single phase? Would it not be significantly cheaper to do it all at once, or am I wrong?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The Chairman of the Committee and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, who will wind up the debate, know considerably more about the detail than I do, and have taken note of the point. We hope to answer that question in the course of the debate.

The third difference is that Casson Conder propose to move the underground station entrance to the corner of Bridge street and Cannon row; the PSA would leave it where it is. As moving the entrance would add substantially to the planning and construction time, the Committee feels that no change should be made.

For the sake of clarity during today's debate, it would be helpful if hon. Members could address at least their main remarks to phase 2. It is important that the momentum of the new building project is maintained. To do that, it would be helpful today to have the House's broad approval of the Services Committee's report and of its recommendations in paragraph 29 on the best way to make progress. Although the debate is, of course, on the Adjournment, it would be my intention, if the mood of the House is largely in favour of making progress with this scheme, to table in the next few days a motion to approve the Committee's report, which I hope would then be taken formally one evening.

In brief, the recommendations of the Committee are to start work on phase 2 by carrying out preliminary design work on Palace Chambers, Nos. 1 and 2 Bridge street, and a feasibility study on a secure Bridge street subway to link the new buildings with the Palace. The PSA is ready to appoint an architect to carry out those studies, but nothing of substance can be done until the House's wishes are known.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Before the right hon. Gentleman leaves the subject of the subway, will he clarify one point that puzzled me on reading the report? Is the subway intended to serve all the buildings on the other side of the road? I speak as a new tenant and exile in Norman Shaw North. Accommodation there is extremely good, but access is unsatisfactory. Will the remit to the PSA include linking it by some kind of shuttle, as in the United States Congress? In the meantime, will the PSA consider subdividing the existing tunnel to provide slightly cleaner and more secure access for hon. Members?

Mr. Wakeham: The answer to the right hon. Gentleman's first question is yes. It is thought that it could be made to service all buildings on that side of the street. I am quite sure that the hon. Gentleman's other points will be taken into account by the Committee and by my hon. Friend. Obviously, practical possibilities will be looked at.

Mr. Dalyell: Paragraph 29 of the first report, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, uses the words

> "while bearing in mind the possibility of using part of the building for broadcasters' accommodation."

Have the Government any view on broadcasters' accommodation?

Mr. Wakeham: The Government have no special views on broadcasters' accommodation, and they are quite happy to consider any recommendations by the New Building Sub-Committee. We are entirely content with the report, as I am seeking to show.

The Government's intention, if the House approves the report, is to make the necessary money available for these studies, and for the subsequent detailed design study of Palace Chambers. Further work beyond that is several years away, and decisions on finance will be made at the appropriate time. At the moment, the costs of the phase 2 proposals range from £47 million for the PSA proposals—that is, making no allowance for a raft, rebuilding St. Stephen's or moving the station entrance—to £70 million for the complete Casson Conder proposals.

Before I close, I should like to comment on the general principles of phase 2. It is a longer rather than a shorter-term solution to our accommodation problems. All the buildings on the site, except Palace Chambers, are already occupied. Therefore, it follows that all work will need to be carried out in stages, with staff being decanted into completed buildings from buildings yet to be refurbished. Significant accommodation gains will thus come later rather than earlier in the development.

I hardly need remind the House of the importance of the site that we are discussing. It is close to one of the most famous and beautiful Victorian buildings in the world, and the Committee's 1987 report emphasised that > "it would be most unfortunate if an insensitive and utilitarian building design were to be adopted on grounds of speed and economy".

But we should not be too extravagent either. When making up their minds on the proposed expenditure, hon. Members will no doubt bear in mind that this must be a question of competing priorities and that the expenditure, if agreed, would necessarily reduce public funds available for other purposes.

Mr. Dalyell: I do not quite understand from a reading of the documents how much excavation is still involved. Should not the House set some example to archaeologists who throughout London are deploring the way in which some possibly very important sites are being excavated by bulldozers?

Have the Government thought about their obligations towards archaeologists? This work could be very expensive, because it is time-consuming and uses expensive equipment. Anybody who talks about doing archaeological work had better understand that it creates financial problems for contractors. What thought has been given to what may be a most important site in terms of the history of London?

Mr. Wakeham: I am advised that we had an archaeological report on phase 1. The Government will be sympathetic to any recommendation made by the New Building Sub-Committee. It is for the Committee to consider what is necessary. The way forward recommended by the Services Committee would give us a gracious scheme of a fitting standard for our parliamentary purposes without making undue demands on the public purse. I hope that the House will welcome these recommendations.

9.52 am

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I thank the Government for making time available to debate this report which was prepared by the New Building Sub-Committee which I have the honour to chair. It is five years since the House last debated the new building project; given the level of interest and anxiety among hon. Members about their accommodation, that is far too long an interval. I am sure that the House will have taken note of what the Lord President said about a debate within the next few weeks if the House approves this report.

The Lord President has concisely summarised the contents of our report, and I shall not seek to cover the same ground. Instead, I shall concentrate on some matters of special concern. Before doing that, I should like to pay tribute to my predecessor, John Silkin, who became a member, and was Chairman, of the New Building Sub-Committee from 14 January 1981. I am sure that the House would like to place on record its appreciation for the services that he rendered to the House and especially to the Committee. All hon. Members have cause to be grateful to John Silkin for the work that he did on the Services Committee and for his enthusiastic commitment to the new building project. His successors will need to be equally enthusiastic and committed if phase 2 is to be a success. I should like to thank my fellow members of the Committee and the clerk for their able help and assistance during the 12 months that I have been in the Chair.

We all know and appreciate that there is a crying need for extra accommodation and better facilities for Members. I am not sure what the Lord President meant by his obscure reference to Brent. Perhaps he could explain it to me afterwards. Many hon. Members work in impossibly cramped and squalid conditions. As the Lord President said, about 500 Back Benchers have access to only 150 single rooms. In our report, we say that many hon. Members sharing rooms have only 60 sq ft of space each. We compare that to the 250 sq ft that comparatively junior officials in the Civil Service can expect.

The building in which we work is an architectural masterpiece, but it was designed for the part-time gentlemen MPs of the 19th century, who took a very relaxed view of their political duties. It was not designed for modern Members who quite reasonably require staff, space and facilities to cope with the burden of constituency work and the sheer hard slog of parliamentary duties. For some years I was well aware of the problems about accommodation, but it was not until I was appointed to the post of allocating accommodation to Opposition Members that I realised that the problem would be solved only when Members from all parties forced the Government to take more than a cursory interest in the early completion of the proposals that are before the House.

Mr. Dalyell: Does my hon. Friend know of a more thankless task in the whole Palace of Westminster than allocating accommodation to Opposition Members?

Mr. Powell: A more thankless task in this Parliament is that of the Government Whips who allocate accommodation for Conservative Members. That is because they have considerably more Members than the Opposition. The allocation of accommodation is a difficult responsibility, given the problems of Members about their work load. It is essential that we have no more slippages, no more excuses for pushing dates further and further ahead. We want action to advance completion dates and a sincere promise to ensure that hon. Members are accommodated. Even the Prime Minister should be told to give her customary stamp of approval.

When I tour the buildings looking for rooms that might have been overlooked or rooms that might be unused, or when a new Member is allocated a room and moved from the desks in the Cloisters, I inevitably look into the Oratory in the centre of the Cloisters. I do not know how many hon. Members have walked down there and looked into the Oratory. There are four hon. Members there with four desks and four filing cabinets and all their books and papers. They are cramped in a historical room where the death warrant of Charles I was signed. We might conclude that that is an unusual place and ideal for a new Member who could get a great deal of publicity when he is allocated a desk there. That is the only condition under which new Members will accept a desk there.

Four hon. Members, representing 250,000 constituents, should not be asked to work in such accommodation. Some elder statemen might say that, when they were elected, they had to wait years for a desk. I have not been elected all that long, but I had to wait four years for a desk. Together with 12 other Members, I squatted in rooms above the Chamber; we were told every week by the Serjeant at Arms that we had no right there because it was a writing room for Members and that we should not be using the desks. Nobody slept on the desks but we used to leave most of our documents there, and at least we had a desk to write on. As I am not going back all that many years and as I am not an elder statesman, it is clear that we have not progressed very far over the years with the allocation of desks.

We are nearing the 21st century and advancing into modern technology. We have young and enthusiastic Members who have been educated and trained in modern techniques, and we must ensure that facilities are made available for them so that they can house their computers and other advanced office machinery. Let us keep the Oratory for signing historical documents. It is no use increasing secretarial allowances so that Members can employ more trained staff unless we provide them with the basic necessities of an office and a desk. It is of little use to increase Short money for the Opposition unless that is coupled with the allocation of accommodation for staff.

It is of grave concern that the Government announce major programmes of legislation, adequately backed by increased spending from the Prime Minister's office down to that of the most junior Minister, yet give little if any consideration to providing the Opposition with increased accommodation for the extra staff that they need to deal with the extra work load that major Bills involve. I hope that some consideration will be given to this urgent matter.

Yesterday, there was a tremendous attendance of Members from all parties at a retirement farewell gathering for one of the staff. I place on record my wholehearted appreciation for the help that was afforded to me over the years by Miss Frampton. There is no doubt that she will be missed. Her knowledge of every desk in all areas throughout the Palace was formidable. I am sure that the House would like to join me in expressing our best wishes to her for a long and happy retirement.

Like many other hon. Members, I could record in great length and detail tales of actions taken by some to acquire desks and rooms for themselves, only to find eventually that they have to be evicted. I do not wish to delay the House with those tales. After the 1987 general election, the allocation of accommodation proved to be a tremendous problem. With only one exception from the Opposition's point of view, all other problems were eventually overcome, if not entirely satisfactorily, with all Members being allocated a desk. Undoubtedly this was due mainly to the tolerance and understanding of the Serjeant at Arms and his staff. I am sure that all hon. Members appreciate the help afforded them in 1987 after the June election, when so many had left the House and so many new hon. Members had been elected.

The House must surely appreciate that the lack of accommodation is not merely a minor inconvenience to a few hon. Members. Instead it is a major curb on the effectiveness of Parliament. I bustled into the office of the Lord President only this week and witnessed the activities that were taking place in such a cramped area. If it is not possible for the right hon. Gentleman to have reasonable accommodation in which to exercise his duties on behalf of the House, what hope is there for others, including Back-Bench Members? It is high time that we improved accommodation at all levels.

In the report we set targets for the provision of extra accommodation. We recommend that by 1995 every hon. Member should have a room of his own, if that is what he or she wants. We suggest that a minimum standard of 50 sq ft of working space should be provided for each Member's personal secretary. We say that that standard should be introduced as soon as phase 1 is ready for occupation in 1990. We recommend that high priority should be given to the provision of between 20,000 and 36,000 sq ft net for additional office space for Members' staff.

It is one thing to set targets, but quite another to achieve them. The history of parliamentary building projects is not encouraging. I am acutely aware that the prospect of a new building on the Bridge street site was first announced to the House more than a quarter of a century ago, yet we are now talking tentatively about the completion date for phase 1. I cannot respond in detail to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), but if we cannot complete phase 1—we want to couple phases 1 and 2—our grandchildren, if they become Members of this place, will be asking when they are to have new accommodation. I am sure that the Minister will respond to that issue in more detail.

It is difficult to avoid coming to the conclusion that successive Governments have paid only lip service to the need for improved accommodation. A further problem is that responsibility for design and construction rests with the Property Services Agency, which is not the most dynamic of public bodies, especially if Ministers do not exert the necessary political will to keep it up to scratch.

A recent example of repeated delays in the conduct of parliamentary building projects will prove my point. It is an example that has been a source of irritation to myself and my colleagues on the Sub-Committee for the past 12 months. The old police station at Cannon row is being temporarily refurbished for parliamentary use. This will provide a limited number of extra desks for Members' staff, which will be a modest but useful gain. The original completion date was late 1987. That slipped to mid-1988. It slipped again to the spring of 1989. We were told last summer that that was an unrealistic target. I hope that we shall be told today what the latest estimate is.

The Cannon row refurbishment is a small-scale project. If temporary refurbishment can take twice as long as was first estimated—during the period when cities of skyscrapers have been built in docklands—will work on the parliamentary site proceed at a snail's pace? We have a right to expect that phase 2 will be conducted with much greater urgency. I hope that the conversion project is an extreme example.

Progress has been made over the past five years. For example, phase 1 will provide considerable extra accommodation. There will be offices for 60 Members and 100 Members' secretaries. There will be catering facilities and a bookshop. We have been told by the Lord President that phase 1 is broadly on schedule for completion in time for occupation in October 1990, but I am a little suspicious of "broadly". I hope that he will confirm that there will be no slippage that will put the target date in danger.

When the Cannon row project and phase 1 are completed, much accommodation within the Palace will become vacant. The Library alone will vacate 21 rooms. Other staff of the House will move out of the Palace. The Sub-Committee is concerned that funds should be made available and plans drawn up so that the vacated rooms can be converted without delay. As we state in the report, it would be unacceptable if prime accommodation within the Palace were to lie idle for any long period because lack of funds for conversion. Perhaps the Minister can reassure us that attention is being paid to that recommendation.

Our overriding concern on phase 2 is that we should, as far as humanly possible, be able to proceed with construction work as soon as phase 1 is complete. That is why the Sub-Committee decided earlier this year, when considering the proposals from the Property Services Agency's consultants Casson Conder Partnership and from the PSA itself, to pursue a compromise approach. That is set out in the report and has been outlined by the Leader of the House. We have accepted that the underground station entrance should not be moved as Casson Conder wanted. We have deferred a decision on whether St. Stephen's house should be rebuilt or refurbished, and we have recommended that a deck over the underground, which would result in much improved working conditions for those who use the offices around the southern inner court, should not be built in the first stage of phase 2 but may be built later.

I must make it clear that I and my colleagues regard that compromise approach as the minimum that the House is likely to find acceptable. If the House accepts those elements of scaling down of the scheme prepared by the consultants—I accept that it may be necessary to do that—we have a right to expect in return that the proposals for phase 2 are proceeded with without delay and with ministerial guarantees on appropriate funding at every stage. I hope that the Minister will provide us with guarantees at the end of the debate. Perhaps he will also be able to assure us that the quality of accommodation that will be provided under phase 1 and 2 will be up to the standards that Ministers have recently provided for themselves and their civil servants further down Whitehall in Richmond terrace.

Phase 2 will have to proceed in stages, as so much of the site is already occupied. The logical place to begin is Palace Chambers, which is not only unoccupied but largely demolished and, in its present state, is a considerable eyesore. Fundamental decisions on the future of Palace Chambers will have to be taken within 12 months. Those include decisions on the use to which the building will be put, the choice of an architect—on which I trust that the Sub-Committee will be consulted in due course—and the preparation by the Sub-Committee of a detailed design brief.

The report makes specific proposals about the preliminary studies that need to be carried out by the Property Services Agency. Those proposals are in paragraph 29 of the report. We made a great effort to take evidence and agree on the report before the summer recess, so that essential preliminary work might begin during that recess. I understand that Treasury Ministers gave their approval in July for such studies to go ahead before the present debate. I was therefore disquieted to learn that after all that effort, no work was put in hand. Five valuable months have been wasted, either because of indolence in the Minister's office or because of bureaucratic time-wasting by the PSA. The Minister owes us an explanation for the latest delay and an assurance that the studies will now proceed immediately.

The studies outlined in paragraph 29 of the report include not only detailed work on Palace Chambers, but an examination of the uses to which Nos. 1 and 2 Bridge street could be put to pave the way for the next stage of phase 2. We also call for a feasibility study on a subway link between phase 1 and the Palace of Westminster. That is something that successive Services Committee reports have highlighted as a priority. The need for a proper dedicated link with the new building will become urgent when phase 1 is opened in 1990. It follows that planning must start now and that necessary financial provision must be made in the advance budget.

I want to make three further points on phase 2. First, I want to sound a note of caution. Precisely because so much of the site is already occupied, the overall accommodation gains will not be enormous. We shall have to decant—I do not like that word, but we are using it now—people from one building to another to allow work to proceed. The gains will accrue later rather than earlier during work on phase 2, although we intend that a further 100 Members' offices will be provided by phase 2. I should mislead the House if I claimed that those offices will be made available in the first stage of phase 2. That is all the more reason to make the fastest progress that we can on phase 2, unhampered by Treasury penny-pinching.

My second point concerns the appearance of the building. The rebuilt facade on Bridge street will be of particular importance because it will face towards the Palace of Westminster and it will be seen by literally millions of tourists and visitors every year. It is at least as sensitive a site as the precincts of St. Paul's cathedral, which recently received some publicity. I think that the House will wish to be reassured that the New Building Sub-Committee has no intention of angering the heir to the throne by permitting the building of a monstrous carbuncle on the site. In our report, we suggest a restrained classical style which is dignified but does not seek to distract attention from the Palace opposite.

My third point is about the timetable. The Property Services Agency has been coy in giving us estimates about how long each stage of phase 2 is likely to take. The House will expect the Minister to give us precise information on that today. I have made a number of criticisms about the Government and the PSA and I ask the Minister to reply on several important points. I am sure that officials in the Box have taken careful notes.

I shall end on a more positive note. We should miss a great opportunity if we considered phase 2 merely as a way of providing new office space and refurbishing or reconstructing a few buildings. Together, phases 1 and 2 will provide us with a capacious, internally linked complex of buildings for parliamentary use within easy striking distance of the Chamber. Almost all decisions on the uses to which phase 1 buildings will be put have been taken, but that is not the case with phase 2. That means that we now have a chance to consider what facilities should be provided in phase 2, over and above basic office provision.

The New Building Sub-Committee and the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee have agreed to co-operate in a joint inquiry into the long-term need for the improvement of parliamentary facilities generally. We intend to consult widely within the House—initially, perhaps, by means of a request for submissions publicised through the all-party Whip and later by other means.

All manner of additional facilities have been suggested by hon. Members already. They include a swimming pool, a day nursery, a ladies' hairdresser, cash dispensing machines, a badminton court and rooms for Members' families. No doubt many more suggestions will be made, some practical and others less so. It will be our job to assess the level of demand in the House for particular facilities that we do not enjoy at present, and to allocate priorities. We shall take account especially of the need to offer the support of facilities that might be taken as standard by the end of the century when the new building complex will be in full operation. We shall report to the House on that in due course.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): It gives me great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), the Chairman of our Sub-Committee, and to congratulate him on an extremely effective and wide-ranging speech. I associate myself with almost everything that he said, and I am sure that every other member of the Sub-Committee will feel as I do. It is a pity that more are not here today. That should not be regarded as a lack of interest but as underlining the needs that we are talking about. If Members had better facilities they could transact business from their offices which at present they must transact in their constituencies. I hope that the people in my constituency who expected me to be with them this morning will acquit me of discourtesy, just as I hope the House will if I disappear shortly after speaking in an attempt to catch up with what I should be doing in my constituency.

It is a long time since I spoke in the House on a new building. In 1973, on the only occasion on which I won a ballot for a private Member's motion, I decided that we should discuss the Spence-Webster building. The proposal then before us was for an enormous bronze glass and steel structure that would have dwarfed much of the Palace, would have been completely incongruous and out of scale and would have been a blot upon this part of London's landscape. It certainly would not have won an award from the Prince of Wales.

I was one of those who believed strongly that the site was so sensitive and this building so historic and beautiful that it would be wrong, merely to give Members luxury accommodation, to build something like the Spence-Webster building. I strongly opposed the proposal, and I was glad that we were successful. I was even more glad when Sir Hugh Casson, to whom tribute has properly been paid by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and by the hon. Member for Ogmore, came up with the scheme for phase 1 which is now, happily, very much under way. May I say to my right hon. Friend, whose interest in and strong support for the scheme cannot be in doubt, that we hope that "broadly" means on target.

Mr. Dalyell: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I admire him for all the work that he has done on this subject. I understood the Leader of the House to say that the Casson proposals were half, but not quite, exclusive of the other proposals. I should be interested, because I respect him greatly, to hear the hon. Gentleman's views on the Casson proposal. Is he wholly in favour of it?

Mr. Cormack: Perhaps I may deal with that in a moment. This morning I am speaking in support of the recommendations of the Services Committee and the New Building Sub-Committee. I believe that we have got it about right.

I paid tribute to the innovative work of Sir Hugh Casson and his partners in coming to the rescue of Parliament. When we had abandoned the Spence-Webster building for all sorts of reasons—aesthetic and financial—we still had a problem. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has described the problem in graphic terms many times. I shall never forget his account of prowling the corridors of Westminster looking for accommodation and coming upon a man pressing his trousers in an enormous subterranean room somewhere in the House of Lords. But that is not entirely apposite to this debate.

Sir Hugh Casson and his partners created a sensitive scheme that would use the facades, and where possible more than the facades, of buildings that were already listed or deserved to be listed. The scheme would not be out of scale and would not commit the heinous sin of so much modern architecture of being ill-mannered to the buildings that surround it. Sir Hugh and his partners performed a signal service in that regard.

We cannot allow to come out of this debate the suggestion that this is a group of parliamentarians intent on personal extravagance. One occasionally reads comments about Members wanting to look after themselves. It is amazing how many people believe that we do not pay for our own food here, and how many believe that we have some mysterious expense account and that when we entertain them to lunch it is paid for by the taxpayer. In fact, we pay for it, and cannot even claim it against tax.

We are talking about giving our constituents a better service. I entered the House in 1970 and for some time shared a room with seven other Members, including the former Labour Chief Whip, now Lord Cocks. We were of different parties. We were extremely friendly and got on well together, but how could either of us hold a detailed telephone conversation on a confidential matter sitting three or four feet away from each other? It was impossible. If a Member is to look after his constituents properly, he must have soundproof, decent—not lavish—personal accommodation.

During the long recess, I had the honour to be a member of the British delegation that attended the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association conference in Canberra. We held our meetings in the new Australian Parliament building. It is a magnificent building, and Australian Members of Parliament have been looked after in a way that touches on the extravagant. I looked at their suites of offices with more than a little envy. We propose nothing like that here. At the end of the day, be it 1995 or a little later—I hope that it will not be later—the Members of the British Parliament will not have accommodation that begins to equal in opulence the accommodation that is provided for Members of the United States Congress or Senate or the Australian Federal Parliament. We should remind ourselves that those legislatures meet far less frequently than we do. That is another point that people should take into account. We at Westminster meet for far longer periods than almost any other legislature.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): That is because there is too much legislaton.

Mr. Cormack: That is one of my hobby horses, but I shall not disturb the all-party accord and my lavish praise of the Government by talking about the excessive amount of legislation in the Queen's Speech. That would be to enter a slightly discordant note, which is not what we are about this morning. Every Government, of whichever party, have broken their pledge to cut legislation. For many years, we have been kept here five days a week for 36, 37 or even 38 weeks. Members of Parliament may sometimes rightly be accused of lack of judgment, bad behaviour and all the other things of which we are guilty, but few of us could be accused of slacking. Most hon. Members, irrespective of party, try to give a good service to their constituents. Most Members are here because they have a vocation for public service. Although that might sound a little prissy and pompous, it is true. Many hon. Members gave up far better renumerated occupations outside to come here.

It is monstrous that many of the able new Members who came here last year will not have individual rooms until 1995. Not only are they being frustrated in many of their personal ambitions, but their constituents are being deprived. It is important to get those things on the record in a debate like this.

We enjoy an enormous privilege in being able to work within this historic Parliament and I have always been among the forefront of those who criticise vociferously any suggestion that we should abandon this place and move out. However, we must remember that this building was created, as the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) reminded us, in a different age for a different type of Member representing a different type of constituency. The building was created before the age of universal suffrage when there was not the relationship between a Member and his constituents that exists now or the variety of jobs that a Member is now expected to do for those constituents. One does not have to go to the extremes of Lord Palmerston who, in order to represent Newport, had to promise never to go near the place.

In the 19th century, when the building was opened, Members would pay irregular and infrequent visits to their constituencies. Those knights of the shires who resided in the counties came and went, but they did not come and go with enormous boxes of letters imploring them to help with housing and pension cases and all the other things that Members are asked about today.

We should also remember that the building was opened long before the age of the telephone. I believe that it was well into this century before a telephone appeared in this Palace. We must also remind ourselves of those facts when we consider the needs of the modern Member.

No modern Member can conceivably perform a proper job and serve his or her constituents in the fullest way without reasonable accommodation. I am fortunate to have had a room for some years and I pay tribute to my colleagues who exist in the Cloisters with just a desk or those who share a room. It is even unsatisfactory to share a room with one Member. For some years I shared a room with my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) when he was the hon. Member for Petersfield. We were the closest of friends and we got on extremely well together. However, we found it so impossible to do our work that we worked out a rota: I had the room for certain hours of the day and he had it at other times. That was not satisfactory.

We should not be in two minds about this. It is important that phase 1 is on time. It is absolutely vital that there should be no slippage. It is crucial that phase 2 should be proceeded with and that the momentum, as my right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council said, should be maintained. No Government should be allowed to get away again with the argument that this is excessive public expenditure. It is expenditure for the public, so that the public can be served better by those they send here regardless of party.

I would deplore it if my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment in replying to this debate said that there was any doubt about meeting that modest 1995 target date. By the turn of this century, it should be an historic memory that Members of the British Parliament once had to exist in conditions of squalor, which would send most ordinary workers quite rightly yelling to the factory inspectorate, and which would cause strikes up and down the land if any private employer tried to insist that people with confidential and important work to do had to do it in the conditions that many of us have to endure.

I hope that we shall receive a good answer from the Minister. I hope that the answer tells us that the Government support, as my right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council made plain, the Committee's report to the letter and are determined to support it fully in spirit. I am confident that we shall receive such a reply today. The time for delay has long passed.

When this building was created, it was created not only as a building for the British Parliament; the aim was to create a building which would speak of and for Britain, which would help to tell the story of Britain and would exemplify in every last detail the very best of British craftsmanship. Although we sit in a Chamber that was built after the devastation of the war, we still sit in a beautifully constructed and elegant Chamber. When we wander around the rest of the Palace, as we do so often, taking our constituents around they always remark on the brass work by Hardman of Birmingham, the wonderful stained glass and the incredibly beautiful carving in the House of Lords and elsewhere. They look with interest at the pictures which tell the history of Britain.

Obviously I am not suggesting that there should be any attempt across the road to replicate what we have here. That cannot happen. However, the spirit of what we have here should be reflected over there. I declare an interest because I have the honour to be Chairman of the House of Commons Works of Art Committee which has responsibility for the works of art in the building. We are constantly trying to conserve what we have and to add to it. Hon. Members will perhaps have admired the conservation of the murals in the Upper Waiting Hall. We do our work with a few thousand pounds: we do not even reach five figures. Recently we were able to unveil a bust of Ernest Bevin and we accepted the gift of a bust of Parnell. Throughout the Palace we want to see constant reminders of those who have helped to mould this place and create its history.

I have discussed these matters with my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore—and in his capacity as chairman of the New Building Sub-Committee he is very much my hon. Friend. When we go across the road, the New Building Sub-Committee and the Works of Art Committee should work closely together. Just as it is important that the building should be sensitive to its surroundings, so its contents should be equal in interest, if not in intrinsic value to the contents of this place. I hope that we will be able to commission young contemporary artists just as our Victorian predecessors did.

I am not suggesting that we should subject Members to avant-garde work which they might find it difficult to understand, although that might not do them a great deal of harm occasionally. However, just as in this building the story of Britain is depicted, so perhaps in the new building Britain itself might be depicted. What better than to commission artists to paint landscapes of the various parts of the country or commission a series of living or recently deceased parliamentarians to compliment studies in this place? What better than to commission tapestry weavers? We can do all that within a relatively modest budget if we patronise young, living artists. There are many distinguished artists whom I am quite sure would be prepared to negotiate special terms for the honour of having their work displayed here, just as their Victorian predecessors did.

I hope that we shall concern ourselves increasingly with the building and its contents so that it will be truly worthy of our Parliament and so Members in their individual offices can have the benefit of a little inspiration on their walls as well as a computer on their desks. All those things can be done and Members can be involved, perhaps by enlisting the support of colleges of art within their constituency, if we are imaginative.

Mr. Dalyell: When I was Parliamentary Private Secretary to Dick Crossman when he was Lord President, he wanted pictures for those marvellous offices at 70 Whitehall that the Lord President has, and I managed to fish out what was deemed suitable—the beautiful portrait of Halifax the Trimmer. Since then there has been a succession of pictures of admittedly second-class importance which had not seen the light of day for a long time. Should not some of them be taken out of storage and put in the new offices?

Mr. Cormack: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman's sentiments—we are at one on that—but he will find that there have been many changes since those days. The Government picture collection under Dr. Wendy Baron has been extremely well managed. Many of the works that he speaks of have found their way on to the walls of embassies or consulates, and when I saw the store recently it was not very full. We have brought works of art from the store to the Palace and it is right that we should. We should also pay a thankful tribute to the National Portrait Gallery, which has been so generous with some of its surplus pictures and has allowed us the portraits that hang along the Committee Corridor. The interiors of phases 1 and 2 merit careful, detailed, sympathetic consideration and should show the beauty of 20th century Britain as this building speaks of 19th century Britain.

The hon. Member for Ogmore made a good point about the Oratory. I hope that we can free it by removing the desks and make it the small museum that it should be to one of the most historic events in British history. It is a sad event, which we may interpret differently, but a seminal occasion which should not be forgotten in a welter of papers and clutter of desks. It should be somewhere which parliamentarians can visit and to which, with appropriate arrangements, from time to time take small school parties. As the hon. Gentleman rightly reminded us, it was in the Oratory that the death warrant of Charles I was signed.

I have said enough to show my support for the Committee on which I am pleased to serve, my delight at the Lord President's welcome acceptance of our recommendations and my expectation that my hon. Friend the Minister will not disappoint us when he replies. I hope that he will assure us that "broadly" means on target, that there will be no spurious financial considerations to deprive the public of the service that they have a right to expect from their Members of Parliament and that, as we move towards the completion of phases 1 and 2, we should give proper, detailed consideration to the contents of the building, just as our predecessors did to the contents of this one.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I strongly support the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) on many of his points, but particularly on two. First, for heaven's sake, this is not about the personal extravagance of Members of Parliament who want to build cushy facilities for themselves. All of us are a little sensitive about that. This morning we are talking about a decision for Britain, and I make no apology to anybody in my Linlithgow constituency for not being there while the House of Commons discusses this matter, because it concerns the prestige of Britain and her good name.

Secondly, I agree with the hon. Gentleman on the possibilities for patronage of young British artists. That is of enormous importance and I hope that a great deal of trouble will be taken. I should like to hear from the Minister what the Government's thinking is on the patronage of young British artists.

I was glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) mentioned the work of John Silkin, especially as this week some of us attended the memorial for Sam Silkin at the Temple church. Those two brothers made remarkable, although different, contributions to the House of Commons over many years and it was fitting that my hon. Friend should pay that tribute. I was also glad that he paid tribute to Mary Frampton. She had many functions, including serving writs on distinguished trade union leaders. Apparently her formidable figure was the armed force in the House of Commons and doubtless she did the job better than anyone else could have done—not that I am in favour of serving writs on trade union leaders. She performed many other tasks of an unofficial nature. When I was presented with several jojoba plants for having spoken strongly in favour of ecology, I went to Mary Frampton to look after and water them before I could take them home to Scotland. Many other hon. Members have similar memories of her kindnesses. She was a distinguished and good servant of this House.

The work of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore may be unsung, but his colleagues should thank him and the Committee sincerely for doing what may be a thankless task but one which someone must do and which is important. We are grateful to him for the long hours he has spent on the issue.

My history in these matters was briefly touched on by the hon. Gentleman. Within weeks of coming here, bereft of accommodation, I had the effrontery to carry out a survey of the Palace of Westminster over three nights with my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who at that time was not right hon. As a result I wrote a long article 2,500 words, for Architects Journal. No one took much notice of it until three weeks after its publication when the Daily Mirror discovered that I had alluded to the fact that we had found a man in his underpants in 590 sq ft of prime space, pressing his trousers. The discovery was not to my political advantage because I was immediately tagged as the man who discovered the man pressing his trousers. I remember vividly two distinguished knights of the shires, Sir Henry Stodholme and Sir Otto Prior Palmer, pointing me out and saying, "That's the fellah who found the man pressing trousers in his underpants."

Fame comes in strange ways. The absurdity and yet the non-absurdity of that encounter reached the headlines. About a month later the then Prime Minister, Harold Macmillan, passing me in the corridor looked up and said, "Dalyell, was he pressing his trousers to Royal Scots Grey standard?" The accommodation problem had even reached Downing street by then.

I should like to ask a series of specific questions. The first is prompted by that series of visits round the building a quarter of a century ago when I was critical of the House of Lords' space and accommodation.

Now I ask a reverse question. I am one of those who acknowledge that the House of Lords works extremely hard. There are more and more working peers. Some of their accommodation is very unsatisfactory. I do not suggest that the House of Lords has anything like a prior claim to the building that we are discussing, but is it intended, as a knock-on effect, that there should be rather better accommodation for working peers?

Secondly—I speak with feeling here, as it concerns the Library—I strongly register the opinion that as far as possible the Library should be concentrated in this building and that, where possible, those scholars—for such they are—who work in the Library should be allowed to work near us rather than in the proverbial outer Mongolia. I pay tribute to Dr. John Poole who has recently left the service of the Library. To many Members, Dr. Poole was an extremely able and helpful Library scholar. We have had cause over two decades or more to be grateful to him. He and his section were recently moved out of their position in the Library and sent over the road.

It is not right and proper to go into the reason why Dr. Poole retired from the Library service. I just register the point that it would have been very much better if the science section were accommodated in this building near to Members rather than over the road. Library accommodation is a priority. The Library staff should be near Members rather than over the road. Facilities that are consequential on the Library's needs should be made available over the road.

Thirdly, I hope that the Minister will say something about the nature of the competition. The documents do not make clear how the architects are to be chosen. My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore said that the building is to be in a restrained, classical style. It will certainly be on a prestige site. Has the Department worked out how that is to be achieved and what the form of the competition is to be?

Fourthly, I foresee enormous difficulties over what is called "decanting." I refer to paragraph 28(ii) of the report, which says

> "(ii) that decisions should be taken as part of a coherent strategy for the Phase 2 site as a whole. All buildings on the site, apart from Palace Chambers, are currently occupied by Members and officials of the House, or by broadcasters. It will therefore be necessary to proceed by means of a staged approach (as is accepted in both sets of proposals) in which > occupants of each building to be developed are "decanted" to other parts of the parliamentary estate to allow work to proceed."

I have had recent constituency experience of the decanting of one general hospital, Bangour, to another site at Livingston. Decanting big areas of sophisticated work is very difficult. I am not saying that it is as difficult as decanting a hospital, but how much thought is being given to the mechanics of decanting? I foresee that a great number of my colleagues will be extremely vexed about the kind of things that might happen to them.

Fifthly, I do not see very much reference in the documents to the needs of the visitors that all hon. Members receive. For example, could not some provision be made for those who have to queue for a long time in rather cold conditions? Could not some cover be provided for those who have to queue outside when it is often wet and cold? I find it embarrassing to see people queueing to get into the Strangers' Gallery when the weather is wet and cold. Could not their needs and facilities for visitors in general be taken into account?

Sixthly, what is to be done about the long-term fabric of the building? Any building has to be constructed taking into account its functional use and the long-term maintenance of its fabric. I hope that you will not rule me out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I say publicly now that the day before yesterday, having endlessly raised with the authorities the stone rot of the Crypt, particularly around the font, I took my friend, Frank Bracewell—an expert from the Central region of Scotland—down to the Crypt chapel where he saw evidence of stone rot in the Welsh marble font that ought to be attended to. I throw that in, because it is not entirely irrelevant. I hope that something will be done about it. The general question that nevertheless remains is the quality of the fabric of the building.

Seventhly, hon. Members have cause to ask questions about exercise facilities. Over a quarter of a century ago I went, together with colleagues, to see the late Sir Paul Chambers about ICI Dyestuffs at Grangemouth. He said, "The trouble with MPs is that they are unfit. You get too portly and fat." That was true. I asked him what we should do about it. "Oh," he said, "you can have our squash courts." For over 20 years some hon. Members, from 8 to 10 o'clock in the mornings, have benefited greatly from the ICI squash courts. They have now been demolished. The squash players, of whom I ceased to be one last year, were then moved to the Civil Service building. Sir Robin Butler, the Cabinet Secretary, who is a regular squash player, told me last week that he thought that the courts are to be closed. He asked me where people would be able to play squash. It is not up to me to offer facilities to the Cabinet Secretary to play squash, but I am entitled to ask what sports facilities will be provided in the new building. If neither the Civil Service nor the ICI squash courts are available, could courts be made available to Members of Parliament within the foundations of the new building? That might not be too difficult.

The foundations bring me to the next issue that I raised in an intervention. What exactly is being done about the archaeology? The House of Commons has to set an example. We cannot lecture people in the City about not taking care of the archaeology of London, or Baynard castle, or whatever the issue of the day may be, if we do not take care of it ourselves. It will be a pity if achaeological work is not carried out towards the end of Horseferry road. The site of the new building may be important in archaeological terms. What thought has the Department given to archaeology during the site investigations that are bound to take place?

Ninthly, I return to the question of accommodation for broadcasters. Any hon. Members who go to No. 1 Bridge street must see that those who work in Parliament as broadcasters do their job in completely unsatisfactory accommodation. No. 1 Bridge street is hot, stuffy and overcrowded. The report refers in various places to accommodation for broadcasters, but the detail is left in limbo. I am not trying to curry favour with broadcasters, but they are an essential part of the working of Parliament. They must be given proper working conditions—conditions that hon. Members are demanding and will continue to demand for constituents who work in factories. The same goes for IRN which has really pokey accommodation at the moment. It would be useful to hear exactly what is to be done. I am not asking for a palace, but for decent healthy conditions for the broadcasters.

Finally, my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) knows exactly what I am asking for, and we are on delicate ground, but will there be a little room set aside for a few instruments that our Prime Minister thinks are very good for other people? Will there perhaps be a polygraph room? Perhaps it could be called the polygraph room in the Cheltenham memorial suite, as that would be a good name for it. Perhaps the cabin could be called the Westland cabin. I make the point that people who ask for facilities for other people had better look at the mote in their own eye. On this occasion I shall leave it at that.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): First, I want to comment on one or two things I have heard during the debate. In his opening remarks, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House quite properly urged us to address ourselves to phase 2 and to the details of the report, but I do not feel that we should debate in isolation the design of particular buildings as that might lead us to overlook the possibility of transferring things from here to that building. If we take that approach, we may well overlook the need to discuss the budget required for the contents of the building, as how we equip the new accommodation for hon. Members is absolutely vital.

The hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) said that he felt that Conservative Members have more difficulty with accommodation and made the observation that the more Members there are, the greater the accommodation problems. I wonder whether he was working up to a justification of what happened in Govan as being an accommodation manoeuvre. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) drew our attention to the fact that longer sessions are held here than anywhere else in the world. I echo the sentiments of my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) that perhaps we legislate too much in this place.

However, my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South did not draw the attention of the House to the fact that we meet for more days in the year and that we have longer days than other parliaments. If we had fewer days and fewer hours perhaps that would reduce the pressure. Dare I suggest that we have the largest legislature in the democratic world. Some would say that if we had fewer Members that might help. Therefore it is not just a matter of buildings evermore.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) quite rightly observed that the prestige of Britain is at stake, but he did not tell us whether his discovery of gentlemen without trousers in the other place was better or worse than the recent discovery of young ladies in the basement, which a Labour Member had the pleasure of knowing something about.

While I freely admit that I have not been here very long, the views of newcomers are quite significant, particularly when the newcomers are full-time Members of Parliament who work here throughout the week and throughout the year. The shock of what I encountered in terms of accommodation is still very fresh in my mind. Unlike hon. Members who have been here for a while, I have not seen things get better, therefore I cannot fall back on thinking that it is not as bad as it was. I am still being asked by my constituents what are my first impressions. When I tell them about the working conditions, either they think that I am joking, or they are shocked to find that the person they elected to represent them is unable to do his job.

I shall mention some of the things that shocked me as a new Member. Perhaps it might help the Sub-Committee when finalising its plans to know the issues which we hope they will attend to. The question of privacy which has already been mentioned is clearly first in my mind. Newcomers cannot have a confidential meeting anywhere except the draughty corner of a corridor, where we hope nobody will overhear. We cannot make telephone calls privately unless we are prepared to leave the office and risk being run down by the traffic to make a 10-minute journey to a telephone booth to call someone back and have a private conversation. Above all else, there is no chance of quiet thought so that we can gather our wits together when we need to come here and speak.

Although our personal conditions are inadequate and the shock that that caused is still clear in my mind, I was more shocked by the conditions under which I had to ask a secretary to work. The working space is not only communal with no privacy, but in most cases it is cramped beyond belief. One has to take one's life in one's hands as one negotiates an office without tripping over cables, and it is impossible to make oneself heard on the telephone because of the clatter of typewriters in the background. On many occasions it is quite impossible for a secretary to make anything remotely like a confidential telephone call on behalf of an hon. Member.

As a newcomer, perhaps because I am in Abbey gardens rather than in the Palace of Westminster, not only am I a long way away, and if I wish to collect papers from the Library it is a 20-minute journey if traffic is bad, but it is easy to be anything up to half a mile away from my staff. The report draws attention to the advent of electronic mail which would make it less important that staff are a long way away. I am still looking for the electronic mail that might help with that problem. I was also shocked that the technological revolution of which we are so proud in Britain seems to have passed Westminster by. It has been said that it took a long time for telephones to get here. With the exception of a fairly rudimentary service offered by the Post Office, the fax revolution has not even entered the portals of this House.

Mrs. Gorman: Unless hon. Members buy their own.

Mr. Wilshire: Exactly. My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay says that we should buy our own, but that clutters up the place with more telephone lines and makes life more difficult for everyone.

Most offices and large groups of people have effective paging systems. That does not seem to have reached us. I mean no disrespect to the Badge Messengers who do a magnificent job, but it would be far simpler to track us down by electronic paging than by walking miles to see whether we are here and can be given a message.

When I first arrived, I was pleased that the allowances were improving, but then I discovered that the allowances were a means of opting out of offering help with equipment. This is not a plea for something as well as allowances, it is almost a plea for equipment instead of allowances. By the time one has bought one's own typewriter and computer and realised that no one else has quite the same equipment, hon. Members we caused a remarkable amount of trouble. It takes me about half an hour to find a stationer's shop to track down a ribbon for my typewriter, because no one else seems to use the same model.

I was also shocked at the lack of recognition of our anti-social hours and unhealthy lifestyle. As a newcomer, I am regularly kept here for very long hours and find that if there is a running Whip it is quite impossible to get away even for a short time. Yet the concessions for trying to maintain family life, and the opportunity to buy necessities are virtually nil. If one is pinned down in this place, having broken one's toothbrush in the morning, and if the Whips do not smile sweetly at one, it is quite difficult to get out and find a shop that sells them.

As has also been mentioned, the lack of exercise facilities is staggering. Apart from the gym, the opportunities for exercise include the ability to exercise one's trigger finger in the rifle range or one's drinking arm in assorted bars. Beyond that, I fear that I am becoming ever less healthy as time goes by.

As others have said, the cynical will take speeches of this sort as a plea for plush surroundings and more perks for Members of Parliament. I do not intend now or in the future to apologise for saying these things. We should not apologise for asking for sensible working conditions. My constituents who learn the truth think that something needs to be done about it. They do not like huddles in the corridor, or me having to telephone them from a telephone booth down the corridor or finding that they cannot make themselves heard on the telephone to my secretary over the clatter. My family do not think it is unreasonable to ask for better working conditions, particularly when there is a running Whip and there is no place to meet them or eat with them because everywhere is overcrowded and overbooked. Similarly, because of the lack of exercise facilities, my doctor would not think it an unreasonable request if he knew how unfit I was becoming.

The vital parts of the report are paragraphs 28 and 29 —"The Next Steps". Paragraph 28 rightly invites us to comment on three principles—keeping up the momentum of development, ensuring that the next phase is comprehensive and, as has been discussed already, the quality of the buildings. Paragraph 29 makes three correct calls for action—doing design work on Palace chambers, doing a study on the uses of Bridge street and looking at the feasibility studies for a subway.

[Mr. Wilshire]

The three principles in paragraph 28 are absolutely fine as far as they go. I suspect that it is the principle of keeping up momentum about which I feel most strongly. Phase 1 is, I hope, nearing completion and phase 2 has simply got to carry on immediately after, without any break. Until phase 2 is complete we shall not reach the key objective of obtaining a single room for every Member who wants one and secretaries' accommodation that is civilised and located near to the Members for whom they work and in which they can hear themselves think.

Even if the scheme is comprehensive, we shall end up with discussions about whether we have too much accommodation and are we overdoing it. Those of us in Abbey gardens and Dean's yard would say that if, mysteriously, there is too much accommodation in phase 2, or phase 3 if there is one, there is plenty of scope for giving up things that are too far away and unsuitable.

I hear what is said about the quality of the building and support the approach that we must do nothing that would upset the Prince of Wales. However, we should not lose sight of the fact that the speed of completion of the project and the cost are relevant. I am not making a plea for quick, cheap and nasty building, but, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said, we should not be too extravagant and should not lose sight of the fact that the speed of completion is an important issue as well as ensuring that the quality of the building is as it should be for such a sensitive site.

The suggestions in paragraph 29 are fine as far as they go. However, they will not result in a single new facility. The calls for action do not include a detailed timetable for the work to start and finish. I hope that when the Sub-Committee considers this further it will extend the calls for action and add details of the new facilities and a strict timetable so that we all know where we are going.

When focusing on the question of action, I should draw attention to the point about the use of Nos. 1 and 2 Bridge street. To a certain extent, we could extend that discussion to the use of Palace chambers as well as the feasibility study there. There are some uses which were identified in the first report of the previous Session but which have not been mentioned this time. I draw my hon. Friend the Minister's attention to that and invite him to comment. There is mention of a book shop but I have not been here long enough to discover whether it is intended that it should carry stationery items so that we can save time and run our offices efficiently. I see no mention of whether the use of Bridge street could include some sort of small shop to supply us with the necessities of life. On both counts, I am not suggesting that we should try to run an in-house facility. I am sure that both those facilities would prove attractive to somebody who may wish to come in and run them for us.

There is one somewhat exotic point I would make about the use of the new accommodation. Perhaps, if there has to be a chess room in the Palace of Westminster we could transfer it to the new accommodation. During the time I have been here I have yet to see the existing chess room in use. In making some inquiries about the chess ladder fixed to the wall, I saw a list of people who I suspect have not been Members of the House for a long time. I saw the name of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) listed and when I asked him about it this morning he expressed considerable surprise that his name should be on a chess ladder because he has never played chess in this place. If the chess room is moved to the new accommodation, it would free a room for something that is a matter of urgency. We should provide additional space so that hon. Members with spouses who wish to eat here on an ad hoc basis without being able to book can have a small amount of space used in much the same way as the Members' Dining Room. That would mean that if there was space one could obtain food and be with one's immediate family. Such accommodation is not available now unless one wants to go to the cafeteria and put one's food on a tray or book a table months in advance in one of the restaurants.

Similarly, in the new accommodation we must find space for exercise opportunities. My preferences, for what they are worth—I am sure that they will not be echoed by all hon. Members—are a swimming pool and squash courts. In case people outside feel that I am advocating the spending of public money on such things, I am sure that there would be private funds available to build a swimming pool and squash courts if the demand was there and they could charge for the use of them. It would not be a free facility but one that could be used within the confines of the Palace when we are kept here for long hours.

My suggestions arise out of paragraph 15 of the report which refers back to the previous report, which contained a much longer list of suggestions. As well as talking about a subway from the new buildings to here, as a user of Abbey gardens, may I put in a plea to minimise the risk of by-elections caused by hon. Members trying to get from Abbey gardens being mown down by traffic. It is fine when there is a Division because the police ensure that we can cross the road. However, on other occasions we take our lives in our hands. The traffic whizzes around and motorcyclists seem to be oblivious to the lanes of traffic.

I stress again that fax machines should be urgently provided and a modern paging system should be introduced. In the previous report the Speaker's Court figured strongly, but this time it seems to have been overlooked. Will the Minister guarantee that the use of that accommodation will be included in phase 2?

In the past few days I have found myself speaking to broadcasters in the rain. The thought has occurred to me that it might be possible to allow journalists to use Westminster Hall for filming and carrying out interviews. I cannot believe that that would either cause security problems or disrupt other activities because, for most of the day, apart from having tourists, Westminster Hall is not used for any purpose. This is a useful opportunity to improve the broadcasting facilities of this place, without spending any money.

I hope that this report is approved rapidly, and that that rapid approval leads to immediate action. I was delighted to hear my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House say earlier that he will provide time soon for the House to give its seal of approval to this report. When action is taken, hon. Members can look forward to being able to do their job properly, constituents can look forward to being treated properly and staff can look forward to having decent conditions in which to work. Family life might stand a chance here, and there will be fewer unhealthy Members of Parliament for our constituents to worry about. Rather than being apologetic for having a long list of conditions that I think should be improved, I think that all my suggestions, and others that have been made this morning, have to be good news for all who work here, for all whom we represent and for the nation at large. Above all else, if our working conditions are civilised, it has to be good news for democracy.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), I am a new Member and I, too, was deeply shocked by what I found when I got here, despite having been told on numerous occasions how bad it would be. I thought that it must be exaggerated and that one could not run the nation's affairs in such a way. When I arrived here, like countless others, I found that I had no desk, no secretary, no typewriter and no telephone and that I had to make these arrangements ad hoc, in such corridors as I came across where telephones were free, and we were all competing. I found that I had to interview constituents in public, and it was to be many weeks before this state of affairs was put right.

When it was put right, I found myself in a room with three other Members of Parliament. By common consent, as our work load increased throughout the year, we agreed that we would also let our research assistants and any additional secretaries whom we thought that we ought to employ share that room. As a result, it is rare that we hear ourselves think, and we never hear ourselves speak. Never a day goes by without one of us being asked by the others in the room to talk more quietly on the telephone. The lines never seem to work properly anyway, and it is extremely difficult to hear.

One of my hon. Friends in that room, to make up the deficiency of secretarial provision, does some of her own typing. That clatter, combined with the noise of many conversations going on at once and much work in progress, makes it extremely difficult to do an efficient job. I daily find that I am not giving my constituents the sort of service that I would wish to give them, and although they are extremely tolerant, I am sure that they do not appreciate the almost impossible conditions in which we have to work.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne, I believe that one of the most essential things that we have to get right is the provision of space and facilities for our support staff, not just for ourselves. We can move to find telephones for private conversations if we have to, we can move to corridors for a bit more space, but we cannot reasonably expect our secretaries to cart their typewriters and heavy equipment around with them. It is essential that they have a stable, good and healthy working environment.

My secretary has to cope with sitting at one small desk with about 8 in of space behind her before she encroaches on to the space of another secretary. On that small desk, by the time that she has fitted in her word processor, her ever-overflowing in-tray and her telephone, there is hardly room for a biro, let alone a pile of work. That is not a satisfactory situation, yet little can be done about it because we are asking so many of our secretaries to put up with such conditions.

I have always thought that, instead of being allocated a desk, we should be allocated X amount of space for our support staff. We should be able to say that we will fill that space as we see fit. Some hon. Members may choose to fill it with electronic equipment, others may choose to fill it with old-fashioned filing cabinets and one desk with one secretary. Other Members, who either make their meagre allowances stretch or who subsidise them from their own salaries—it should be put on the record that many of us have to do that—may wish to employ more than one member of staff and fill that space with two desks. At the moment, that flexibility is not permitted us. We are allowed one desk, it is laid down where we shall have it, often a long way from our offices, and that is where our secretaries are supposed to work.

I think that I heard that in the new building we are to be allowed 50 sq ft of space. The ideal by 1995 is that we should each have our own room and should be allowed, in addition, 50 sq ft for our clerical and secretarial staff. I have not done a square root since I did O-level maths, but I make that an area of approximately 7 ft by 7 ft. If that is the ideal standard towards which we are working, it will not be enough. One would be hard put to squash two desks into that space, or more than the two regulation filing cabinets. It should be added that we have to buy our own filing cabinets if we want more than the two regulation ones. That is not enough space, and if that is our ideal, we cannot be working towards a modern and efficient Parliament and a modern and efficient service for our constituents.

I am a full-time Member of Parliament. I do nothing outside the House, and I try to devote my working day to coping with an extremely large volume of correspondence from constituents in distress, and from constituents with strong views. Apart from the urgent cases, there is nearly always a delay in answering routine stuff, simply because there are not the facilities to do it as quickly and efficiently as I would have wished.

If we are seriously aiming at a secretarial work space of 7 ft by 7 ft, then we are aiming at future inefficiency, inadequacy and a complete mess as, more and more, we become full-time Members but do not have access to office space outside the House and, in general, have to make up facilities in the best way that we can. I would appreciate it if my hon. Friend the Minister would comment on that figure of 50 sq ft, which I think I heard correctly, and tell me what he thinks can be fitted into that miserable area that will help to service Members of Parliament adequately.

I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne said about the need for the facility of a small shop where we can buy necessities. I am sure that my cat would uphold that. I have often tried to buy a tin of cat food, but not being able to get out during the day, and leaving this place at 3 am when all the fish and chip shops are closed, I cannot even buy him a bit of fish. In general, it would be helpful if we had somewhere that we could purchase necessities.

I have another plea. Can we have a uniform database? Can Members of Parliament be told about systems that are consistent with that database, so that we could find for ourselves much of the information that we now ask the Library staff and our research assistants to provide? One of my major problems is that most of my research information comes to me at best second-hand and often third-hand, and I should like to be able to key in and do certain essential research myself. I could do that if we had a proper working system database.

Finally, may I put in a plea, not only for somewhere to buy a toothbrush, a pair of tights or cat food, but for some equality? There is an ever-growing number of ladies in this House and I hope that that number will continue to grow. Why, then, can we not have a unisex barber and hairdresser?

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): You are welcome to him.

Miss Widdecombe: Why can we not have such facilities? Why is it that, when a lady and a gentleman are asked to appear on television, the man always looks extremely smart and neat?

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The men very rarely do.

Mr. Holt: Speak for yourself.

Miss Widdecombe: At least they have the opportunity to do so, whereas the lady, who has gone out in the rain to get to the television studios, arrives looking bedraggled and has no facilities where she can put that right.

I may make that point slightly frivolously, but I do not make frivolously the point about secretarial space: 7 ft by 7 ft is not enough. It is not ideal, and we should not accept it as the standard.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), I am also one of the new Members of Parliament. I am not deeply shocked about the facilities here, but I wonder about the way in which we allocate those facilities.

Much of today's discussion is about the acute need for accommodation for Members of Parliament. When something is provided free at the point of consumption, as our office space is allocated, it does not surprise me that there is a considerable demand, not just from the point of view of Members, but from their staff. There was a time when Members' secretaries were generally accommodated outside this building, but when we start providing office space cheaply, or free, and telephones, it is inevitable that the demand for space within the building, or close to it, will build up. Anything that is free at the point of consumption generates an excessive demand.

I should like the Minister to tell us the average cost of providing accommodation for Members and their secretaries and whether we might consider being allowed to spend that sum of money on accommodation and facilities outside this building. A number of hon. Members would prefer to have office space in other parts of the town, but, because of the temptation of "free" space, we all want to congregate around here. We might not need as much accommodation as we think we need, if we appreciated the cost of that accommodation, if that cost were negotiable and if we could have that money to spend elsewhere on accommodation. That could take the pressure off the apparently insatiable demand for accommodation here.

Part of our problem is that we cannot make up our minds what we are in this place. On the one hand, we are treated like self-employed people, providing our own equipment, such as filing cabinets. On the other hand, we behave as if we were employees of Her Majesty's Government. We now receive our salary on that basis, although that was not so some years ago, when Members were treated as being self-employed from the point of view of salary. The Members at the time did a switch because it enhanced their pension prospects.

We are now neither one thing nor the other. We are not full employees, in which case we might have expected accommodation and facilities to be laid on, yet we are no longer self-employed. Although this matter is outside the scope of the debate, it would be a good idea to sort that out. We would not then be constantly whingeing about whether the Government should provide us with fax machines or bleepers, as if we were hospital doctors doing a ward round.

I am concerned that phase 2 has been given over to the Property Services Agency for its control and decision. That organisation has proved to be far from sensitive in matters of architecture. I think of the hideous structure in Marsham street, the Department of the Environment, and of the new Queen Elizabeth II conference centre, which is also far from delightful, with green fencing boards all around it. It adds nothing to the charm of Parliament square, yet that was also built under the control of the PSA.

Rather than limiting our scope to one set of architects, who are currently nominated by the PSA—the Casson Conder consortium—we should bring in outside architects to give us some ideas on how we might make the best use of the site. When we limit those decisions, we end up with scandals such as the one reported in last night's Evening Standard, under the heading "£50m web of bribery exposed," which said that PSA officers have been involved in allocating contracts to builders because of the limited scope of the way in which they tender for work. I put in a strong plea for the PSA not to have the main control over this development, both in the interests of a more imaginative scheme and in an attempt to reduce the opportunities for corruption.

When I was a Westminster city councillor, the council carried out some developments and was asked to put up certain sums of money for roofs. I have told this story before, but it is worth telling again. Our local officers, in co-operation with the accredited list of contractors, had accepted a price for those roofs of £140,000 each. This took place in my ward, so I took a great interest in it. In the end, the real cost of that work was about half that price, so we made a considerable saving of about a quarter of a million pounds. When such large sums of money are involved, we should get a wide range of estimates. The architects and quantity surveyors involved in the project should be brought in from outside the close, incestuous network normally used by the PSA.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am not sure whether Westminster council is a happy choice for examples of cost-cutting efficiency. After all, it sold its graveyards for 5p and is now trying to purchase them back compulsorily at a cost of £5·5 million. I do not think Westminster council can teach us about cost efficiency. Surely the hon. Lady must realise that the PSA scheme is cheaper than other schemes. Surely she wants a cheaper scheme rather than a more expensive scheme.

Mrs. Gorman: There appear to be two options for this scheme. The first is the Casson Conder scheme and the other is the PSA scheme, so we are limiting ourselves unnecessarily to those two options.

As for Westminster council, I take the hon. Gentleman's point to some extent—that, in considering such matters, bureaucracies often make awful mistakes. In the case of Westminster, the officers concerned have yet to resign. The councillor concerned has done the honourable thing and accepted responsibility.

Mr. Banks: What about the leader?

Mrs. Gorman: I support my colleagues who are calling for an outside agency to handle the catering and the facilities which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone mentioned, are so essential for people who are tied up here all day. A little general store should be laid on. I note that there will be shops in the front of the new building and it is reasonable for whoever leases those shops—it is likely to be the Government, through the PSA —to dictate what those shops shall offer by way of services.

About 4,500 people work in or are associated with this building. During the day, people want to tidy themselves up for an evening meeting or a bit of shopping. It is disgraceful that we do not allow the private sector to provide us with the necessary facilities. I am not sure about the plea for recreation and exercise facilities. There is an enormous shooting gallery underneath the House of Lords. I do not know how many hunting, shooting and fishing people use that facility. I question the propriety of us extending that and calling for our own squash and swimming facilities.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) commented on the facilities in the ICI building and the squash courts there which are available for our use. When I was a Westminster city councillor, I remember that entire building being on offer for £5 million. We could then have taken over that superb ICI Millbank building—with its sports facilities—and it could have been used as accommodation for people working in Parliament. I remember writing to my Member of Parliament, who is still the hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke), suggesting that he refer that building to the PSA, but I got nowhere. The PSA is a little empire which, naturally enough, enjoys its own powers and ability to control a budget of about £2·5 billion, which is an awful lot of money. I am glad to see that the Secretary of State for the Environment is calling for a great deal more of accountability and openness from that organisation.

In calling for more facilities for ourselves, we should consider the costs. I certainly would like to know what it costs per capita to provide our facilities. Do we need to provide them all in-house? Is there a case for Members having a budget and buying the accommodation that they wish—whether a small single office or a share in an office —and thereby creating a market for office facilities for Members? We would not then be restricted to using this area because what is on offer appears, at least at first sight, to be free.

There is, also, the question of the delay involved. There is the slippage, as it is euphemistically known, of the Cannon row site. If the private sector had been doing that work for us, I would hope that we would have had strong penalty clauses which would make the concept of slippage alien. Slippage would result in the company losing profitability, which is a wonderful spur to get the job done on time. I believe that if the private sector had been carrying out such a development, it would have completed it, in, perhaps, six months or a year at the very most. I hope that the Minister will bear that in mind when he considers who will get the work.

When I was a member of Westminster city council, there was an office block, accommodating 500 to 600 people, on the corner of Perkins rents—which is just beyond one of our Government buildings—that we delayed and delayed, mostly for silly political reasons. When we finally allowed it to go ahead, within six months it was occupied.

Delays are inevitably caused by a bureaucratic set-up like the PSA and the lack at present of open competition for the very design and facilities. We need to consider whether we need to keep adding facilities here, as opposed to giving Members the financial options of choosing where they work, which may not be in the confines of this building. I am one of those people who often feel completely claustrophobic when here in the evenings—I cannot wait to get out. A little office nearby that was not part of this building would certainly appeal to me. The shared office in Norman Shaw North, for which I do not pay rent, has a certain attraction. However, if I were able to use that financial allocation more flexibly, I may decide not to be actually attached to this building.

Again, I was a Westminster city councillor in the days of the T. Dan Smith scandals concerning the construction of large municipal developments in the north of England. The Redcliffe Maude report about that pointed out the dangers of the rather incestuous working relationship between local government departments and the councillors, with their ability to grant favours to friends and close associates. We should bear that in mind when we are considering how to allocate the development of the site opposite.

Nobody would deny that that site needs redevelopment. It is hideous; it has been a disgrace and a scar on this historic area for far too long. There are those dirty, scruffy little shops with all their bits stuck out on the pavement and the ghastly, filthy Bridge street building. I do not know why the broadcasting authorities are allowed to occupy so much of that building. Do they pay us rent? Is it properly costed? I do not know why we should worry about providing facilities for them. Why do they not find their own facilities in or around the building?

I believe that we spend too much time—in the way that councils do—in deciding nit-picking details which are not the proper duty of parliamentarians. It reminds me of my time on Westminster city council, when we spent hours and hours deciding what colour to paint the council house doors. In a way, this exercise is similar. A private company would bring in outside experts to give them advice, and tell them to get on with it. It could be given a brief of the facilities required—such as the shops and the means by which we cross the road—and they would get on with it. Anything designed by a committee—I am sure that that includes the Services Committee—is more likely to turn out like a camel than a horse.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I apologise to the House for coming late into the debate, but I have been in my constituency. I should like to make a few observations on the report and, having listened to previous contributions, perhaps make some points of my own about the way in which hon. Members are treated in this place, especially Back-Bench Members. Of course, it is primarily Back-Bench Members who are taking the opportunity of having their views heard this morning. Frankly, I do not believe that this is the best way of finding out the views of Members generally. Friday debates often tend to be characterised by vast acres of empty green Benches and this place takes on the appearance of the legislative equivalent of the Marie Celeste. It would have perhaps been better if we had had a debate which involved more hon. Members. We should, perhaps, have extended the debate on Thursday when we were discussing procedures generally. Having said that, one should not complain that one has the opportunity to stand up and put a few points to the Minister, which will, perhaps, be taken into account.

I welcome the new facilities with which we shall be provided. Who would not? It would be a surly and fairly ridiculous Member of Parliament who was completely content with our present facilities. So many complaints are voiced by Members one to another and one clearly realises that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with our working conditions.

Unfortunately, perhaps, Members of Parliament are not the most popular group in our society. I do not quite know why that is, but it is a fact. There will be some people outside who, if they were to listen to the debate or if it were to be reported, would say, "They are just a bunch of whingers. There they are, going on again about themselves and their resources." I must join with Conservative Members and make it quite clear that this is not just a good occasion to whinge. We are whingeing—if indeed we are—because many of us consider that we are prevented from doing the sort of job that we want to do on behalf of our constituents. That is what it is all about. We do not ask for enhanced facilities in this place because we want to luxuriate in them but because we want to do a better job for our constituents.

I take the points that were made by Conservative Members. Some of the office facilities for hon. Members are so appalling that we would not tolerate them outside this place, and many of us would demand that something be done. As Members of Parliament, it is always easier to demand that something be done for other people than it is to say that something should be done for ourselves. Quite frankly, if we are not capable of delivering decent facilities for ourselves to do a better job, perhaps we are not in a good position to demand them on behalf of other people.

In welcoming the new facilities, I emphasise that the debate is not about our wanting better conditions for ourselves, to wine and dine and thoroughly enjoy ourselves, it is about us being able to do a better job for our constituents.

In a debate some years ago, I referred to the Palace of Westminster as a legislative slum, because, behind Barry and Pugin's neo-gothic splendour of the Palace of Westminster, some appalling conditions exist, and Members' staff and the workers in this place must endure them. For example, one has only to see the conditions downstairs in the basement for those who work in the various restaurants and snack bars to realise just how unacceptable such conditions are for any group of workers. Several improvements have been made, but, quite frankly, because of the antiquated nature of the building, it is almost impossible to raise the standards of the work place to the necessary levels that we would want. From the plans, I note that we shall ensure that those who provide the valuable support services that Members of Parliament need will be given adequate, bearable and good working conditions in the new building.

I referred to this place as a legislative slum. When we give guided tours, many of our visitors are quite surprised at the bare facilities in the Chamber. There is nothing on which to rest papers, and there is no way in which to have an allocated position. There are many touching little customs and traditions in this place. There cannot be one Member of Parliament, wherever he or she stands on the political spectrum, who has not pointed out, sometimes with pride and sometimes with total disbelief, the two red sword lines along the Floor of the Chamber. We point out these things, and we find such traditions amusing, supportive of the system, or whatever else, depending on our political views. But that is not what it is all about. It is about this place being a workplace for us to do a proper job. Quite frankly, we do not have the facilities in this place to do a proper and effective job.

My first place for working here was down in the cloisters. "Cloisters" is a rather fancy word for "corridor". Because we are not subject to Acts of Parliament such as the shops and factories legislation and the various fire regulations, which we insist that others should adhere to, we endure terrible facilities downstairs in the cloisters. If there ever were a fire in the cloisters, we would not face the odd by-election, we would face a mini-general election. If fire officers were rigorously to apply fire safety regulations, they would close the cloisters and, probably, other large sections of the Palace of Westminster.

The hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) mentioned Westminster Hall and asked why we cannot make greater use of it. On many occasions when we have discussed facilities generally, I have asked the Lord President of the Council why we cannot use Westminster Hall more effectively and extensively. It is a wonderful space. Architecturally, it is a glorious space. It is the oldest part of the Palace, and it is an architectural wonder, but, at the same time, it is a terrible waste of space. Westminster Hall was where it all began. Westminster Hall used to be the nerve centre of the Palace of Westminster. It is a great shame that it is badly under-used at the moment. Because of problems elsewhere, some exhibitions are going on downstairs, tucked away in the corner. Amnesty International has an excellent exhibition there at the moment. I hope that all hon. Members will have a chance to visit it. That is only a temporary use of the Hall and we should consider its far more permanent use as an exhibition space. I have said that we ought to put on concerts there or allow dance groups to use it for rehearsals.

When I was chair of the arts committee of the GLC the greatest scandal in the arts in London generally was not just the inadequate funding level but the lack of space in which to exhibit works of art by our young artists and sculptors and space for dance groups and emerging musicians to use. Some Conservative Members—not necessarily Conservative Members who are here for this debate—have said that that is not a fitting and proper use for Westminster Hall.

The previous Leader of the House said that one of Westminster Hall's greatest attractions was that it was so large and empty. That is an elitist point of view and is not acceptable, given the great lack of space in the capital city for the arts functions for which I would like to see Westminster Hall used. Anyone who has read Pepys's diaries will know that Westminster Hall was a thriving centre of activity and that all sorts of things went on there in earlier centuries. We should try to restore some of the vibrant life that used to exist there and get it back there in the 20th and 21st centuries.

Another point that I would like to make while I have this somewhat unexpected opportunity to speak in the House is that I entirely support Conservative Members who talk about the inadequate resources that they are given for secretarial and research facilities. I am not whingeing but I find that hon. Members who tend to complain about inadequate resources are usually those who are doing the hardest work. That tends to unite the House. Many hardworking hon. Members in all parts of the House rightfully complain about the inadequate funds for research and secretarial assistance.

One does not want vast retinues of secretaries and researchers, but one wants an adequate level. It is anachronistic that, in terms of research and secretarial resources, all hon. Members are treated in exactly the same way whatever the work load. I come from a very deprived area of London, but I know that some Conservative Members have similar problems in their constituencies. We have enormous problems. In a place such as Newham I am almost loth to encourage people to come to me. So many people find their way there anyway that I do not have to encourage them, but I should like to be able to do far more to get people to come to me, write to me or visit me in my constituency office. I find it necessary to keep a full-time office in my constituency because that is where my problems are. I am loth to go out of my way to encourage people because I do not have the resources and facilities to deal with the additional problems that would surface.

I feel some resentment from time to time because I know that I am being given exactly the same resources as a Conservative Member in a leafy rural constituency whose only weekly problem is perhaps to decide what fete or sale of works of art to open at the weekend. I have to deal with problems that come in by the sackload. It is silly to think that all Members have an equal work load when we know that that is not the case. I do not quite know how one would go about it, but somehow the facilities and the resources that Members are given should in some way be linked to the work load that they have to bear. That seems perfectly reasonable. We would consider it totally reasonable outside the House. Why do we not accept in the House so many of the things that are considered reasonable and which we impose on or suggest for people outside? It is nonsensical that we should treat ourselves differently, especially when that operates to our disadvantage in terms of the resources we can provide for ourselves to enable us to carry out our job. The best way to make Members one of the better liked groups in our society rather than one of the least liked is to ensure that we are seen to be doing more of a job more efficiently on behalf of our constituents.

There is another issue that I wish to raise on the role of Members of this place, if only for the reason that I was unsuccessful in catching the eye of the occupant of the Chair during a recent procedure debate. The House is a place that penalises the hard worker in two ways, one of which I have referred to already. It penalises the hard worker in the Chamber in our proceedings. It is fairly easy to catch Mr. Speaker's eye on a Friday morning when everyone else has cleared off. That is all right for those of us who are prepared to attend on a Friday, but it is not merely a matter of making speeches. The idea is to make a contribution that has some influence and will have some effect on the deliberations of the House.

I find it frustrating when I want to speak in a debate —I hasten to say that I am not whingeing, because I am called fairly regularly—and I am told by your good self, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or by Mr. Speaker, that there is a long list of hon. Members who wish to participate in the debate and that I have already spoken on several occasions in other debates. I know that Mr. Speaker keeps a fairly close tally of the number of times that Members speak. Then I am told that Mr. So and So or Ms. So and So has not spoken so far in the Session—it may be that we are nearly at the end of it—and that preference must be given to him or her. It is a funny old workplace where the person who turns up regularly is told, "I am sorry but you will be penalised for attending regularly", whereas the person who turns up intermittently has the fatted calf killed for him. It would be a strange workplace where the regular worker who turned up to clock on was told that there was something wrong with him, while a colleague who had not turned up for weeks was given free bacon sandwiches by the gaffer. I find that a strange way of treating hon. Members.

Those who do not turn up regularly in this place should not be rewarded by being able easily to catch Mr. Speaker's eye. Surely they should be penalised. Someone should say to them—perhaps the Whips—"If you don't turn up here more often, don't expect to get in on debates very easily. You will have to give way to those who have spoken on more occasions than you because they are doing a more regular job, if not a better one. We reward regular attendance."

Mrs. Gorman: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that he is retelling the tale of the Prodigal Son? He is complaining that he is undervalued, although he is always doing his bit, when the black sheep who comes back occasionally is rewarded. There is more joy in Heaven over one sinner who repents—it is something like that—than over all those who slog away at the workplace all the time. That is life.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Lady has mixed up a number of biblical analogies. I have always felt sorry for the brother of the Prodigal Son. We have one or two prodigal sons and one or two prodigal daughters in this place, and I would not alter any of my remarks about the way in which they are treated. If they cannot be bothered to come here, or if they can find other things to do, they should not expect preferential treatment when they do attend. Unfortunately, they do enjoy preferential treatment.

In addition—I must throw this in—there is the nonsensical notion that Privy Councillors should be given precedence during a debate. That has not been the practice during this debate but it applied during the recent procedure debate to which I have referred. We see phoenixes rising from the ashes of their political careers to give us the benefit of their experience. They then disappear until they choose in a few weeks' time to participate in another big debate. I find that unacceptable.

Mr. Wilshire: I hope that I do not seem phoenix-like in asking the hon. Gentleman to reflect, before his enthusiasm for giving priority to those who attend regularly runs away with him. The logical extension of his argument that those who are here more often should be called to speak more often is that those who say more should be rewarded more. I sincerely hope that he is not advocating that those who speak most should receive further preference.

Mr. Banks: Of course I did not mean that. If hon. Members were paid by the word, I suspect that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) would be a millionaire by now. There are many hon. Members who manage to say very little in a great deal of time. I do not want to fall foul of that myself. I welcome the new proposals and I hope that the arguments and discussions about who will carry them out and how fast that can be done will be cleared away quickly and that we can go into the new facilities and be better able to do our jobs as Members of Parliament—of whatever party—who are trying to represent our constituencies.

The Property Services Agency and the Minister have lost an excellent opportunity by not considering the use of county hall, on the other side of the river, to provide facilities for Members of Parliament. I know that the Government want to turn county hall into a hotel. A previous Secretary of State for the Environment said that he would like county hall to be taken down brick by brick because it represented something odious to the Government. We all remember the battles that were fought in the Chamber—which will continue to be fought —over the Government's abolition of the Greater London council. Since city-wide Government has not yet been restored to the capital—which the next Labour Government will do, or perhaps even a future Conservative Government, when the present Prime Minister has retired to Dulwich or wherever else she has managed to get a free house—county hall could be used for public offices. In the meantime, it stands empty, waiting for its future inappropriate use as a hotel—which will involve great difficulties. The Government could decide to use the facilities at county hall for Members of Parliament. If Members of Parliament were able to use the excellent facilities there, that would satisfy many of the points that I have raised about the lack of resources and facilities here. When the Minister makes his winding-up speech, I hope that he will tell us whether consideration has been, or will be, given to the use of county hall as offices for Members of Parliament or as public offices for others in this area of London. I know that he is involved in discussions on the future use of county hall.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I apologise for not having been here at the commencement of the debate. I did not think that I would be called to speak on this subject at all, but I wanted to throw in my pennyworth. I enjoyed hearing the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)—as I always do. He and I are two of the most assiduous hon. Members and we could name the dozen or so hon. Members who attend regularly. I sympathise with many of his remarks. However, it is far worse to be a Government Back Bencher than an Opposition Back Bencher in that an Opposition Back Bencher has much more freedom to speak than we do. We are restricted to four speeches a year, except on a Friday. If one represents a north-eastern constituency, as I do, one is in the north-east most weekends so one is rarely here on a Friday. Our opportunity to speak is therefore restricted. That is not about what we are supposed to be debating today—which is accommodation.

I wonder how many hon. Members have considered the matter in relation to the changing role of Members of Parliament—which is important. Members of Parliament today are very different from those of 20, 50 or 100 years ago because most of them are full-time working Members of Parliament who do not have outside activities and who are constrained to working here.

Unlike most places outside, we debate our salaries, conditions and working environment. I wonder why we were pitched at the third tier of a civil servant's salary? Perhaps they wanted to ensure that we were not pitched at a higher level for office accommodation and back-up facilities. Civil servants would not work in these conditions. Sir Humphrey would find a way of buying the Dorchester and putting his staff in there.

I should tell my new hon. Friends that I entered the House of Commons at the age of 52—a geriatric by modern standards. Before then I worked as a personnel manager in industry. I spent 25 years interviewing people and trying to put them into the right jobs. They had to decide whether to accept the terms and conditions of employment. If some of the senior people whom I have engaged were expected to work in the conditions in which Members of Parliament must work, British industry would have lost many of them. They would not tolerate working in such conditions. For one thing, it is impossible to think properly when one has to share an office with three other people, the telephone is ringing constantly and there are many other interruptions.

Some people say that we can do our thinking in the Library, but it is pretty well occupied end to end. A casual visitor to the Library who simply wants to write a letter has great difficulty finding a desk that is not already occupied. It is hard to find somewhere in the building where one can sit down quietly and read an important report so that one can take it in.

When I first entered Parliament I had an office in Norman Shaw building. For a short time—it was only two days before I took action—I had to share an office with my hon. Friend the present Under-Secretary of State for Health. I assure hon. Members that that was no joy. I now enjoy shared facilities with a very compatible friend.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): In which Department is this new friend of the hon. Gentleman's?

We have an excellent Library with a first-class staff, but it must be the only Library in the United Kingdom that allows its patrons to smoke.

Mr. Holt: I smoke a cigar occasionally, so I shall not go down that path. The hon. Gentleman believes that our Library is good, but he should visit the library of the American Congress to see how it works. Its facilities are mind-boggling, To understand the difference is like trying to understand walking on the moon.

Mr. Wilshire: I, too, have visited the library of Congress. I wonder whether my hon. Friend had the opportunity to ask the United States service to provide information on a subject, in the way that we ask our Library to provide information? I was able to compare the information provided here, with our rudimentary facilities, with that provided through the magnificent facilities of Congress. It is a tribute to our staff that the information that I obtained here was almost as good as the information that I obtained there.

Mr. Holt: That is a compliment to the staff, not to the facilities. Our facilities are inadequate and I would argue that with anyone. Too many people are trying to use too small a facility. As our jobs grow and we perform more and more full-time work as Members of Parliament and require back-up facilities, we need research assistants to help us. I defy anyone to know everything about everything all the time.

Recently, I got into trouble because I did not know at the drop of a hat what a Macmillan nurse was. I am sorry, that information had not registered with me. There are all sorts of things that we would like to know about the nurses' dispute. We need research assistants to examine those matters for us. I have been here for only five and a half years. I must wait another 14½ years before my research assistant will be allowed to use the Library. I do not even have a desk for my secretary and I have been here five and a half years. My secretary must use my desk, which I can use only after 7 pm when she has gone home if I want to write personal correspondence to my constituents.

I am used to industry and commerce, but I could not work in an environment if my office was in one building and my secretary was elsewhere, for instance in Norman Shaw. It is very stupid to ask Members of Parliament to work in such conditions.

Although I have not read the report properly, it seems that we will continue to have pigeon holes. The system will be no better for our successors. I remember the arguments from the former right hon. Member for South Down, Mr. Enoch Powell. He did not want a secretary, an office or a desk. He believed that we should all be in the Chamber participating in debates, creating legislation and orating. That is how it used to be; it is not how it is now. We must rationalise and work in modern circumstances.

I have a small personal point to make with reference to a comment made by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West. I need to have a drink when I speak because I am a diabetic. I have special permission from Mr. Speaker to bring a drink into the Chamber and I can poke it under here and have a drink if I want one. However, I should not have a drink in the Chamber.

Mr. Tony Banks: I thought that I would give the hon. Gentleman a chance to have a sip of his water. I did not realise that one needed Mr. Speaker's permission to bring a drink into the Chamber. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is correct in that. I assure him that secreted away under here I have a small hip flask and I once brought a carton of orange juice into the Chamber. I tucked it away down here and looked down from my papers and had a quick suck—of the the orange juice of course.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful for that moment's break. I do not want to enter into a huge argument with the hon. Gentleman, but I believe that we are not allowed to eat or drink in the Chamber. I remember walking into the Chamber one day with a drink and I was stopped by the gentleman outside whose job it is to ensure that the rules are maintained. As a consequence I asked for permission, although I will not pursue whether I needed to do that. My point is that we do not have the facilities for a drink. The Front-Bench speakers may get dry mouths and can have a drink. The Back Benchers cannot. Water is provided, but that is not cooled and probably has stood for three days. Nevertheless, there is water for the Front Benches.

The office conditions for our staff are even worse than ours. The conditions would not be acceptable to the inspectorates in industry and commerce let alone to the would-be employee. However, our secretaries must work in the most appalling conditions. Before I became a Member of this House I had a secretary working for me in industry and commerce. She thought that it would be marvellous to come and work with me here after I was elected as a Member of Parliament. Alas, she is no longer with me. She could not tolerate the working conditions. She put up with them for four years in the hope that some day they would be better, but she did not see the day coming before her retirement and she is only a young lady. She chose to work for a major institution in the City, where the conditions she now enjoys are similar to those she had when she worked for me in industry and commerce. I am sure that these conditions stop many potentially high-flying people from working for us as secretaries. We need good secretaries. Any Member of Parliament without a secretary, except for Mr. Enoch Powell, who says that he can cope without a secretary to assist him with his diary and all our other tasks, is not doing the job properly.

With our allowance we can buy either a new typewriter, which our secretary requires because—with the number of letters that she has bashed out, she has worn out last year's model—or we can buy something electronic, such as a computer or fax machine——

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): And be taxed on it.

Mr. Holt: Yes, indeed—or have a research assistant. We can pay peanuts invariably to some aspiring young politician to work himself silly in the hope that one day he may have these inadequate facilities as a Member of Parliament. We should have better facilities for research assistants. I do not have one, but if I did I would have to ask him or her to share the shoe box upstairs with my colleague, my secretary and myself. There is nowhere for research assistants to go all day, every day to work, unless they work for a Member who has been here for a long time, and are consequently given a special pass.

While we are involved in a bit of a bitching session, perhaps I may put in a word about the lifts. I hesitate to mention this, but they are so jinxed and so often out of order. Two days ago I was in a lift with the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) and his guide dog and we pressed for the first and second floors. It did not stop at the first floor—it has a mind of its own and is never adequately repaired—but went straight to the second floor where I was getting out. The hon. Gentleman was in a difficult position because we did not want to risk him being caught in the lift, so I moved him into the next door lift which has double sliding doors which are not easy for a sighted Member, let alone a non-sighted Member. Why do we have such inadequate lifts after all these years? Has somebody only recently invented the lift or is it considered that it is all right for us to walk up and down three flights of stairs every time we come in and out of the building? We must have this looked into seriously.

Throughout the long summer recess the lift was out of action for maintenance. Perhaps the Property Services Agency was working on it. I do not know. But as a member of the Select Committee on the Environment I have examined the workings of the PSA, particularly in relation to the new gaol building programme, and I know that nothing coming from the PSA will surprise me. It is amazing that estimates for building prisons can be 85 per cent. below the final cost. That led to repairs and rectification work. The original distance between the upright bars on stairs was found not to be correct; if people had walked up and down the stairs they could have slipped through them. Additional bars have had to be inserted, at enormous cost to the ratepayer. It has put back the programme and has led to prison overcrowding and all the other problems that we could do without. The thought of the PSA's inadequate prison building programme makes me shudder when I think that it may be given the responsibility to provide our facilities. Two things could happen. First, the facilities that the PSA provides will not be right. Secondly, they will cost twice as much.

I do not want Parliament to become a place where Members can do their weekend shopping. I sympathise with my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) and her cats, but this is a legislative building. If one visits legislative buildings in other parts of the world, one finds that they have marvellous facilities for all sorts of things, but I have not yet observed that they sell cat meat. That would be a retrograde step.

Miss Widdecombe: My point about cats was partially, but not wholly, frivolous. Those of us who are both full-time Members of Parliament and single and who work in this place from 9 o'clock in the morning right through until 3 o'clock the next morning occasionally need to buy a few unusual goods, largely because we have been too busy to do our normal shopping. Is it unreasonable to ask that personal necessities should be sold in one small area when posh Parker pens and souvenirs are already being sold in another area?

Mr. Holt: I have to disagree with my hon. Friend. We are responsible for so organising our lives that we have time to do our shopping. For instance, I had to go to hospital this week——

Mrs. Gorman: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Holt: No, I do not intend to give way. I am still answering the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone. I had to spend three or four hours at that hospital. I could not say, "Look, I am such a busy, important person that I have to be in the House of Commons from 9 o'clock in the morning until 3 o'clock the next morning. Therefore you will have to open the hospital on a Sunday so that I can have my X-ray then." It does not work like that. We have to achieve a balance. We do not do the same thing all day, every day. If we intend to make a speech on a particular subject, we probably spend two or three days on research; we think about and work in advance on what we intend to say. We know that we shall be unable to go shopping. But that does not happen all the time, and we make arrangements to go shopping within normal constraints.

I do not believe that this building is the right place to go shopping. Where would it end? There would be a greengrocer's shop here, and every other kind of shop. That would be completely wrong.

I do not accept that hon. Members have no leisure time. I am a full-time Member of Parliament, but I have plenty of leisure time. I am going to the theatre tonight. If I so wanted, I could do my shopping tonight. That does not make me a bad Member of Parliament. It makes me a balanced Member of Parliament. An unbalanced Member of Parliament is one who spends his or her time from 9 o'clock in the morning until 3 o'clock the next morning working and working and never having a change.

Mrs. Gorman: Is not my hon. Friend a married man? My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) made a valid point about women Members of Parliament. We are responsible for remembering that the toothpaste has run out. I am sure that many of our male colleagues have wives to do the shopping for them. The whole point about shops, though, is that it is expected that shops will be provided at the bottom of the new building. The question is what those shops should provide. My proposal was that when leases are allocated a variety of facilities should be borne in mind. They should include a general store, a chemist's shop and other facilities that women Members of Parliament in particular would like and would find most useful.

Mr. Holt: I take my hon. Friend's point, but I hope that she takes it to heart, as queen of the market forces, that if market forces dictate that every one of the shops sells cheap junky souvenirs, that is what will happen. She cannot have her cake and eat it. She cannot suggest a planned economy, saying what should be in the shops, and then say that she believes in market forces for office rents. I do not accept that duplicity.

We are here today to express our personal views about our accommodation. I do not believe that we want to get involved with shops. I believe that we want better facilities for ourselves and for our secretaries, research assistants and other staff. We cannot concern ourselves about whether a person is married, single, male or female. In this non-sexist age, we must concern ourselves with Members of Parliament.

Mr. Tony Banks: I must say that I enjoyed the hon. Gentleman's put-down of his hon. Friend, although I have some sympathy with the point that she raised. However, as was said earlier, shops are not meant to cater only for the needs of Members of Parliament but for the thousands of people who will work in the new facilities. Quite frankly, if we are talking about market forces, Mr. Enoch Powell always detested the souvenir stand downstairs, but it actually makes quite a lot of money. Therefore, it would be possible to square the circle and solve the problems that exist on the Conservative Benches. If there were adequate facilities within this building or the new building for people to buy groceries and other things, those facilities would also make money and Conservative Members would be satisfied and would not be falling out with each other.

Mr. Holt: I hope that we are not falling out with each other.

I do not have a public school background, therefore I did not have the pseudo-advantages of learning of some of the things that go with a public school background, but I know that this establishment is run as an extension of a public school. We have our juniors, our seniors, the prefects and the remove. We have some quaint and ancient traditions and I would not wish too many of them to be done away with. But I wonder why, in this modern day and age, we have the anachronism referred to by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West of catching Mr. Speaker's eye and why we have to stand up and sit down like recalcitrant school children in order to do so. Why do we not have the facility of putting our hands up?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We debated procedure on Wednesday evening. We are now talking not about parliamentary procedure but about the new building.

Mr. Tony Banks: Fortunately, I got away with it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That just goes to show that I ought to have been in the Chair earlier.

Mr. Holt: It just shows my luck as usual. Perhaps while we are talking not about what happens here but only about what happens in the new facilities, I can ask whether we are to contemplate installing the facility of listening to the debate taking place in the Chamber? Are we to have closed-circuit television to enable us to do so? Why do we not consider the electronic advantages that would flow from the new building into this building so that we would not have to stand up and sit down like recalcitrant school children, but prearrange with Mr. Speaker that we would be speaking between 7 pm and 9 pm, instead of having to do what we do now and sit here from 3.30 pm until perhaps 8 pm or 9 pm waiting for a six or seven minute slice of time? That is totally wrong. It is part and parcel of the frustration. If we had decent offices with decent facilities and modern communication, we would all be much happier.

We know that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have not heard the debate up to now, and that is not your fault, but almost everyone who has spoken has spoken in a bitching manner. No one has been enthusiastic about the situation as it is or as it will be.

I hope that when my hon. Friend the Minister winds up the debate he will not talk of next week or next year. I hope that he will realise that Westmister Hall has been around a long time and that, whatever decision we ultimately take, it will be around for a long time.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On behalf of the Opposition I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) and the Committee on their work. I am glad that the Leader of the House has been able to rejoin us because I may want to call on him. I am waiting for further information. We welcomed his initial contribution to the debate. I also echo the tribute paid to the late John Silkin for the work he did while Chairman. There are few people who could be more suitably described as "House of Commons men" than John.

This morning we have inevitably had to talk about our own experiences and some of the discussion may, from the outside, seem somewhat trivial. However, we are talking of working conditions not just for ourselves but many others. About 4,000 people other than Members of Parliament work here. Therefore, when we describe the conditions that affect us, we are describing the better end of the conditions because those who work for us, often including the civil servants working within the building, have even fewer adequate facilities. However, that should not blur the fact that we are dealing with a historic and highly prestigious site and what we put on that site will be part of our heritage.

We are here to consider and approve—I am sure that we shall do so—something much more modest than that because we are asked only to endorse some calls for action and no one is suggesting that we should not. The suggestions are that we should carry out preliminary design work, undertake a study and carry out a feasibility report. No one finds that exceptionable and we would probably all endorse the comment of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore who was astonished to discover that, although he understood that the work was to go ahead on an anticipatory basis five months ago, up to now, very little, if anything, has happened.

As has been suggested, the conditions here are appallingly inadequate. My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore mentioned each member of staff having 60 sq ft. Conditions will get worse as Members need to employ more staff and more equipment is used.

It is interesting that conditions are so bad that our work force is exempt from the protection of employment conditions that we have enacted for everyone else. Therefore, they work for us at a legal as well as physical disadvantage. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) gave us the benefit of his experience in industry. He said that he has been here five and a half years and does not even have a desk for his secretary.

After I had been here for six years I did not have a desk for myself. I came in 1964 and in 1967 I became a Minister. That was the first time I had any territorial claim on the Palace of Westminster. However, the accommodation was not for me but went with the office. When the great British electorate made an ill-considered decision in 1970 I found my total claim on the House of Commons had been contracted to a pile of cardboard boxes tied up with string with "A. Williams" written on the side and "To be collected" in small print underneath. The trouble was that there was nowhere to take those boxes. I had to do what one or two other hon. Members had done. I explored the building and I found a corridor above the Aye Lobby, so in 1970, I bundled up those papers and walked up to the corridor. There were some tables there and I just put my papers on them.

I began to get courteous notes from the then Serjeant at Arms, or one of his deputies, asking if I would be kind enough to move the papers so that someone could dust around them, and I equally politely said that the moment that I was provided with somewhere to put the papers, I would gladly move them. Two years later, the war of attrition paid off, so by 1972, although I did not get an official desk, I was allowed to continue squatting and the Serjeant at Arms' office said that it would even give me a filing cabinet. Eventually, those two corridors had to be pressed into use. It was not until 1974, 10 years after I entered the House, when I again became a Minister, that I had a desk that belonged to me in the House of Commons.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore paid tribute to Mary Frampton. Some of us signed an early-day motion because we did not want her to feel that her departure was unrecorded by the House. I understand that she, whom I have to thank for that first filing cabinet—the endorsement, the rubber-stamping of my squatting in the Palace of Westminster—is to grow shrubs. I would love to be a fly on the wall as she is talking to those shrubs. I suspect that she will have the tidiest shrubbery in the United Kingdom.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore is too solicitous for the well-being of the Leader of the House. Much as we all love and respect the right hon. Gentleman, my hon. Friend should not be deceived by the little slum along the corridor. That is for presentation purposes only. He does not want us to think that our landlord is living in better conditions than we are. I would gladly swap with him if, in addition to the meagre office that he has here —it is twice or three times the size of those that we have —I also had the rather decorative little cubbyholes on Whitehall to which he is able to retreat. Sympathy by all means, but let us make sure that it goes where it belongs, which is here with most hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) put forward a proposition, which I do not think she meant frivolously, that it might make more sense to give people money to rent their own accommodation, rather than providing it here. I understand the doctrinal element behind this suggestion, but there is a practical point. The real difficulty in this place, and one of the constraints that faces everyone in planning for accommodation, is that whoever has accommodation has to have accommodation that is available at all hours of day and night and that is within a sufficiently short distance for hon. Members to be able to get from there to the House within the time allowed for a Division. The longer we extend that time, the longer we extend the sittings of the House of Commons.

A private market solution might make sense if we were working normal office hours and could persuade the Chief Whips on both sides to be courteous enough to ensure that there were no Divisions during those times. However, as their only delight and pleasure in life seems to be a sadistic joy in calling Divisions at the most inconvenient time for Members, I can only conclude that the hon. Member would be playing into their hands if she were successful in the campaign that she has mounted this morning.

Mrs. Gorman: Would it not be nice to be treated as a grown-up and given the option of either taking facilities here or being allowed to choose facilities? At the moment, rooms are allocated in a primitive way—that is, on a pecking order basis of a lovely room if one is a Minister, and nothing much if one is not.

Mr. Williams: When there is so little accommodation, there has to be some sort of order. My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore can tell us how difficult it is to determine who should have what. We have all been, as we see it, the victims of inadequate resources here. That is another possibility and I suggest that the hon. Lady takes it up with the Lord President of the Council.

I used to have an office in Norman Shaw, but I left it because I found that it was hopeless for me. By the time I got over here for a meeting, with another meeting in an hour's time, I would have to decide whether I went back to my room or stayed here. We find ourselves picking up a newspaper, or, if we are unusually diligent, wandering into the Library. We may sustain ourselves with a cup of coffee, but we waste a great deal of time. If that option is adopted, surely hon. Members will say that, in addition to having accommodation outside the House, they still need somewhere where they can rest their briefcases within Division bell distance. We would end up with hon. Members wanting the best of both worlds. They would want the money for outside accommodation and, at the same time, a base available to them in the Commons.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has designs on Westminster Hall.

Mr. Tony Banks: It would make a very nice office.

Mr. Williams: My hon. Friend put forward some colourful and interesting propositions for its use. However, once again, the great problem that we have all had to face over the years is the overriding problem of security. We could reconcile some of his wishes with some of those of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). Hon. Members who have had to show parties around the building have been apologetic and ashamed because they have had to keep groups of pensioners or young children waiting in pouring rain to go through the security screen when there is all that empty space where we could have a bank of security screens and people could wait under shelter.

I put it to the Lord President that the way in which we treat our constituents who come here to see Parliament is a public scandal. We treat them as if they were privileged to come and look when, in fact, we are privileged to be here. They are entitled to come and look and we should make the facilities available for them to do so. We want people to show an interest in Parliament. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will consider that matter seriously and discuss it with those of his colleagues responsible for such decisions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West floated the idea of a constituency means test, which he admitted would be rather difficult to adjudicate. I regard that as an even more impossible task than allocating rooms in the House in any sane way and I suspect that we shall be unable to make progress on that proposition.

Mr. Tony Banks: It would not be a question of giving Members of Parliament tranches of money because that would be too difficult. Members would have staff allocated to them through the Fees Office and would take those members of staff only if they felt it was necessary to do so. That would be a way of dealing with the problem. A Member could say to the Fees Office, "I think I can justify four members of staff working for me." No doubt there would be some empire-building by some hon. Members, but those Members who do not want large numbers of staff would not abuse the system.

Mr. Williams: Obviously, local government has a far greater ratio of saints than does central Government. I am touched that the faith built up by my hon. Friend during his period working on the GLC leads him to think that our colleagues would behave in so judicious and forthright a manner.

My hon. Friend also said that some Members are not as effective as others because they do not make as many speeches. I regret the fact that some hon. Members make even the few speeches that they do make, but I do not think that my hon. Friend would agree that the sole measure by which we should judge the contributions of hon. Members to the House of Commons is the number of speeches that they make here. My hon. Friend makes many speeches, but we are not all able to sustain the quality of contribution that he is. We would therefore be setting a false criterion by which our constituents would judge us if we were to take up his suggestion. His ideas about the use of county hall are well worth while and are worth investigating further. Perhaps the Minister will comment on that.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West, I am disappointed that every time we discuss, consider or have a report on progress, there appears to be further slippage to report. I suspect—though I hope not —that today we shall hear about a further retreat of our timetable. We have a unique opportunity to contribute to the smooth running of future Parliaments. We owe it to them to give consideration to all aspects.

The catering facilities have also been mentioned, and all of us are daily aware of the difficulties experienced by the catering staff in meeting the enormous demands of the House of Commons. I hope that when new facilities are envisaged across the way that they will be available to everyone who works here. We need adequate resources for hon. Members, but I hope that the resources in the new building will also be available to those who work in the House, as certain parts of our cafeteria and self catering area are at present.

I noticed in the report—or it may have been evidence given to the Committee on behalf of the Catering and Refreshment Department—mention of the possibility of private dining facilities. I hope that we will regard that as low priority until we have ensured that the real and legitimate needs of all those who work in the House are served. We should not just consider our needs, as we are a small fraction. The catering requirements within this building are enormous and until those are fully met we should not be giving much priority to the provision for outside or private dining groups, even if they are lucrative.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow referred to exercise facilities. The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) was a little disdainful about that in her comments. Having been here only a short time, she is lucky that she has not suffered the ravages which the sedentary existence in this place imposes upon most of us. My hon. Friend made a realistic point. I am not suggesting that there should be lavish facilities. I believe that they should be health-based facilities. As the Leader of the House will confirm, most of us are in this building between 9 am and 10 am and are still trapped here most evenings until some time after 10 pm. Even where there is the will, it is virtually impossible to find the opportunity to keep oneself in sensible physical trim. It is not an exotic demand by Members of Parliament, but a sensible one. I am sure that I shall make a great many enemies, in saying that those facilities should be considered, even if it means that those who like shooting have to give way to those who like surviving.

Several hon. Members have gone out of their way to pay tribute to the House of Commons Library. We must differentiate between the activities of our Library and the normal library service. We have a wonderful back-up service. In fact, the Library is the source of rapid information for a large number of hon. Members on a large number of subjects. By the nature of our business, it is often only in the morning, or even during the lunch hour, that one discovers that there will be a statement that very afternoon, and then information is needed in a great hurry. We put enormous demands on the Library. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow mentioned that some consideration should be given to the need to sustain the instant contact and instant availability that we value so much.

The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) referred to the lifts in the House. I share the lift service that he mentioned. I have a low-cost option to offer the Minister. Perhaps the Lord President of the Council would like the term "express" to be checked under the trades descriptions legislation, and conformity required. As that is unlikely, perhaps we could have a coffee-vending machine in the lift, so that we can at least have a cup while we are on our way between the principal floor and our rooms.

Mr. Holt: The right hon. Gentleman need not worry about cost. If he were to sell the lift to the British Museum, he would make more money than the cost of replacement.

Mr. Alan Williams: A serious point that must be contemplated is that we are dependent on recruiting many young people to do secretarial and research work here. As Ministers and industry constantly warn us, there will be a shortage of young people in the 1990s. It will become more necessary for young women to be encouraged to go back to work perhaps earlier than they tend to return at the moment.

Some hon. Members have not been terribly sympathetic to the requirement for creche facilities within the Palace of Westminster. I suspect that, whether we want to or not, in the 1990s we shall compete with high-paying employers for a more limited range of people with much-desired specialities. Circumstances will force us to make greater facilities available.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow asked for an assurance that resources will be available for the completion of the work. It is to be done stage by stage. I can understand that. I can appreciate the difficulty in which Ministers find themselves. They do not want to buy a pig in a poke; they want to know exactly what they are paying for. However, there is also the reverse side of the coin. It is difficult to stage the provision of resources. When planning stage 1, one cannot be sure that stages 2 or 3 will definitely be financed in the envisaged form. Clearly, any doubt about subsequent stages may alter the priorities that the planners and the Committee would require.

There have been numerous comments about the ever-expanding need for space within the Palace of Westminster. I have bad news for the Minister. In yesterday's newspaper, I saw an item labelled:

> "MPs pay £300 to look good on TV".

It went on to state that 40 image-conscious MPs were to get advice on hairstyle, clothes and colour co-ordination as part of a training course.

The Committee has not taken that point into account. There now appears to be a need for make-up rooms, changing rooms, and so on. I notice that my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) is of a different persuasion on the need for such training. He said:

> "If any MPs pay out for that, they need their heads seeing to."

We see how rapidly the need for facilities expands. Not only do we want facilities for make-up but we shall need consulting facilities as well.

[Mr. Alan Williams]

We are not planning just for ourselves. I have said that before, and I emphasise it. There is a tendency for us to think purely in terms of our personal needs as Members of Parliament. We are planning for the needs of all those who work here, including those who do not work directly for us. We say that we want accommodation for secretaries and researchers, but we should remember that thousands of people who are not directly employed by Members of either House will be affected by our decisions.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) spotted the reference to space for broadcasters and asked if the Leader of the House could say how the broadcasting centre links to the work of the Comittee that the Leader of the House chairs and on which my right hon. Friend sits. It is the Select Committee on Televising of Proceedings of the House. My right hon. Friend would like to know whether there is overlap and due consultation between the two groups. Now that the Leader of the House is aware of the matter, I am sure that he will correspond with my right hon. Friend.

Despite the inevitability that, to some extent, we have become lost in detail and in the narration of our own horrific experiences about trying to accommodate our work needs to the absolutely inadequate resources available here, we must still bear in mind the long-term feature of what we are discussing. Even if the proposal goes ahead there will still be a shortage of space for current demand, let alone projected demand. That which we build in the next decade will be for use in the next century and beyond. We will make the decisions but we must remember that many current hon. Members may not enjoy the facilities when they are completed. We will bequeath what we decide to our successors. Our aim should be to see that they inherit buildings in which they can not only work effectively but of which they can be proud.

1.2 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): I begin by thanking everybody who has participated in the debate and congratulating the Services Committee on its report. About 10 hon. Members have spoken in the debate and all the speeches were excellent. Although this is only an Adjournment debate, it is clear that the House has reached a consensus on the recommendations in paragraph 29. That means that the way will be clear for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to put down the motion that he suggested when he outlined his intentions at the start of the debate.

This is the first debate on the accommodation needs of the House since November 1983. That is not a sign that the House or the Government are complacent, because an enormous amount of work has been put in during the intervening period by those on the Services Committee, the officials who support it and the members of the Property Services Agency. Despite what some hon. Members have said, I can report to the House that there is a good working relationship between the Services Committee under the excellent chairmanship of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) and the Property Services Agency. I look forward to that continuing. That does not mean that the PSA should be above criticism or that it should fail to respond to criticism. I am aware that some criticism was levelled at it in the debate.

The efforts put in have produced reports but now we can see much progress on the ground with work continuing on phase 1 and on the Cannon row refurbishment. Before I deal with some of the detailed points raised in the debate, I should like to thank hon. Members who paid tribute to the work of the late John Silkin. I assumed my present responsibilities when John Silkin was still Chairman of the Services Committee. I shall always be grateful to him for the time, advice and hospitality that he gave me. That was in his nature. Notwithstanding the fact that I represented the Conservative party, not the Labour party, he went out of his way to bring me up to date and to make me feel comfortable when attending my first meeting of the Services Committee.

I wish to record the unique contribution that was made to the Palace of Westminster and the conservation of this magnificent building by Sir Robert Cooke. Sadly, since our last debate on these matters he has died. His contribution will be remembered for generations. There are many examples around us of things that have changed as a result of his attention to them. The outstanding publication entitled "The Palace of Westminster" is, in a sense, a lasting memorial to him. I understand that it is still available on book stalls. I recommend those who have not yet obtained a copy of it to accept the advice that it is well worth putting on a list of Christmas presents that would be welcomed in the coming season.

I join all those who have thanked Mary Frampton for her 40 years' of service to the House. It is right to thank all the servants of the House for the services that they give day in and day out. It will be well known to secretaries as well as to hon. Members, because of her responsibilities for trying to fit a quart into a pint pot, that Mary Frampton had tremendous responsibilities with a high profile. I think that she took on the responsibility of allocating filing cabinets as well as desks. It is interesting to note that as recently as 1960 it was the Leader of the House who seemed to be in charge of filing cabinets. In a debate during that year he made a major announcement that there were to be 25 extra filing cabinets. That is an example of the way in which the expectations of Members have changed. There were changes in expectations between the previous century and this century, of course, but the same applies to recent decades. It will never be easy to keep up with Members' expectations.

A key example arose during the debate when my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) said that 50 sq ft for a secretary was inadequate. Yet it was only a few years ago that very few secretaries had desks. We now have 400 secretaries with desks although only 55 of the desks are in the Palace. In March 1960, there were only 124 secretaries with desks. Moreover, there was no waiting list. It is clear that demand has risen significantly in fewer than 30 years.

The same is true of desks for Members. There was a plebiscite at about the same time—that is 1960—and it was found that only 295 Members wanted desks. There is a desk now for every Member, and we are setting ourselves a new target of every Member having a desk in a room of his own. That shows that progress is being made. It is worth considering the historical context.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister give a categorical assurance to the House that my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) has a desk? That needs to be said.

Mr. Chope: It has been said already that it is not compulsory for Members to sit at the desks allocated to them. I understand that the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) does not choose to sit at the desk which has been allocated to him. There is a desk available to him if he wishes to use it. It may not be as large as he would like, but it is there if he wishes to use it. I am sure that there is a telephone for him, if he wants it. During the debate in 1960, some hon. Members said that it was not necessary and not desirable that each desk should be accompanied by a telephone. There are moves afoot now to install expensive IT equipment around the House to bring communication facilities up to date. Those are examples of the way in which there has been evolution over relatively recent years.

In answering some of the points that were raised earlier, I shall begin by referring to what is happening at Cannon row. The House is aware of the refurbishment that is being carried out there and I assure the House that the target date for completion in summer 1989 is still on schedule. That is later than we had hoped and I explained some of the reasons for that when I gave evidence to the Select Committee.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House used the expression

"broadly on schedule for completion"

when speaking about phase 1 of the new building. I cannot add to that, except to say that I visited the site, put on a hard hat and spoke to the contractors about the paramount importance of the contract being completed on time. There have been problems there, but I hope that they will be overcome and that the work will be completed on schedule. We have not relaxed our objective that the building should be completed on time. It is partly because of the extra resources that have gone into that exercise that we have not made such fast progress on the preliminary work for the phase 2 project, following the recommendations of the Services Committee report. It is not correct to say that we have made no progress. A draft brief has been finalised, which will go out to fee bidding by firms of architects. Five firms of architects are on the short list at present and I hope to be able to appoint the architects before next Easter. We shall put our major effort into ensuring that phase 1 is delivered on time, as the House wishes.

The hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) and the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) raised the question of funds. Funds are made available year by year and it would be unreasonable to expect that all the funds could be allocated for phase 2 when we have not yet received a report from the architects and we do not have precise estimates of the costs.

The best evidence of the Government's commitment to spending money on facilities in the Palace of Westminster and the outside buildings is what we have already done. In 1983, annual expenditure was about £10 million, but it has now increased to about £20 million. I am pleased that we have been able to include in the forthcoming programme a start on restoring the Victoria tower, which has stood out as being a part of the Palace that has not been restored. We have the resources to do that, preliminary studies are under way and work will be started as soon as the existing work on the Central Lobby tower is completed.

The Property Services Agency and officials have to respond to changing circumstances in this magnificent and ancient building. Only a relatively short time ago, no one could have anticipated the amount of work that we must carry out on the Central Lobby tower immediately and on the Upper Waiting Hall during the next summer recess, because of the weakness of the floor.

My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack)—who apologises for having to return to his constituency and missing the end of the debate—suggested that it was lack of offices that took many hon. Members away from the Chamber. I am not sure that I agree. Although I do not argue against offices, if there were no offices at all there would probably be more people in the Chamber. But that is about the only point on which I disagree with my hon. Friend. I agree about the need to complete phase 1 on time. The Government do not intend to be penny-pinching, but we wish to obtain good value for money. As for the interiors of phases 1 and 2, my hon. Friend is in the best position to investigate the idea of a patronage scheme for works of art as part of the refurbishment.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asked 10 specific questions. The last one does not deserve an answer from me, but I shall do my best to answer the others. In the short term, we shall have no more facilities available for working peers, but we are spending money on improved refreshment facilities. When we can vacate Nos. 6 and 7 Old Palace yard, provision will be made there for offices for working peers.

The hon. Gentleman hoped that the Library would not go across the road. I do not know precisely what he meant by that. The House has already decided that the Library will be the major occupant of phase 1, giving up space in this building and in Norman Shaw.

Mr. Dalyell: I was referring to the fact that Dr. John Poole and his science section and a number of others have had to move away from the centre, where they were often required to answer urgent queries. It is sad that that happened.

Mr. Chope: I cannot comment on that. The major move of the Library will not take place until phase 1 is completed.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the nature of the competition. It will not be an architectural competition on the basis of the Royal Institute of British Architects' understanding of such a competition. It will be a fee-bidding procedure, after firms of architects have prequalified on the basis of being suitable and having the experience necessary to design for such a sensitive site.

Mr. Dalyell: It is all very well to say that it will be a fee-bidding process, but how can we be certain that we get the distinguished design that hon. Members on both sides of the House have made it clear that they want?

Mr. Chope: It is for the House to decide, once the architect has been appointed and has responded to the requirements of the Sub-Committee, whether it likes the resulting design. To proceed in any other way on the Palace chambers site would involve much more delay. One difficulty with RIBA design competitions is that the firms which win do not always have enough experience or resources to play a full part in the work. We need an experienced firm of architects.

Mr. Tony Banks: Why not ask Prince Charles to be the judge?

Mr. Chope: That will not arise. There will be no judgment of the designs.

Dr. Godman: Will the House have the power to reject an undistinguished proposal by the successful architect?

Mr. Chope: Certainly that is a matter for the House to decide. I am sure that the architect chosen will do his best to ensure that he produces a design that has the support of the House because if it does not have the House's support he will not get the commission to carry on the work.

Looking further ahead, the hon. Member for Linlithgow asked about decanting. That is a long way ahead. It will obviously be a difficult matter to resolve, but we shall try to do our best. The Government's thinking on patronage of British artists is outside my area. However, the works of art committee under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) could pay some attention to the scope for patronage of British artists in the purchase of any works of art for the building.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow also asked what extra costs would be incurred if there was a delay in decking over the underground from the first part of phase 2 to a subsequent stage of phase 2. The answer to that question is contained in the evidence to the New Building Sub-Committee on page 4, question 5 in which the PSA superintending architect said that there were

> "None that we can identify at this stage. That is not to say that there will not be any."

Mr. Dalyell: Does that apply in the context of archaeology? That is the problem.

Mr. Chope: Archaeologists came on to the site before phase 1 started and were paid by the PSA. I do not think that there will be much scope for archaelogical investigation on the phase 2 site because almost all the buildings will remain except for the Palace chambers rebuilding. Also, much of the site has already been excavated as it is crossed by an Underground railway line.

Points were also raised about the facilities for broadcasters. Obviously the facilities in Bridge street are unsatisfactory at the moment, but the House must recommend any changes. The Services Committee previously recommended 20,000 sq. ft. It would be sensible for that recommendation to await the results of the Select Committee report into televising Parliament.

The House already has a self-financing gymnasium under the auspices of my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker). If anyone requests exercise facilities in the new building, the House can resolve that request. Ultimately it would be for the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee to consider that.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow's concern about the Crypt chapel font is well known. We have had discussions with English Heritage and an agreement has been reached to dig up part of Old Palace yard to see how or where the water is seeping in. I hope that we will be able to get to the bottom of that problem. The speculation is that the leak has been caused by war damage.

I agree wholehearted with the hon. Member for Linlithgow that it is important to get the fabric of the building absolutely right at the design stage. With regard to facilities for visitors, I have seen the early-day motion recommending an awning for the Line of Route. I understand that the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee is discussing that matter with the House of Lords so I cannot take that further today. I hope that I have answered most of the points raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow.

Mr. Dalyell: I thank the Minister very much.

Mr. Chope: I cannot go into such detail on all the other points raised during the debate having regard to the time. I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) that architects will be appointed to do a feasibility study into the conversion of Speaker's court so that that accommodation does not lie vacant for more than a minimum period after the completion of phase 1.

I understand that the parliamentary bookshop is to be run as an in-house enterprise. Exactly what will be provided is still to be decided and, again, that is a matter for the House to resolve in detail. There are certainly to be shops along the Bridge street end of the Victoria embankment, as at present, and phase 1 includes a shop in the Refreshment Department area. I do not think that any decision has been taken on what it will stock, but there should be scope for stocks to meet day to day needs.

Mrs. Gorman: Is my hon. Friend aware that the British Airports Authority is installing shops in hospitals? It might like to instal a shop for us on a contract basis.

Mr. Chope: That is an interesting suggestion. It is for a Committee of the House to consider whether we wish to move from the principle that has been decided on until now—that the shop will be run as an in-house enterprise.

My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) made in her inimitable way a thoughtful and challenging speech. I agree that anything free at the point of consumption increases demand and that the temptation of free space could lead to a waste of accommodation. It is one thing to put forward that proposition, but rather more difficult to find a solution which would ensure that there was not increased demand. I can see that even under present arrangements there is a difficulty because if a Member employs a secretary within the precincts of the Palace, the telephone facility is free and the Member does not even have to charge it against allowances, whereas if a Member employs a secretary in the constituency and does not trouble the House for accommodation, he or she must charge both the costs of the telephone and the costs of heat, light and rent against allowances. My hon. Friend's point might bear further investigation.

My hon. Friend spent some time talking about corruption in the PSA. Today's debate gives me an opportunity to say that the trial concluded yesterday is the last of a series which has resulted in eight PSA officials being convicted of a series of offences of corruption which have brought tremendous disgrace on the PSA. Eight officials have made life difficult for some 22,000 employees, but I hope that neither my hon. Friend nor anyone else would tar the whole organisation with the same brush because of the admittedly heinous activities of that minority. Moreover, all the matters on which they were convicted date back to 1984. Since then there have been major administrative changes in the PSA to ensure that such corruption cannot recur.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Minister blaming the Labour Government?

Mr. Chope: No, I am not blaming any Government. I blame loose procedures which were exploited by an irresponsible group of employees.

My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) spoke about the lifts. I do not know whether the particular faults were reported.

Mr. Holt: They were.

Mr. Chope I shall ensure that action is taken. We have an ongoing programme of replacing the lifts. It is extensive but it is programmed over a period of years. It should be coupled with a maintenance programme which ensures that if a lift is out of order it remains out of order only for a short period.

Mr. Holt: The lift to which I referred earlier was out of action for the whole of the summer recess. If the experience of those of us who were in the Norman Shaw building when they installed the new lift there is anything to go by, I shall have no faith in the lifts. After that lift was installed and put into operation, it was out of service for a longer period than it was in service during its first nine months. I see an official at the back of the Chamber nodding.

Mr. Chope: I share my hon. Friend's concern, and I shall look into the matter.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) referred in passing to the use of county hall as the new parliamentary building. It is the first time that I have heard him make that suggestion. I thought that he wanted to keep county hall for London government purposes. It would be wholly inappropriate for the House to extend its empire to the county hall area. I look forward to private sector use of that fine building and the surrounding area.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister must know what is to happen to county hall. He has plenty of time yet in which to reply to the debate, so could he tell the House when an annnouncement is to be made about the future use of county hall?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We must deal with one building at a time.

Mr. Chope: I have to respond to the hon. Gentleman's question by saying that I must observe the ruling of the Chair on that matter.

Mr. Ray Powell: The purpose of this debate is for the House to declare a preference for one of the schemes that have been put before us. Having listened to the debate, is the Minister able to say what preference the House has declared?

Mr. Chope: The views of the House very much reflect the views of the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services), of which the hon. Gentleman is Chairman. The House would like the redevelopment of Palace chambers to proceed rapidly. It would also like consideration to be given at a later stage to decking over the Underground station. It is a blend of PSA proposals and the Casson Conder proposals, with the gloss that has been placed upon them by the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services). The best way to put it is that the House seems to have agreed unanimously with the recommendations of the hon. Gentleman's Committee.

The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) asked two questions about the proposed subway. He asked whether there might be a subway shuttle, as in the United States. I had not expected that suggestion to be included in the architect's brief, but if the Committee chooses to include it that will be a matter for it. The subway will be open only to passholders and it will serve the buildings on the other side of Bridge street.

I very much appreciate that Members and staff work in less than satisfactory conditions. The House is at one on that. Better offices are needed, and they must be given high priority. Cannon row will provide some relief. Phase 1 will provide even more. After today's debate, we are about to embark on the next serious and exciting phase, and I am grateful for the support that the House has given to it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Channel Tunnel (Rail Link)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory.]

1.33pm

Miss Anne Widdecombe (Maidstone): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise the issue of compensation for people who will be affected by the proposed high-speed rail link between the Channel tunnel and London, running through Kent. I sincerely hope that, in the event, my constituents will not be affected.

British Rail has proposed four routes for the high-speed railway. The fourth has been dropped as being too costly and taking too long to construct. One of the three remaining routes will affect my constituents very badly. The other two give rise to points that I am raising on behalf of the people of Kent generally, rather than of my constituents alone.

Routes one or two should be chosen. I have to agree with the Chairman of Eurotunnel, Alistair Morton, who says that he can see no good reason why we are even still considering route three. Whichever route is chosen will cause problems for the people of Kent and there are objections to be advanced against all three. Therefore we must consider whether there are any positive reasons for accepting any of the routes and whether they provide any benefit for the people of Kent.

The prospects with routes one and two are quite good. First, there is the possibility of an economic boost for the Medway, which traditionally has been the poorer part of Kent. Secondly, there is the possibility of an improved rail commuter service, of a parkway at Maidstone, and, not least, of a link with the north through King's Cross. That must surely play a fairly major part in British Rail's long-term plans.

More important, all Kent is up in arms over the environmental threat from the high-speed railway. Routes one or two could probably be put through tunnels, and certainly through cuttings, for much of their length. Route three runs across the Weald with its wet clay soil, and the line would have to be raised. As such, it would be unsightly and noisy and the environmental damage would be very much greater than from routes one and two. Thus there is no advantage in it, especially as it would be slower than route one, and on this high-speed link the faster the service the higher the revenue for British Rail, and more costly than route two. I see no reason why we are still considering it and why my constituents cannot be immediately relieved of their fear, their worry and the planning blight that is caused by this wholly pointless route. Alistair Morton can see no point in it, nor can British Rail, and nor can the people of Kent.

Enormous questions are raised about compensation for people along the chosen route. I have made available in advance the points that I shall raise both with the Minister and British Rail in the hope that I shall obtain some fairly clear and definite answers, at least where possible. The issues are complex. We have built no new railways since the turn of the century and our compensation laws are therefore inadequate and in a mess. The laws that apply to motorways do not apply in the same way to railways, which leaves far too little protection for Kent constituents who are affected by the new project.

So worried are my constituents that they have formed a campaign to save the heart of Kent—the Weald, Bourne valley and the villages that will be destroyed should route three be chosen. The village of Collier Street will become competely unrecognisable. Headcorn and Staplehurst will be sandwiched between two railway lines and a naturally beautiful part of Kent will be destroyed. Those are just some of the disadvantages.

It has been suggested that the building of a high-speed rail link will mean also a more intensive use of existing track, perhaps to carry more freight or perhaps to cope with the extra custom that British Rail expects. Residents near a railway line that carries no traffic between 11.30 pm and 6 am may sleep undisturbed throughout the night. But if the line is used more intensively, with trains running through the night, no statutory compensation is provided for the people who suffer from the consequent noise. Compensation, would, however, have been payable when the line was built. Thousands of people in Kent will be affected if there is, as is generally projected, an intensification of use. I should like to hear some solid proposals for helping those people.

I do not join in the general bashing of British Rail that has been prevalent recently. British Rail had a hopeless task. It had to produce four hideous propositions, take them into the heart of Kent and sell them to people who were to be affected by them. Inevitably, it has been castigated for mistakes which it undoubtedly made. The people trying to sell the proposals were not official public relations men but British Rail officials. They did a good job, and are continuing to do so, under difficult circumstances.

I am extremely grateful to British Rail for agreeing to make ex gratia payments to some of my constituents. Those payments must be ex gratia because, by law, British Rail is not obliged to provide compensation to persons affected by the route until the Bill needed to authorise the scheme receives Royal Assent. In the ordinary course of events, given that the project will probably proceed through Parliament under the auspices of a private Bill, and as we have yet to have decisions from Kent county council and British Rail, and they will have to wait for the matter to come before Parliament, it could be two years before that Royal Assent is granted.

However, British Rail has recognised the practical difficulties, one of which has already affected dozens of my constituents. People who had started to sell their houses before the routes were announced believed that the sales would go through. They therefore entered into commitments to buy elsewhere, sometimes in a completely different part of the country, to accommodate job moves and so on. When the routes were published the purchasers of their properties backed out. The vendors were stuck without compensation until Royal Assent. However, British Rail very properly agreed to make ex gratia payments to them to ease their financial burden. That is all very well for the people who had already started the sale process, but the position between now and Royal Assent of those hundreds of people who have not started the sale process but who will want, for perfectly genuine reasons, to sell their houses, is not clear.

British Rail has promised a package of assistance before the route is chosen. Again I offer my thanks.

However, it is wholly unacceptable that there is no proper legal provision or guidance about how people should be treated in those circumstances. For example, I understand that in some EEC countries when railway disturbance is caused, not only is the property bought, as it would be here, through compulsory purchase, but a disturbance premium is paid in addition. Will our constituents get a disturbance premium, or will they merely get the compulsory purchase value? How will the value be determined? The market value of houses in Kent is extremely high. Once the chosen route is announced, the market value of the houses on it will decline. Will compensation be payable at the current market value, or at the prevailing market value when my constituents finally sell?

Agricultural land gives rise to many other problems. Whatever route is chosen, some farmers' land will obviously be required. Will they simply be compensated for the price of the land, or will the compensation also reflect the loss of income from that land? If they move the activities on that land elsewhere on the farm, it will take many years before the new location becomes income bearing. Will they be compensated for that? How will compensation be assessed when the land is purchased? Will it be based on agricultural land prices, which are not wonderful, or on development land prices, which, in the south-east, are? May we be told now, or do my constituents have to worry for a further two years about the basis of compensation?

Then there are those who fall outside the compulsory purchase bracket, but who will still be mightily affected by the railway. Again, that will apply no matter which route is chosen. My right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley), who is here, is one of those hon. Members who are extremely worried about the plight of their constituents. There is a law on injurious affection, which I am informed has nothing to do with unfortunate love affairs, but is about being affected by noise, unsightliness or other such factors. That law was never designed to cover the impact of a railway.

Believe it or not, there is no statutory maximum noise limit on railways. There is a noise level above which compensation must be paid and noise bafflement measures must be taken, but a railway may emit any amount of noise. If this project leads to increased railway activity, there will be a fantastic increase also in noise. The people affected do not know what compensation they would get. There is no defined corridor within which it will be paid. Will it be paid to people who live within 200 yards of the railway, or within 400 yards? Will it depend on whether there are cuttings or embankments? Will it be measured with a noise meter? Nobody appears to know.

Will people get money if they find that their living conditions become intolerable? Will they simply be given double glazing and told to get on with it? Will any account be taken of the complete destruction of a beautiful part of the country and of such views as our constituents may have enjoyed in the past? How exactly will the injurious affection law be applied?

It is easy to concentrate solely on residential properties, and most of the pronouncements from British Rail have been in respect of such properties and, very occasionally, of agricultural holdings. However, another class of person will be badly affected by the railway—the business man, particularly, the small business man.

I am beginning to receive quite a few letters from such people—one is in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling—who are losing orders because of the railway. Home improvement firms are particularly affected. They have had orders to build conservatories, for example, but suddenly their customers, believing that they might lose their properties, have cancelled those orders. The problem applies to people selling all sorts of goods and services in the affected areas. Will such people be compensated for loss of income? How long will they have to wait? Will they have gone into liquidation by the time any compensation is proposed? What will be done for businesses?

It is difficult to produce a full package of measures to deal with a completely new set of circumstances, but surely it was realised that the day would inevitably come when a new railway track would have be be built. It must have been realised that we could not go on for ever without any expansion of the rail network. It must have been clear that any major railway construction project would have presented complex and manifold problems. However, insufficient thought was given before the proposals were announced to ensuring that the necessary laws were on the statute book or that British Rail, as a nationalised industry, was given firm guidance.

There are many points that I have not raised, partly because time will not allow and partly because they are so numerous that I would not know where to begin. However, I can assure my hon. Friend the Minister that I have received thousands of letters, the vast bulk of which is against route three. Many of those letters contain heart-rending pleas from my constituents who are suffering personally as a result of the railway line.

To those people the choice of route, the method of calculating the compensation, and the permitted noise levels are personal, not academic, matters. Whichever route is chosen, constituents somewhere will be affected. However, wherever they are, the compensation laws that will cover them are in a mess. Ad hoc and emergency provision and ex gratia payments are not enough. We need a complete and utter overhaul of our compensation laws.

1.52 pm

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): I should like to start by congratulating most warmly my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) on securing this Adjournment debate, which is on a matter of the greatest interest and concern to thousands of people in Kent, from one end of the county to another. I thank her for allowing me to intervene briefly in her debate.

As we all know, planning blight can occur instantly and to individuals with the utmost severe effect. That has been precisely the position in Kent since the day that British Rail published its proposals in July of this year. British Rail took a conscious decision to publish not merely one corridor, but a total of three corridors through various parts of the county, magnifying the blighting effect. In doing so, it has destroyed the value of thousands of people's properties as of now and, in many other cases, it has substantially reduced that value.

Those people—and there will be such people at any moment—who are having to move simply because their jobs have changed, because there has been a change in their personal circumstances or because there are tragedies, bankruptcy or severe financial pressure in their families which have forced the realisation of capital assets, are now having to try to sell their homes.

It is grossly unfair, completely unreasonable and inequitable that any individual should be made to suffer the loss of half, two thirds or virtually 100 per cent. of the value of what is in most cases his only major asset, simply because of the publication of these proposals by a public sector body. I make it clear to my hon. Friend the Minister of State that this is the responsibility not only of British Rail, but of the Government. The proposals published by British Rail can only have been published with the approval of the Secretary of State for Transport. He must have approved publication, because he initiated these studies. The Government must have known that, by sanctioning the act of publication, they would confer instantaneous and severe planning blight from one end of Kent to the other. Therefore, a real responsibility lies with the Government, as well as with British Rail, to clear up the severe difficulties created.

Within a matter of days of the publication of these proposals, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State will know, I asked our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to initiate an ex gratia compensation scheme. I am grateful to him and our right hon. Friend that that call was heeded, and that British Rail has come forward with at least an ex gratia compensation scheme of some sort. As my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone has so cogently and eloquently stated, the scope of the scheme is entirely inadequate in the present circumstances. Frankly, it is a lottery as to whether a property falls within or outside the scope of the scheme. It depends largely on whether the property is adjudged to be one which will be compulsorily acquired by British Rail. The fact is that few properties are judged by British Rail to fall within the scope of the compulsory purchase powers. However, because they are a few yards away from the boundaries of the embankments to the line, does not mean that the value of these properties will not be drastically affected. At present there could be two homes side by side, one falling within the scope of the ex gratia scheme and the other—though virtually equally affected—falling outside. That is an inequity and an anomaly that is not tolerable. I ask my hon. Friend to reach the position as fast as possible where the basic principles of the Land Compensation Act are applied, as they apply to similar projects for which his Department has responsibility, notably road schemes.

The basic principle that must be immediately established, is that those who suffer a significant loss in the value of their homes—because of the publication of proposals for new major works by a nationalised undertaking—must be given compensation equal to the full difference between the open market value of their properties before publication of the proposals and after. If my hon. Friend cannot announce acceptance of that proposal today, I hope that he will rapidly work with his right hon. Friend to do so as soon as possible.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) for raising this matter. It gives me an opportunity, in a brief intervention, to mention the second rail terminal. Clearly, whichever route is chosen, it will end up in London. The London borough of Newham wants the second terminal to be in Stratford rather than at King's Cross. With the Minister at the Dispatch Box, it is a golden opportunity to ask him a couple of questions. It will at least save me the postage and the letter that I was going to write to him.

The Minister will be aware that about 42 second terminal sites in London were identified. We now seem effectively to be down to two. Out of the four that were left, White City has gone and St. Pancras seems to be highly unlikely, so it is either King's Cross or Stratford. It is clear that British Rail wants the second terminal to be at King's Cross. Frankly, we do not consider that the way in which British Rail is going about the matter—using the private Bill procedure—is a satisfactory way of resolving something that many hon. Members think is of great strategic importance to Greater London and to the south-east generally. The private Bill procedure is wholly inadequate for something of this enormity.

I shall not refer to the report of the Joint Committee on Private Bill Procedure, but this is a clear example of the way in which the private Bill procedure should not be used. That is why, at this late stage, I ask the Minister, when he replies to the real fears expressed by the hon. Member for Maidstone and the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley), to state what consideration he has given to intervening more directly in the decision-making process on the siting of the second terminal.

Of course there are divisions across the House, just as there is unity. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) has written to the London borough of Camden. He has allowed me to quote from his letter. He wrote:

> "I thought I would let you know that I do not believe the proposed terminal should be at King's Cross because it seems far more logical that it should go to Stratford."

On this occasion, I am delighted to be able to quote the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate in support of my argument.

Will the Minister be prepared to see a delegation from the London borough of Newham—which has made it quite clear that it is ready to receive the terminal at Stratford—consisting of myself, the leader of the council, Fred Jones, and the chairman of planning, councillor Timms? We are not asking the Minister to decide in favour of Stratford. All we are asking for is an opportunity for an objective evaluation to be made of King's Cross and Stratford. We believe that if there is an objective and impartial study, based on the needs of the travelling public, the needs of London and the strategic significance of the project itself, we shall be quite satisfied with the result. We consider that it will inevitably lead to Stratford being selected.

According to our latest advice, it appears that British Rail officers are advising that the board is likely to make a decision on terminal location in February or March 1989. We have little time at our disposal. It will make nonsense of the private Bill procedure, as I have mentioned.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Maidstone for allowing me the opportunity to speak in the debate. Will the Minister now reply and give me for once, some good news to take from the House of Commons to the people of Newham?

2.4 pm

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Michael Portillo): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) on securing this Adjournment debate. The congratulations that I offer her are more than ritualistic on this occasion. She has given the House the first opportunity to discuss the issues arising from the proposal for a new railway line from Folkestone to London for Channel tunnel traffic. I thank her most warmly for that and for the opportunity that it provides for me also to set out the Government's position, to record some remarks about the way forward and, I hope, to deal with certain misapprehensions that may have arisen.

I thank my hon. Friend also for the great courtesy that she has shown towards me in the run-up to the debate. She and I have already had several meetings about the subject, both formal and informal, and she has taken those opportunities forcefully to impress upon me her constituents' case. As she said today, she spoke even more widely for other people in Kent. She has expressed her deep concern to me and to my right hon. Friend the Secretary if State about the anxiety, hardship and difficulty caused in her constituency and elsewhere in Kent by the proposal to build this railway line. She has done so with the commitment and sincerity which characterise her every intervention on behalf of her constituents. On their behalf she has spoken in an impressive and effective manner and I have every sympathy with her and with her constituents. I have no delusions about the great importance of this matter, its impact on people and the anxiety that it produces.

I congratulate my right hon. and hon. Friends who represent constituencies in Kent, and hon. Members who represent London constituencies that are affected, on their patience and good humour at a time of great difficulty for them and their constituents. I do not mistake their patience for any lack of concern, and frequent visits to Kent have reinforced my understanding of the gravity of this matter.

The House will be aware of the background. There is concern about the capacity of the railway lines and terminals in south-east England as traffic through the Channel tunnel and on to the railways grows following the opening of the tunnel in 1993. There are various estimates of the growth of that traffic, and the British Rail estimates are at the lower end of the range. Other estimates are appreciably higher and those ranges are clearly set out in the British Rail study on long-term route and terminal capacity which was published in July and about which my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and my right hon. Friend for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) spoke. That study leads to the conclusion that, sooner or later, new capacity will be needed in the form of a new railway line. That still leaves open the question of when it will be needed.

British Rail does not see the need for a new line arising for some years, and I do not think that it would see a commercial case for building that line immediately. Others may see a commercial case for immediate building based on existing higher traffic forecasts. Therefore, it is right that British Rail should invite the private sector to show its interest and it has asked that those who wish to pre-qualify should come forward by the end of January 1989. Given British Rail's view that the line will be needed sooner or later, it is right that it should try to establish the route now, so as to provide certainty for the people of Kent and London.

Without intending any discourtesy to my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone I should like to reply to the intervention by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) who raised some points about the private Bill procedure. I am acutely aware of the Committee report that he mentioned in passing. For the moment, the House has no way to proceed on the building of railway lines other than by private Bill and there is every precedent for this. In case there is any confusion about the matter, the Bill dealing with King's Cross which has been laid before the House in no way prejudges the decision on terminals. It simply safeguards the site.

I would not go as far as the hon. Member for Newham, North-West in that, as I understand it, there are still three possible sites—White City, Stratford and King's Cross. The considerations will be commercial, which means that the attractiveness to travellers of each site will be taken into account and, in a sense, site costs will be different. There will also be strategic considerations—the connections which exist or could be provided to other parts of London and to the regions. There will be practical difficulties about the route through London and in end the routes may determine the choice of terminal.

I am always delighted to see the hon. Member for Newham, North-West and to discuss such issues. However, the friends that he said he would like to bring to see me would be better advised at this stage to talk to British Rail because they can explain to British Rail the attractions of Stratford. I have no doubt that Stratford will be an important strategic site. It is on the North London line, on the Docklands light railway, connected to the Central line and on the Network Southeast services in the Essex corridor. It stands in the centre of a vast site in British Rail ownership and I am sure that it will play an important part in Britain's transport needs.

I revert to the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling. It is inevitable that the publication of the British Rail report to which I have referred would cause concern in many parts of Kent, but I think that British Rail was right to publish a report containing options. Had it developed plans in secret and presented the world with a fait accompli, it would justifiably have been criticised for excessive secrecy and lack of consultation. As it is, it chose to publish a number of options and to consult widely with local authorities and others affected before making a final choice. That has not been a pleasant process for those who may be affected by one of the corridors identified but I feel sure that it was the right way in which to proceed. It was the best way to ensure that when British Rail comes to make a firm proposal, it is made in the light of observations about the relative merits of the three possible routes and, especially, their impact upon the environment.

It is unfortunate that what should have been a debate about the relative merits of three broad corridors has turned into a discussion about detailed route alignments. It was never intended that at this stage there should be discussion on specific alignments or the effect on particular properties. Paragraph 10.9 of the study states:

> "The routes shown on the map should not be taken as representing a specific alignment, but only a general indication of the areas through which they might pass. The choice of which route should be adopted and its precise alignment cannot be determined without further detailed design work and wider public discussion."

I agree entirely with that. Any more specific discussion at this stage would be premature and inappropriate. We are some way off deciding on which line might be proposed by British Rail. Even when one line is firmly proposed, there will still be the opportunity for further discussion on precise alignment.

It is extremely regrettable that so many people in Kent have been caused so much anxiety. The anxiety of very many will prove to have been caused unnecessarily in that only one line will be proposed. Currently, worry is spread along three routes. I am determined that the present uncertainty which is affecting certain parts of Kent should not be allowed to last any longer than is strictly necessary. The sooner that British Rail is able to identify the preferred corridor, the better.

I have been in frequent contact with Kent county council and British Rail to establish the time that each needs to carry out its necessary procedures. Kent county council has retained consultants to comment. Council members will doubtless wish to receive views from their officers. I understand that the county council expects to have preliminary views by January. Following that important input, British Rail hopes to be able to indentify the preferred corridor soon after that. I took the opportunity of spelling out this likely timetable to the joint consultative committee on the Channel tunnel, which I chaired on Wednesday in Folkestone. Among others, it was attended by Kent county council and the Shepway, Ashford, Dover, Canterbury, Swale and Thanet district councils and the Kent Association of Parish Councils. I recognise that there are other bodies which have an interest.

I have impressed upon British Rail—this it accepts—that its announcement at the beginning of next year should not be confined to the choice of corridor. It recognises the need to spell out also the benefits to Kent. I believe that they derive from the freeing of existing lines and, therefore, less congestion. Unreduced congestion might threaten to block commuter services. There will be the benefit of the freeing of paths for freight along existing lines, which means that there will be less risk of freight drifting back on to the roads of Kent where it is not wanted. There will be the scope that the new line may offer directly to benefit Kent travellers through the provision of new services, such as express commuter services, in a county which is currently poorly served.

I believe that British Rail will wish to spell out also its general approach to environmental protection when it announces its proposal for a line. It will wish to bring forward information on noise. I suspect that that should be prepared independently or verified independently. It will want also to spell out arrangements for compensation for those who are affected by the chosen route. That is an issue to which I shall revert.

I want to make it clear to my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and to my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling that it will not be a bargain basement line. British Rail will need authorisation from Parliament for the construction of the new line. The traditional method of statutory authorisation for new railway works is the private Bill procedure, which confers compulsory purchase powers on the promoter and confers the power to operate the railway. Objectors have the opportunity to petition Parliament and their objections can be fully considered by Select Committees in both Houses.

I do not wish to prejudge Parliament's views, but it seems likely that the more British Rail has been able to secure the approval in advance of local authorities, including Kent county council, and their endorsement that the line has been designed with due sensitivity to the environment, the smoother will be the passage of the Bill through Parliament. A line that violated the environment and caused fierce opposition from local authorities and hon. Members would face greater problems in Parliament. I am convinced that a private Bill is the right way to proceed and I see no reason to depart from well-precedented procedure.

Miss Widdecombe: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend has said. Although he has given the House an assurance that it will not be a bargain basement operation, he will appreciate that if British Rail builds in the full environmental protection that I and my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling expect, the line will become a hugely costly enterprise. How does my hon. Friend square Parliament's insistence on a full environmental package with the Treasury's requirement for a proper internal rate of return?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend has raised an interesting point, to which I shall be coming in a few minutes in the remarks that I intended to make.

I see no reason to depart from well-precedented procedures, nor do I consider that the matter will be affected if the line is constructed in the private sector, with British Rail entering into a toll agreement to run trains along it. The route would still be selected in the way that I have described and the Bill would still be promoted by British Rail.

I hope that what I have said demonstrates that British Rail will need to satisfy Parliament that it has dealt sympathetically with environmental concerns and has made all reasonable efforts to minimise the line's impact. There is no question of the cheapest line being built regardless of wider effects.

I shall now deal with the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone. I know that it also concerns my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling because he asked me about it in a written question a week ago. British Rail must have regard to the cost of any environmental protection measures that are proposed. It will not receive any subsidy for the new line and will have to demonstrate a commercial case, so a balance must be struck between commercial and environmental considerations that will satisfy Parliament. I gave my right hon. Friend an assurance in my written answer that the cost of associated environmental works will form part of the capital cost of the project for the purpose of calculating the rate of return.

The commerciality of the line is essentially dependent on the journey times that it can help to achieve. Speed is an important element in British Rail's considerations because speed can bring three vital benefits. More customers will be attracted to the line and those customers will be prepared to pay more, so British Rail will receive a greater share of the joint revenues under the agreement with the Société Nationale des Chemins de Fer Francais —the French railway. Some people have seen something peculiar or sinister in that arrangement, but I have not. The agreement simply recognises that the railway which spends money to improve the service should reap the major part of any benefits from those improvements.

The optimum speed of the line is a matter for British Rail, which will have to justify its eventual decision. A balance will have to be struck between commercial and environmental considerations.

I hope that I have made it clear that the decision on the preferred route will be British Rail's, not the Government's. Nor would it be fair to put the local authorities in the position of having to decide, although British Rail will wish to take account of what those authorities advise. Eventually, British Rail will have to justify its decision to Parliament.

In that connection, I make it clear that there is no truth in the suggestion that the Government prefer a particular route. The Government have no basis for expressing such a preference between route options. We expect British Rail to do that on the basis of widespread consultation. Nevertheless, if after reading the record of this debate any of the Kent district councils, Kent county council or the London authorities wish to ask me about the Government's position, I shall be happy to meet them. I explained that when I was in Kent on Wednesday.

The matter of principle concern to my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and to my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling is compensation. Although it is many years since anyone built a completely new railway in the United Kingdom, the issues are no different from those raised by the construction of a new road. There has been a tendency for people to think that there is something special about the construction of a railway line. It is a different project, but many of the issues are the same.

The statutory framework for compensation to owners of properties affected will be laid down in the private Act which authorises the construction of the new line. It is normal for such Acts to apply the provisions of the Land Compensation Acts 1961 and 1973. For people whose property is compulsorily acquired, the 1961 Act sets out the basis of compensation, which is market value. Market value is calculated on the basis of the value of the property at the time it is acquired, ignoring the effect of the proposed development but taking into account any private development that might have been allowed had not the scheme for which compulsory powers are being exercised come along. The 1973 Act added to the entitlement a provision for home loss payments for home owners and compensation for expenses incurred in having to move, and compensation for farmers for the loss of livelihood brought about by compulsory purchase of all or part of their land.

For people whose property does not need to be compulsorily purchased, but who are adversely affected by the operation of a new facility, the 1973 Act provides for compensation for depreciation in the value of their property as a result of the use of a new road or railway. It is also normal practice for British Rail to make arrangements for the noise insulation of properties affected when it seeks statutory powers for new works. I understand that the board's proposals for dealing with noise and other environmental issues are being prepared. The method employed will be independently assessed by outside experts before finalising any compensation arrangements.

I refer briefly to my hon. Friend's suggestion that we should institute what she described as the French system of compensating above the value of the property. Traditionally, we have taken the view that it is wrong to use taxpayers' money to give a windfall gain on the value of people's properties, but that is a much broader question.

Miss Widdecombe: Will my hon. Friend draw an analogy with the law of damages? It is not enough merely to buy the property. Damages must be awarded for the worry that has been caused, for the hassle of acquiring a new property and for the financial penalties that the person may have to endure if his property is being bought without account being taken of the injurious effect of the development that has caused his property to be bought. Is there not a series of problems from which a person could suffer and on which, in a civil case, he could sue for damages?

Mr. Portillo: I do not wish to be drawn by my hon. Friend further than to say that the issues that she is putting forward are much the same as those that occur year after year or even day after day in the case of highway developments. Therefore, she is considerably broadening the subject. I do not blame her for that, but I ask her to recognise what she is doing. No doubt she will take heart from the fact that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Environment is on the Front Bench to hear her remarks and doubtless he will want to take account of her case.

My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone also raised the possibility of compensation for people affected by intensification of use of existing railway lines. I find it difficult to accept that it would be right for British Rail to change its long-standing policy in that way. Its policy has always been that people who live near railway lines must expect trains to use them and must take the risk that the traffic might increase. There is also the possibility that it will decrease. That is no different from the position of those living near main roads, who are not entitled to compensation if traffic increases. Many thousands of people up and down the country must feel that they have been affected by roads on which traffic has increased in a way that they did not expect. Similarly, many people may be affected by intensification of the use of railways. Traffic can increase or decrease for a variety of reasons. My hon. Friend's proposal would have enormous consequences over a wide area. The issue goes very much wider than this particular railway line.

My hon. Friend also expressed concern at the restrictive nature of the existing definition of injurious affection and at the basis on which market value, particularly of agricultural land, is calculated under the statutory compensation code. Again I ask my hon. Friend to recognise, without in any way questioning the validity of her argument, that the ramifications of those questions are much wider than the area of transport. I undertake to draw those points to the attention of my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of the Environment.

Provisions already exist to compensate property owners affected by the adverse effects of traffic on new railway lines. I appreciate that problems have been caused by the fact that statutory compensation provisions do not come into force until British Rail has acquired statutory powers for the construction of the new line. My hon. Friend was right to make that point. Problems of blight arise particularly where property owners wish to sell properties now and cannot wait until the statutory procedures have been completed to take advantage of the statutory compensation provisions. Like my hon. Friend, I recognise that there is no predicting how long those procedures might take.

British Rail has shown that it is conscious of the problem and it intends to tackle it in two ways. First, it announced on 10 November that it would take action in cases of genuine hardship where individuals are unable to complete the sale of their property. In such cases, British Rail has said that it will buy property situated within any of the three route corridors identified in the report provided that the property is likely to be subject to compulsory purchase if that route is selected as the preferred route. I was pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling recognised the value of that statement.

Applicants must demonstrate the need to sell their property for reasons other than the rail link proposal. they must also show that reasonable efforts to sell the property have been made and that it could be sold only at a price substantially lower than it might reasonably have been expected to realise. Any dispute about the valuation can be referred to an expert appointed by the president of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors. That is a welcome step by the board to relieve the problems of hardship caused by its proposals.

Secondly, British Rail is actively considering the appropriate approach to compensation for implementation when the preferred route is announced. The details are still being considered, but I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone, my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling and the House as a whole will welcome British Rail's willingness to go beyond strict statutory requirements. As I said earlier, I recognise the importance of British Rail coming forward at one and the same time with all the elements of the package—the advantages to Kent, the proposal for a line and a statement of what the compensation arrangements will be.

It is clear to the House that a new line between the Channel tunnel and London will be needed at some stage in the future. The alternative is to choke the Kent rail network, which will adversely affect domestic as well as international services. That is a reason why this is not simply a matter of disadvantage, and anxiety to Kent, but has the potential for considerable gain to Kent. That is important.

It being half past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maclean.]

Mr. Portillo: I am pleased that my hon. Friend recognises that there can be advantages to Kent. I hope that the new line will benefit Kent travellers directly. An important part of the commercial case that could be made for this railway line could be that there should be express commuter services running along it. I am pleased that British Rail is examining the scope for such domestic services to use the line.

We all recognise that it is absolutely impossible to build a new line without some impact on the environment and adverse effects on the properties in its path. We need to ensure a reasonable approach to alleviating those effects. British Rail's announcement on 10 November is the first step down that road. I shall discuss with British Rail the approach that it will want to adopt once the preferred route has been announced, until such time as compensation provisions come into effect. I assure the House that the Government will take a close interest in that.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone for this opportunity to debate the matter. I hope that my remarks will be of some help to her and her constituents. I am under no illusion about the importance of this problem. I hope that the matter can be brought to a head as soon as possible so that certainty can reign and people in Kent and in those parts of London which will be affected can know exactly where they stand.

ROF Burghfield

2.32 pm

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am aware of the lateness of the hour, but I see that the Leader of the House is in his place and I have come to raise an urgent matter.

At 6 am there was an explosion at ROF Burghfield. It was heard by local residents, a sheet of flame was seen by eye witnesses and some windows as far as a mile away were shattered. This is of great importance because ROF Burghfield is the manufacturing site of Britain's nuclear warheads. The surrounding villages already show an abnormal leukaemia cluster and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will appreciate the tremendous anxiety of the people in the area because of the explosion. It is essential that we have a statement and I ask the Leader of the House to facilitate one, even at this late hour, from the responsible Minister, so that people can be reassured about radiation leaks and dangers. All too often ROF Burghfield is shrouded in secrecy and people do not know what goes on there.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have no information which is in any way helpful to the House or to the hon. Lady, but of course I shall make inquiries and see what I can find out.

Local Government (Management)

2.33 pm

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): First, I take this opportunity to note the late hour and to thank Mr. Speaker, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to raise a matter on which I feel strongly. I also thank the Minister for sparing time to attend the debate.

I begin by making two brief personal observations. First, all that I want to say about the management of local government services is based on my own personal experience. I served for six years as a council leader. My remarks are not based upon abstract theory. Secondly, I draw the attention of the House to the Register of Members' Interests. It discloses that I am the co-director of the political management programme at Brunel university, where work on this question has been carried on for some time.

Why, then, do I think that these issues need to be aired? Any examination of the management of local government services does not require legislation. That must be welcome news to all hon. Members and to local government everywhere. Legislation alone will not secure the future of local government. All hon. Members want its future to be secured, but legislation is only half the story. It will end abuses but it will not improve services. That requires skilful management. Moreover, any legislation that is passed has to be implemented. That is a challenge for effective local government management.

Another reason for airing the matter on this occasion is that local government management has not been systematically studied during the last 15 years. About 15 years ago the Baines report was published. That report was made by bureaucrats for bureaucrats, not by managers for managers. We must look carefully into the management of local government services, if local government is to flourish. Whatever we may say or think about it, local government is essential and it will not go away.

That begs the question how local government should be managed, if it is not to be managed according to the Baines model or if it is not to be managed as it is now being managed by many authorities. There are three key points to bear in mind.

First, local government should be managed by real managers, not by administrators. Secondly, local government should be managed by an appropriate form of management. Local government is not Marks and Spencer, even if some of us think that it should be. It can never be that. Thirdly, local government services must be managed in a businesslike way, although those services are not businesses. Managing services in a businesslike way amounts to asking for a major cultural change in many organisations. I know from my experience that it also calls for major organisational changes. Both cultural and organisational changes can be traumatic experiences.

We require real managers in local government. The Government can play their role by encouraging real management in local government, by making facilities available for it to develop and, if necessary, by providing funds to speed up the training.

Traditionally, local government services have been administered rather than managed. Among the less endearing features of local government is a strong central core of administration. The power of the treasurer in local government is formidable, awesome and often obstructive.

[Mr. David Wilshire]

Input is the main controlling factor. How much money is put into local government is the main means of control. That does not lead to effective management. Responsibility is devolved to officers who often find that they do not have the authority to go with that responsibility. The story of the person who is responsible for postal services in a local authority not having control over the postal budget or not being able to control the purchase of stamps is the all-too-familiar a story of responsibility and control being detached from one another.

Worst of all is the fact that in the traditional system of local government roles are confused. Chief executives are not quite sure what their role is; chief officers are not quite sure about the difference between them and chief executives. What is probably most serious of all, councillors are not quite sure where they fit into the pattern.

Sadly for local government, there have been dramatic developments elsewhere in the public sector. There have been major changes in the Civil Service. Above all, the National Health Service has been at the forefront of change, in the overhaul of its management structures. However, those lessons have yet to filter through significantly to local government.

The model that I would urge upon the Government to consider for local government is the model that they adopted for the National Health Service, with its process of general management as a way forward. My experience and my belief is that the analysis brought to bear on the Health Service is absolutely right in the NHS and would be absolutely right in local government.

That takes us on to what needs to be done to develop more effective managers. First, it is necessary to establish a strong general management lead in the officer structure and then create strong and effective service managers in posts that really matter. The role of a general manager has to be made absolutely clear. A general manager is not a chief executive, nor is he a typical departmental head or chief officer in charge of an empire. General managers have to be free from service responsibility, they have to work across all services with meaningful control of all that goes on. They have to have the authority that chief executives often do not and more than anything else they have to get away from the idea that the job of general manager is somehow to chair in a mystic way a management team that all too often is composed of people who are invited to look across all services while having their own empires to defend.

The role of service managers also needs to be clearly understood. Service managers need to be free to deliver the services for which they are responsible. They need the authority and the control to do those jobs. They need their own budgets and they need to be able to decide how to spend them. They need their own cost centres and they need to be able to bid for their own resources.

It is never going to be possible to manage a service, be it in the public sector or elsewhere, without proper and effective control of the staff. The manager, not the personnel department, must do the hiring and firing. The manager, not the personnel department, must argue for the structures and suggest the grades. To manage effectively, a manager must have his own targets based on outputs which must be based on quality and not numerical factors. I have never been impressed on being told the number of times that a council cuts the grass in a year. I am much more interested in how long the grass is before they think it needs cutting. That is the targeting and control that they need.

In addition, local government needs to adopt an appropriate form of management. Local government is not a business. It cannot be run like Marks and Spencer for the simple reason that local government cannot withdraw from statutory functions, as a business can if it is making a loss. Councillors can never become line managers in the business sense. In their franker moments, councillors sometimes admit that they are unclear about their role, and that they seem to lack some of the skills that are needed. Therefore we have to identify a third manager in local government—the political manager. When we understand and work out that role, we shall get away from the conflict between councillors and officers and the complaint that all too often, councillors are officer-dominated.

Finally, one has to ask what is involved in managing services in a businesslike way. It is not possible to go into detail in such a brief debate, but certainly the customers must come first. That is the key to it all. Secondly, the central bureaucracy must be dismantled, and, thirdly, it must provide business budgets. Certainly there have to be incentives for managers. The authority that I used to lead now has a profit-sharing scheme for its DLO because the DLO makes so much profit.

A review of local government is not only a good idea but it is long overdue. Despite all the legislation, which I willingly support and believe to be necessary, as long as it is only legislation and not a major overhaul of local government services, we shall not secure the future of a flourishing local democracy in Britain.

My experience during 11 years in local government has taught me a number of things. If management is overhauled it gives councillors a much more satisfying role. It gives them greater control of authorities and, therefore, enhances democracy. My experience has also taught me that if management is overhauled better services are provided and more services are obtained from the same amount of money.

I learnt also that if the power of the centre, particularly the financial centre is ended—the lawyers have their own budget, and have to recover their own costs, and the planning department is free to use in-house lawyers or go down the street to a private firm of solicitors if it prefers —it saves a great deal of money because overheads will shrink. If one is careful, the money saved can be re-invested and given to the managers who deliver the services. The money that was spent on overheads can be spent on local people.

My hon. Friend the Minister may talk about all the things in which he used to be involved, such as competitive tendering. All the changes could make it easier for in-house people to win the contracts because they would be better managed and more cost-effective. My experience has also taught me that better-managed authorities mean jobs that are more secure and union support.

All those objectives have been achieved in one council that I know. I know that many other Members have similar experiences. We would all say that if the Government can encourage local government services to be better managed, and encourage officers and councillors to do their jobs in a better way, then, without passing another law, there will be better services, better democracy and a much more secure future for local government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on his stimulating speech about the management of local government services. He has shown, as he has on previous occasions, an insight into the problems based on knowledge and experience as the leader of Wansdyke council and as a member of that authority before he became the leader. I hope that his remarks will be widely read by members and officers in local government.

My hon. Friend's contribution gives me the opportunity to discuss the action that the Government have taken through the Local Government Act 1988 to try to bring about a new approach to management in local government. That was the essential purpose we had in mind when we planned the legislation on competition, which is now embodied in the first part of the 1988 Act.

My hon. Friend has described the action which a good and progressive Conservative-controlled authority was taking of its own accord, without needing the spur that the Act provides. But, alas, too few authorities have been prepared to take the long cool look at all management activities and structures which Wansdyke put in hand with such productive results. If we had waited for voluntary action to bring the kind of changes that were needed in local government generally, I fear we would have waited a long time.

The truth of that is proved clearly by the spate of activity that has accompanied the passage of the Act. Large numbers of advertisements appeared for managers to run competitive processes. There were innumerable articles on the challenge that lay ahead and how best to deal with it. Seminars and conferences were launched on every side—and did very good business. My hon. Friend and I have spoken at a number of those conferences.

All that suggests strongly that few authorities were in a position properly to define and describe the services they needed and the way in which they could best and most effectively be provided. Most have found their existing command and control quite inadequate to handle service delivery in a competitive environment. There was clearly a widespread fear that present cost levels were less than competitive. The kind of self-examination which we have seen in Wansdyke had few imitators.

All this made somewhat ironic the impassioned pleas that we heard from so many authorities and from the local authority associations, asking to be left alone to decide whether or not to go in for competition because they were in the best position to know whether their cost levels were such as to deliver the best value for the ratepayer's hard-earned money. They cannot have it both ways. If their service delivery was already so efficient, competition should have presented them with few problems. There would have been no need to question existing management structures, nor any need to consider whether to break loose from control service provision, nor any need to cast around for people capable of managing the provision of services.

Already we are seeing that substantial cost savings have been identified, bonus schemes are being drastically revised, the level of central overheads is being questioned, asset holdings are being pruned as spare capacity is identified and clear and simple organisational structures are being adopted in place of vague and informal ones. For example, a report published for Income Data Services, which came out last week, showed that increasing numbers of councils are merging all their direct service organisations into a single business unit so that they can compete more effectively with the private sector. This means new profit-sharing schemes, the encouragement of work force participation, of such methods as team briefings and quality circles, and new incentives for managers such as performance related pay. There is also a new and welcome move towards term-limited contract arrangements for senior staff.

All of this only confirms what the Government have believed all along—that any organisation that is left to run without outside pressures on its efficiency for any length of time is likely to fail increasingly to deliver real value for money. The Audit Commission's findings have repeatedly confirmed that this is a fact of life.

I can assure the House that, the Government see competition as a way of strengthening local government. Clear decision-making processes, full and regular information on cost levels and reductions in these cost levels can only work to the benefit of members, officers and ratepayers, and therefore of the local democratic process as a whole. That is why the legislation is specifically designed to strengthen the organisations in local government that are responsible for the actual provision of services—always assuming, of course, that they are capable of being strengthened in this way. What the Act says is that council employees can continue to provide direct services, but only if they can show—in fair and open competition—that they can win a tender in the face of counter bids from the private sector. If they are not capable of doing this, the ratepayer would be better served by whoever can win the contract on such terms.

The advantages of transparency in management and costing are guaranteed by the requirement that each of the services made subject to competition must be separately accounted for—with costs, including overheads, and revenues properly identified. We would expect most services as a rule to achieve the not unreasonable rate of return of 5 per cent. on capital—and we have required the auditor to comment on how far they are successful in this objective. We have also provided appropriate—and in some cases, I fear, all-too necessary—sanctions.

The savings that this revaluation in the management of local government offers are certainly very substantial indeed. The leader of Bristol city council has said publicly that savings of £600,000 have already been identified. Berkshire plans to save £800,000 a year just on school cleaning alone and Langbaurgh received a bid of £150,000 for street lighting which previously cost it £450,000. Those are just isolated examples. The Audit Commission, in its recent report on competitive tendering for parks and open spaces said that it had found, from its limited experience of tendering to date, that authorities could expect to achieve savings of between 10 and 30 per cent. on the previous price, with overall net savings of between 5 and 25 per cent. For parks and green spaces alone that could add up to savings of up to £200 million a year without any reduction in quality of service. That is just in the service area, which people might regard as relatively mundane—a total of £200 million a year.

[Mr. Christopher Chope]

The prize that we are looking for is, in every sense, worthwhile. The savings are not to be measured in money alone, although these are likely to be considerable, but in improved management, better cost structures, better motivated and better rewarded work forces. Where Wansdyke has pointed the way to what can be done, other councils should be following. That will result in better and more efficient services for the public.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes to Three o'clock.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Tax Returns

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the outcome of the pilot study into a wider issue of personal tax returns by the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Lamont: The pilot study, which took place during 1987 and 1988, was designed to test the Keith committee's suggestion that issuing personal tax returns to every employee known to the Inland Revenue would be effective in bringing to light previously unreported sources of income.

The findings suggest that a general issue of personal tax returns would not be an effective way of uncovering income which would not otherwise be taxed. In a very large majority of cases it would not bring to light any information affecting the taxpayer's liability and about 20 million taxpayers would be troubled unnecessarily. About 0·7 million—some half of them in the black economy—might be expected to disclose income which would not otherwise be taxed; the amounts disclosed would generally be small and the total tax yield from the issue of the returns might not be much more than the cost of issuing them and handling them when completed. The findings also suggest that about 0·7 million taxpayers might be expected to claim additional reliefs; the amounts claimed would generally be small and in some, or possibly most, cases no relief would be found to be due after the claim had been examined.

The Inland Revenue will continue to issue returns to all taxpayers who it thinks might pay too much or too little tax in the absence of a return. But whether or not a return has been issued, it is the obligation of all taxpayers to report any income they receive which has not been taxed, and the Inland Revenue will be taking steps to remind taxpayers of this obligation. In the light of the pilot study, however, it does not propose to send returns to employees more widely.

EC (Contributions)

Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, following Royal Assent to the European Communities (Finance) Bill on 15 November, the United Kingdom has yet made available its contribution under the 1988 intergovernmental agreement; and if he will make a statement about the granting of any further advance payments or overdraft facilities to the Community.

Mr. Brooke: The Government have today made a payment of £561,813,967·41 (851,644,560·25 ecu), representing eleven twelfths of the amount due from the United Kingdom under the 1988 intergovernmental agreement (IGA). The remaining instalment of £50,884,368·87 (77,422,232·75 ecu) will be paid on 1 December.

The Government have also made an advance payment of the non-VAT own resources which would otherwise have been made in December. The advance, under article 10(2) of regulation 2891/77, amounted to £158·4 million and it extinguished the Commission's outstanding overdraft with the United Kingdom under article 12(2) of the same regulation. The overdraft totalled £80·1 million. The balance of the advance was paid in the normal way from the Consolidated Fund under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972.

The Commission requested the advance payment of December's non-VAT own resources because it is still experiencing cash flow problems. These will continue until all member states have paid their IGA contributions. Meanwhile, the Commission is asking non-payers to make available overdraft facilities under article 12(2) of regulation 2891/77; and is restricting its drawings from those who have paid the IGA to the amount which would otherwise have been available under article 12(2).

Article 10(2) and 12(2) facilities do not affect the total amount which the Community is authorised to spend during the year. Commission requests for advances or overdrafts do not, therefore, involve any addition to public expenditure.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Official Custodian for Charities

Mr. Thornton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the light of the recommendations of the Woodfield report, he will make an announcement on the future of the official custodian for charities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The role of the official custodian was reviewed by Sir Philip Woodfield as part of his efficiency scrutiny of the supervision of charities. Sir Philip questioned whether the official custodian's investment services were still needed. He recognised, however, that divesting the official custodian might be a complex and difficult job and that it might not be possible to dispense with his services altogether. He therefore recommended that the possibilities be studied in more detail by a firm of outside consultants.

The consultants' report set out a number of options including full divestment. I have carefully considered these options with the chief charity commissioner in the light of the continuing need to protect charity property and of the value of the official custodian's services, especially to small charities. My conclusion is that in line with the Woodfield report's emphasis on the need for trustees to take greater responsibility and consistent with the more active supervisory role which is envisaged for the commission, the continuance of the official custodian's investment services is no longer justified. The office of the official custodian will, however, be retained, and we have no plans to abolish his function in relation to charity land.

The Government will put forward more detailed proposals for divesting the official custodian in the White Paper due to be published early next year. In the meantime the Charity Commission will be considering, with interested parties, how divestment can best be achieved and how long it will take.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Agricultural and Food Research Council

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has received the annual report of the Agricultural and Food Research Council for 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The annual report of the Agricultural and Food Research Council for 1987-88 has been submitted to me under the requirements of the Science and Technology Act 1965, and a copy was laid before the House on 16 November.

I was most interested to study the report and, in a year of managerial and organisational change for the council, I was particularly encouraged to note:

i. the major advances in studying the control of genes and the behaviour and requirements of living plant and animal cells;

ii. research that could eventually lead to the development of new vaccines to protect animals against several diseases at once;

iii. the new developments that are emerging in the use of biological control systems against pests and the improvement of nitrogen usage;

iv. the novel findings that could indicate improved ways of improving food quality and stability.

Economic and Social Research Council

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has received the annual report of the Economic and Social Research Council for 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The annual report of the Economic and Social Research Council for 1987-88 has been submitted to me under the requirements of the Science and Technology Act 1965, and a copy is being laid before the House today.

I was most interested to study the report and, in an eventful and difficult year for the council, I was particularly encouraged to note:

(i) the publication of the Report on Horizons and Opportunities in the Social Sciences, setting new directions for Social Science research into the 1990s and confirming that British Social Science is outstandingly good in international terms over a range of disciplines;

(ii) the continued improvement in PhD thesis submission rates for students supported by the Council, in response to the firm application of sanctions and the encouragement given by the Council to improvements in doctoral research training;

(iii) the launch of important new research programmes on Countryside Change, Risk and Pollution; AIDS; New Technologies and the Firm; and Transport;

(iv) The streamlining of ESRC's organisational structure to provide a clearer framework for the setting of priorities, improved management of research, protection of curiosity-driven research funded through the Research Grants Scheme, and increased emphasis on the evaluation and dissemination of research output.

I congratulate the council on its achievements and look forward to further progress under the guidance of the new ESRC chairman.

ENVIRONMENT

Waste Disposal

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the additional consultation paper on waste disposal law amendments as announced on 29 June. Official Report, column 254.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have today placed in the Library of the House a copy of the follow-up consultation paper which contains proposals from the Department and the Welsh Office to complement and strengthen those already announced on 29 June.

First, we propose to take powers to control imports and exports of waste. It remains our view that international trade in waste disposal services can be economically and environmentally desirable, provided that it is properly controlled and monitored. To ensure that this is so, we propose to take direct powers in primary legislation to prohibit, restrict or control the import or export of wastes. The powers, which would be exercised by regulations, would be desirable for example if trade in particular wastes were to risk damage to humans, animals, plants or the environment generally, were to affect the availability of disposal facilities or were to lead to improper disposal. Existing powers are contained in a range of primary legislation and regulations which the Government believe could usefully be clarified.

We propose to make certain additional changes to the provisions of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, so that the Secretary of State might add, through regulations, criteria which are relevant to the consideration of a licence application; so that an application may be considered if the applicant has obtained an established use certificate; and so that the Secretary of State might, through regulation, require licences to carry specified conditions.

We propose also to reduce the uncertainty at law about responsibility for the safety of closed landfill sites by giving clear responsibility for record keeping and monitoring of closed landfills to waste disposal authorities, where the expertise on waste disposal lies.

We propose to close the loophole under which scavenging at private sector sites is not an offence.

Finally, we propose additional measures to combat the growing problem of fly-tipping. We propose to make the registered keeper of a vehicle used in fly-tipping liable to prosecution unless he can demonstrate that he has taken reasonable steps to satisfy himself that the vehicle would not be used for such purposes.

Waste (Imports)

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further measures he proposes to take to control imports of waste.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It remains our view that international trade in waste disposal services can be economically and environmentally desirable, provided that it is properly controlled and monitored. We have, however, included in a consultation paper issued today, a proposal to take direct powers in primary legislation to prohibit, restrict or control the import or export of wastes. The powers, which would be exercised by regulations, would be desirable for example if trade in particular wastes were to risk damage to humans, animals, plants or the environment generally, were to affect the availability of disposal facilities or were to lead to improper disposal. Existing powers are contained in a range of primary legislation and regulations which the Government believe could usefully be clarified.

We have concluded that movement of waste for disposal across national frontiers should in general be restricted to wastes which are to go directly to specialist treatment plants or incinerators. Shipments of waste to go directly to landfill should be exceptional and permitted only with the agreement of the importing country. We also consider that all transfrontier movements of waste should be subject to the pre-notification procedures set out in the EC directive on transfrontier shipment of hazardous waste. We intend to put these proposals to our European colleagues at the forthcoming EC Environment Council with the aim of strengthening the existing directives.

Housing (East London)

Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in his consideration of the potential for more housing in east London.

Mr. Trippier: As announced on 20 April, the Department carried out consultancy studies into the scope for housing development on five large areas of east London. The consultants have now reported. We are considering in the light of their findings what action the Government might take to facilitate housing development in the study areas. Copies of the consultants' report have been placed in the Library of the House.

Ozone Layer

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further action he intends to take internationally to protect the ozone layer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I propose to call a major international conference on the protection of the ozone layer early next year. It will be in London in March. The Prime Minister will participate. It will be held in association with the United Nations environment programme (UNEP) under whose auspices the Montreal protocol was successfully developed.

I shall be inviting Ministers from developed and developing countries, world industry and international organisations. I want the conference to demonstrate that industry has already developed, or soon will, new products and processess that will enable all countries quickly to reduce the use of chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) and move to a CFC free world.

The House is already aware that we are calling for worldwide emissions of CFCs to be reduced by at least 85 per cent., and as soon as possible. I was convinced of this urgent need by the latest scientific evidence. My noble Friend the Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside will at the Environment Council this week be urging our European colleagues to make these reductions by the turn of the century and to agree that the Montreal protocol must be strengthened to this effect. This further action is essential not only to protect the ozone layer but because CFCs are powerful greenhouse gases which contribute to the risk of global warming and consequent climate change. The Montreal protocol will come into force on new year's day. Our conference in March will give a political boost to the important first meeting of the parties in Finland the following month with will begin the formal process of reviewing the protocol. I have told the executive director of UNEP that the United Kingdom would like to host the second meeting of the parties when we hope the reductions we are demanding will be agreed. This will be in April 1990.

It is not enough for the United Kingdom or even the European Community to take action on its own. A clear commitment is needed from all world governments, including those who have not yet signed the protocol, if we are to have any chance of preventing further damage to the ozone layer. It is not enough to set objectives. Our London conference must show how they will be achieved in practice.

WALES

Local Authorities (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will make known his plans for local authority capital expenditure for 1989-90.

Mr. Peter Walker: Following the autumn review of public expenditure I have decided to increase total gross provision for local authority spending in 1989-90 in Wales to £450 million. This is an increase of £34 million (8 per cent.) over 1988-89.

The increased provision allows for £10·3 million of allocations specifically to assist district councils to meet the capital costs of preparing for and implementing the community charge.

The largest percentage increase in provision goes to personal social services. This reflects the rising number of the elderly as well as the shift in the burden of care in the mental health services from the NHS to local authorities.

In further increasing the provision for education, I am recognising the need to improve the fabric of school buildings and also to invest in schools rationalisation projects which will release revenue resources for use elsewhere in the education service.

Local authorities are being notified today of their individual allocations on both housing and non-housing services including major road schemes (£39 million) and projects of regional or national importance and special projects (£12·5 million). The overall total for allocations is £337 million.

Details of the allocations for individual authorities have been placed in the Library. Allocations for schemes under the urban programme including urban development grant totalling £27 million will be announced shortly.

Child Abuse

Sir Raymond Gower: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he intends to make any arrangements to ensure that social work professionals in Wales receive appropriate training to deal effectively with cases of child abuse.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have given consideration to the implications for training following the Government's response to the Cleveland inquiry report, and in consultation with the Welsh Counties Committee. I have concluded that the best way forward for the financial year 1989-90 will be by means of a specific grant. Broadly in line with the position in England, a grant of 70 per cent. in support of expenditure of £588,000 will be made available to Welsh counties for use in training social work professionals and others in handling cases of child abuse. The money will be apportioned appropriately for each county, and will be allocated against detailed operational plans submitted to my Department for approval. The objectives and criteria for evaluation will be subject to discussion with local authority representatives, as will the arrangements for funding the scheme for the following financial year taking account of the need for continuity. Overall, this initiative will build on the steps that I have already taken for 1988-89. These involve a special initial allocation of over £60,000 for training in this field. Subject to parliamentary approval, this funding will continue for the financial year 1989-90.

TRANSPORT

Freightliner-Speedlink Merger

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he approved the recent merger of British Rail's subsidiary Freightliner with its Speedlink business; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State approved the merger of Freightliner with Speedlink which came into effect on 10 October.

The information of a single, non-bulk freight business will improve BR's performance by building on the strengths of the two organisations. It will also enable BR to make the best possible use of the opportunities presented by the opening of the Channel tunnel in 1993.

Although the new business will be a part of the railway and not a separate subsidiary, its performance will be clearly and separately identifiable in BR's report and accounts.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Approvals Board for Telecommunications

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects the British Approvals Board for Telecommunications to be appointed as an approvals authority for meters.

Mr. Atkins: I am pleased to announce that, following statutory consultation and consideration of comments, my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has appointed BABT as an approvals body for meters comprised within the public telecommunications systems of British Telecommunications plc and Mercury Communications Ltd. This appointment is under section 25 of the Telecommunications Act 1984.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Nitrate Sensitive Zones

Mr. Harris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals there are to compel farmers to restrict farming activities in nitrate sensitive zones and to compensate them for such restrictions.

Mr. MacGregor: The nitrate problem is a complex one and remedies may vary considerably from area to area depending on local circumstances such as geology, rainfall and farming patterns. In some cases, water blending or treatment may provide the best option for reducing nitrate levels—and indeed the only one in the short term. In other cases, agricultural restrictions may be preferable or a mixture of water and agricultural measures.

That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and I commissioned a range of desk studies to examine the options for limiting nitrate concentrations in drinking water in ten varied localities. We hope to publish the results of those desk studies soon.

The Government believe that, wherever possible, any agricultural restrictions should in the first event be on a voluntary basis. They do, however, consider that it is necessary to retain compulsory powers to establish protection zones as a fallback. Provision for such zones is therefore included in the water privatisation Bill on a similar but more flexible basis than the provisions, which have so far never been used, contained in the Control of Pollution Act 1974.

The Government also believe that, where farmers are obliged to restrict their agricultural activities beyond the degree which could be regarded as good agricultural practice, they should be compensated. The details of these compensation arrangements are currently the subject of careful consideration, the conclusions of which will be announced during the passage of the Bill. Appropriate consultations will be held with water, farming and other affected interests. The Government will also be considering the extent to which compensation costs can be offset by reductions in CAP support.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teacher Training

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students were recruited to courses of initial teacher training in 1988.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: A survey undertaken by my Department shows that 20,183 students entered courses of initial teacher training in 1988, an increase of 1,003 over 1987, and an improvement of 3,294 over 1986. Recruitment to primary courses is 12 per cent. higher than last year, while intakes to secondary training are 97 per cent. of the very high levels achieved last year. Recruitment to the shortage subjects is higher than 1987 in CDT, business studies and modern languages, but lower in maths, physics and chemistry.

I am placing in the Library the principal results of the survey.

ENVIRONMENT

Charter of Local and Self-government

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many countries have now signed the European charter of local and self-government;

(2) whether Her Majesty's Government propose to sign the European charter of local and self-government; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what discussions he has had with representatives of local authorities about the European charter of local and self-government.

Mr. Ridley: I understand that 14 countries have signed the charter. We have no plans to sign it. The matter was last discussed in the presence of local authority representatives at the eighth conference of European Ministers responsible for local government which was held in Ireland in September.

CIVIL SERVICE

Travel

Mr. Knowles: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service how much money is spent in a full year on official travel between (a) London and Paris, (b) London and Brussels and (c) London and Munich; which airlines are used, and at what level of fares; and if he has any plans to use cheaper fares now available.

Mr. Luce: The information is not held in the form requested and cannot be obtained except at disproportionate cost. However, it is the OMCS policy that British carriers are the carrier of first choice where they offer best value for money but we seek always to use the most economic fare whenever possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Council of Ministers

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council held on 21 and 22 November.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Foreign Affairs Council met in Brussels on 21 and 22 November. I attended on 21 November, accompanied by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State. She attended on 22 November accompanied by the Minister for Trade.

The Council reached agreement on the four implementing regulations for the structural funds following the agreement at the Brussels European Council in February to double the funds by 1993. It also concluded the conciliation procedure with the European Parliament on the regulations for the European social fund and the agriculture guidance fund. Discussions on the Parliament's proposed changes to the horizontal and regional fund regulations will continue at official level with a view to securing a common Council position for the Parliament in time for the co-operation procedure to be completed and the regulations adopted at the December Foreign Affairs Council.

The Council discussed the preparation for the Rhodes European Council and agreed that the main subjects for discussion would be the further development of the Community, the EC's international role, and the environment. For the first item the main text will be the report by the Commission on progress in completing the single market, due to be submitted under article 8(b) of the Treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act.

The Council had an exchange of views on prospects for the mid-term meeting of the GATT Uruguay round in Montreal on 4-8 December. The Council noted the importance of the mid-term meeting for success in the round as a whole, and endorsed the Commission's proposals for a constructive approach to the meeting in Montreal. The recommendations from the Agriculture Council on 14-15 November on the handling of agriculture at the MTM, were confirmed.

There was discussion of possible ways forward in the dispute with the United States on the Community directive prohibiting the use of hormones in meat. This will be further discussed at the December FAC.

The Council agreed the Community's generalised scheme of preferences (GSP) for 1989. The GSP is an important element in the Community's relations with developing countries. It provides access to the Community market on concessional terms for a wide range of LDC products, on an autonomous basis.

The Commission introduced a report on the Community's textile and clothing industry which will be further discussed.

In the margins of the Council there was a successful meeting of the EC/Cyprus Association Council which underlined once again the close relations between the two sides. At the FAC itself progress was made on new financial protocols for Cyprus and Malta.

Meeting in the framework of European political co-operation, Ministers of the Twelve discussed the outcome of the Algiers meeting of the Palestinian National Council—which represented a modest step forward—and agreed a statement. Statements were also issued on recent developments in Afghanistan and on the occasion of Lebanese national day on 22 November. Copies of all three have been placed in the Library of the House.

EMPLOYMENT

Trade Union Rights Commissioner

Miss Widdicombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has appointed the Commissioner for the rights of trade union members.

Mr. Cope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has appointed Mrs. Gill Rowlands as Commissioner for the Rights of Trade Union Members, from 24 November 1988 to 24 November 1991.

HEALTH

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in developing a leadership role in prescribing for family practitioner committees, as announced in "Promoting Better Health"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Early in 1989 we intend to launch a number of pilot projects designed to establish how family practitioner committees (FPCs) can most effectively discharge their new leadership role in promoting more effective and economic prescribing by general practitioners. Building on the experience gained in the pilot projects, we intend to issue guidance in about a year's time on best practice in this area for all FPCs to follow. To carry out this role—whether in the pilot projects in the first instance or more generally later—family practitioner committees will be given access to all levels of data from PACT, the new prescribing information system. A further important feature of the new arrangements will be the provision of FPCs of professional advice, independent of local GPs and their representative body the local medical committee, on interpretating the PACT data and on developing their activities in this field. FPCs will also wish to consult local medical committees who will have access to the PACT data about prescribing in their FPC area.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Programme

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what money has been allocated to the United Kingdom aid programme to cover the cost of the United Kingdom contribution to the International Monetary Fund enhanced structural adjustment facility.

Mr. Chris Patten: Her Majesty's Government have agreed to provide up to £327 million for the IMF enhanced structural adjustment facility (ESAF) during the period up to 2002. Under the 1987 public expenditure survey the aid programme was credited with the following additional amounts in respect of United Kingdom contributions to the subsidy account of the IMF ESAF:

(i) 1988-89 £6·5 million (subsequently increased to £8·5 million by a claim on the Reserve of £2 million);
(ii) 1989-90 £13 million;
(iii) 1990-91 £20 million.

Under the latest public expenditure survey further additional provision has been made for £4 million (1989-90), £5·5 million (1990-91) and £13·5 million (1991-92). This fully covers the total estimated United Kingdom contributions to the subsidy account over the survey period.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what money has been allocated to the United Kingdom aid programme to cover the expected cost of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer's debt initiative.

Mr. Chris Patten: It is impossible accurately to predict the cost of the Toronto concessions. This will depend on factors such as which countries reach agreement with the IMF and seek rescheduling from the Paris Club, the date at which they come to the club, creditors' decisions on eligibility for the concessions and which debts are to be rescheduled. It is planned to finance the interest reduction by an aid grant to the country concerned which will be paid directly by the Overseas Development Administration to ECGD. I expect these sums to be paid in each financial year following the year in which the costs are incurred. The amount added to the aid programme to cover these costs is £2·5 million in 1990-91 and £14 million in 1991-92. These figures are expected to build up quickly.

Hurricane Joan

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of the aid provided to Nicaragua by Her Majesty's Government in response to damage caused by hurricane Joan; what additional aid requests have been received; what representations have been received urging more assistance; and what information sources he relies upon to provide details of hurricane damage.

Mr. Chris Patten: Including our contribution to the European Community's programme, we have provided £413,000 in emergency aid. This has been channelled through voluntary agencies largely to the Atlantic coast region. No specific further aid requests have been made although I have received a number of representations from groups and individuals in this country urging that further assistance be given. We use all available information sources on any disaster, including British diplomatic posts, voluntary agencies, international organisations and especially the office of the United Nations disaster relief co-ordinator.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if consideration has been given to sending military assistance from British forces based in Belize to aid the civilian authorities in Nicaragua with repair work arising from damage caused by hurricane Joan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No request for the assistance of the British garrison in Belize has been received from the Government of Nicaragua.

Kurdish Refugees

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance has been offered to the Government of Turkey for the Iraqi Kurdish refugees; and how much has been accepted.

Mr. Chris Patten: We made a contribution of £250,000 to the Turkish Red Crescent earlier this month for its work in caring for these refugees. This contribution has been accepted with gratitude.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

City Technology Colleges

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he intends to issue any guidance on the admission criteria and procedures, especially relating to the use of interviews, that may be used in selecting pupils to attend city technology colleges.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Pupils admitted to CTCs will have demonstrated their aptitude to benefit from the particular type of education to be offered, will represent a wide range of abilities and, so far as practicable, a cross section of the community of the area in which the college is situated. It will be for CTCs themselves to decide how to give effect to these criteria in their admission arrangements, which may include the use of interviews.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether he has established or intends to establish any guidance or standard requirements regarding the curriculum to be taught in city technology colleges;

(2) in which respects it is anticipated that the curriculum laid down for a city technology college will differ or add to the requirements of the national curriculum; and which elements would be compulsory in the curriculum for students attending such city technology colleges beyond the age of 16 years.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: As a condition of grant CTCs will offer a curriculum which is broad and balanced with an emphasis on science and technology, including the applications of information technology across the curriculum. We shall expect the curriculum for all pupils in years one to five to cover all the core and foundation subjects of the national curriculum, national arrangements for assessments will apply, and provision will be made for the teaching of religious education and for collective worship. A wide range of courses will be available for post-16 pupils.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has established criteria or formulae for determining the levels of private and/or public funding that can be made available for the establishment of individual city technology colleges, either as revenue or capital.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The basis of our recurrent grant to CTCs will be an average of equivalent expenditure by local education authorities on maintained schools in similar areas. Capital costs will vary according to individual circumstances, including for example the cost of acquiring a site and whether any refurbishment or additional building works are needed. In each case sponsors will be required to make a significant contribution to those costs.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will issue guidance to local education authorities on the availability of lists of parents' names and addresses to parents of children in schools which are currently state schools but are considering opted out or city technology college status.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) gave her on Monday, 7 November at column 3.

Under-Fives

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the latest figure for the percentage of under-fives in (a) nursery schools, (b) nursery classes and (c) primary classes, by local education authority, in England and Wales.

Mr. Jackson: The number of children under five attending maintained nursery schools, nursery classes and infant classes in primary schools as a percentage of the estimated three and four-year-old population in each local education authority in England in January 1988 is given in the following table. Figures for Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Schools (Expenditure)

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average per capita expenditure for (a) primary and (b) secondary pupils, by local education authority, in England and Wales.

Mr. Jackson: I refer the hon. Member to "The Handbook of Education Unit Costs 1985-86"; a copy of which is in the Library. Table 4 provides the latest data on local education authorities in England. Data for Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Class Sizes

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the latest figures for average class sizes in (a) primary, (b) secondary and (c) nursery schools, by location education authority, in England and Wales.

Mr. Jackson: Information on the average size of classes in nursery schools is not collected centrally. The average class size in maintained primary and secondary schools in each local education authority in England in January 1988 is given in the following table: The analyses relate to classes taught by one teacher during a selected period the day the schools census is carried out and do not necessarily represent the pattern of classes over the academic year as a whole. Information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Recruitment

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers recruited in Ireland in the past year to cover vacancies in London, have been given Department of Education and Science registration; how many have not; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The information is not available in the form requested. Between 1 October 1987 and 30 September 1988, 327 applications for qualified teacher status were considered under paragraph 2(b) of schedule 5 to the Education (Teachers) Regulations 1982 (SI 1982/106) in respect of teachers who had trained in the Republic of Ireland. To be approved under this provision, the course of training must be comparable in terms of length, content and depth of study to one available in England and Wales at the same time. Thirteen of these applications were accepted.

In addition, during the same period, ILEA recommended six teachers with qualifications obtained in the Republic of Ireland for qualified teacher status under paragraph 2(e) of schedule 5. All of these cases were accepted.

ILEA

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what levels of funding from central Government will be available to inner London authorities following their assumption of education responsibility when the Inner London Education Authority is abolished.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In 1990-91 a fixed total of central Government grant will be made available for distribution among local authorities. Each authority's entitlement will be determined by the Government's assessment of its need to spend on all services including education. Specific grant funding will also be available from a number of Government Departments.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what actions he intends to take to ensure the adequate funding of non-statutory education in inner London after the abolition of the Inner London Education Authority.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In the annual grant-related expenditure assessment the Government take account of each local education authority's need to spend on various statutory and non-statutory aspects of provision. It is however for each LEA to determine its budget in accordance with its own priorities and the resources available to it. The same will apply to inner London boroughs when they become education authorities.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the amount paid by each local authority in England and Wales in the years 1986-87, 1987-88 and a best estimate for 1988-89, to all institutes of advanced, further and higher education; on what basis in the future such institutions will receive the £8,000 minimum withdrawn from the rate support grant, as detailed in his Department's consultation paper dated 11 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: In each of the years specified the net recurrent costs of advanced further education (AFE) have been shared between local education authorities (LEAs) by means of a capped pooling arrangement. My right hon. Friend is empowered to determine the size of the pool and, in the light of the advice of the national advisory body for public sector higher education (NAB), the distribution of the pool between local education authorities in respect of the polytechnics and colleges which they maintain or assist. A full list of the allocations determined by my right hon. Friend for the years 1986-87, 1987-88 and 1988-89 is set out in the table. LEAs may pass onto their colleges amounts below or in excess of the allocations but information about precise payments to each institution is not available.

Under the provisions of the Education Reform Act 1988 the 29 English polytechnics and 32 other colleges maintained or assisted by LEAs will transfer from local authority control and from 1 April 1989 will become the funding responsibility of central Government which will channel grants to the sector through the new Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council (PCFC). The council will be responsible for allocating the funds made available by my right hon. Friend.

PRIME MINISTER

Journalists (Briefing)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister how many daily briefings for journalists have taken place at No. 10 Downing street since she became Prime Minister; and for how many of these a tape recording exists.

The Prime Minister: My press office is in regular contact with journalists.

United States President-elect

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Prime Minister whether she discussed the issue of burden-sharing when she met President-elect George Bush in Washington.

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Prime Minister whether she discussed British contributions to the cost of developing the follow-on system to the Lance missile when she met President-elect George Bush in Washington.

The Prime Minister: No.

10 Downing Street (Silver)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister what silver items have been loaned for use at No. 10 Downing street; and to whom they belong.

The Prime Minister: No. 10 Downing street has silver on loan from the trustees of the Victoria and Albert and the British Museums and a number of items kindly loaned by private owners whose names it would not be the practice to make public.

Poland (Visit)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list the reasons for her visit to Poland; who invited her; by what means she travelled; how many civil servants accompanied her; and what was the total cost involved.

The Prime Minister: I visited Poland in response to an invitation from the Polish Government. I travelled by RAF VC10 and was accompanied by three officials and nine support staff. As I stated in the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) on 11 November 1988 at column 315, the provisional estimate of the total cost is £21,000.

United States (Visit)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will give the reasons for her latest visit to the United States of America; who invited her; by what means she travelled; how many civil servants accompanied her; and what was the total cost involved.

The Prime Minister: I visited Washington at the invitation of President Reagan. I travelled by RAF VC10 and was accompanied by three officials and seven support staff. A provisional estimate of the total cost is £50,000.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister what official gifts were handed out on her latest visit to the United States of America; to whom they were presented; and what was the total cost involved.

The Prime Minister: As is customary official gifts were given to President Reagan and to a small number of officials.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners (Property)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now review the list of property which long-term prisoners are able to possess with a view to enabling them, at the discretion of the governor, to possess electronic games of an educational nature.

Mr. Hurd: Prison standing order 4, a copy of which is in the Library of the House, describes privileges available to prisoners and the conditions under which they may be granted. Long-term prisoners in dispersal prisons may, in addition, have in their possession items from a list that is approved by the Prison Department. It has recently been agreed that this list should be amended to include certain electronic games that can be played in prisoners' cells.

Fire Service (London)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations his Department has received calling for privatisation of the London fire service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None.

Refugee Policy

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with other European Economic Community states concerning a common refugee policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The discussions described in my right hon. Friend's reply of 9 June to my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) are continuing.

Guildford Four

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many times each of the Guildford four have moved prisons; what the reasons are for their moves; what information he has concerning their medical condition; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend wrote to the hon. Member on 22 November in reply to his recent question seeking similar details (col. 881) and a copy of the letter has been placed in the Library.

Most of the moves involving the four inmates have been for operational reasons or in the interests of good order and discipline. I have no information which suggests that their present general medical condition is other than satisfactory.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received in the case of the Guildford four; and when he expects to make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: Since my statement on 20 January 1987, I have received letters from those representing the four people convicted, dated 15 January 1987; 26 January 1987; 27 February 1987; 2 March 1987; 9 April 1987; 20 July 1987; 16 and 29 March 1988; 25 May 1988; 22 and 29 June 1988; 9, 13, 16, 22, 27 and 29 September 1988; 5 and 24 October 1988; 9, 16 and 22 November 1988. These have raised a number of specific points about the case, and some have enclosed other documents. I shall make a statement as soon as I have completed consideration of all the representations recently submitted to me.

Chief Superintendent Alan Coates

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable of Somerset into the reasons why Chief Superintendent Alan Coates has been suspended and is currently under investigation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: No. This is a matter for the Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset. It would not be right for me to intervene in such matters in view of my role as the appellate authority in police disciplinary proceedings.

Visas (EC)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions with other European Community members concerning the requirement of visas for non-European Community nationals have taken place; and what is his policy towards a common visa requirement throughout the Community.

Mr. Renton: At a meeting in Copenhagen on 9 December 1987, the Ministers of the states of the European Community concerned with immigration agreed to a common list of 50 countries whose nationals should require a visa if they wished to enter any country in the Community. An extension of the list was agreed upon in Munich on 3 June 1988, and there have been discussions among officials about further extensions. We acknowledge the contribution which harmonisation of visa regimes could make to strengthening the external frontiers of the Community, but other factors must also contribute to determining the United Kingdom's visa policy.

War Dead (Disposal)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if guidance on the disposal of the dead in the event of war has been issued to police forces; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if the Metropolitan police has received training or instruction regarding the disposal of the dead in the event of war; and if he will make a statement;

(3) when the subject of disposal of the dead in war was last discussed at meetings of (a) the police war duties committee and (b) the standing working party of police staff officers on home defence planning; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: All police forces have been advised that the disposal of the dead in war is a local authority responsibility. Questions of discussion with representatives of the police service and training have not therefore arisen.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the local authority civil defence plans for the disposal of the dead in war requested by his Department for the October deadline of the planned programme for implementation.

Mr. Hurd: Such plans, and plans in relation to a number of other civil defence matters, are being examined by officials of my Department. The regular discussions with individual local authorities which take place as part of the planned programme for implementation enable conclusions to be conveyed to them.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the subject of disposal of the dead in war was last discussed at the Civil Defence committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The proceedings of the Civil Defence committee are subject to a NATO security classification.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what resources are being made available to London local authorities to draw up plans to deal with the disposal of dead bodies in the event of nuclear war.

Mr. Hurd: Civil defence grant is payable towards expenses incurred by local authorities in London in carrying out their statutory function to make, keep under review and revise such plans.

Civil Defence Planning

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the order of magnitude of casualties likely to result from (a) conventional attack, and (b) nuclear attack, as identified in his Department's guidance on civil defence planning assumption.

Mr. Hurd: Advice on the likely effects of attacks is given in section 2 paragraphs 10, 15 and 16 of the "Emergency Planning Guidance to Local Authorities".

Response to Disaster Review

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish details of the Association of Chief Police Officers' review of response to disasters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: This is a matter for the Association of Chief Police Officers.

Emergency Planning

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what efforts are made by his Department to provide the public with details of emergency planning.

Mr. Hurd: The publication "Emergency Planning Guidance to Local Authorities", which was issued to local authorities in 1985, is available to members of the public on request and can be found in public libraries. Work is in hand to revise and amplify the guidance. A booklet entitled "Civil Protection", published in 1986, and a current quarterly magazine of the same name set out the basis of emergency planning arrangements and give information on current issues.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to impose a duty on local authorities to prepare adequate emergency plans for peacetime disasters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: Duties are already imposed on local authorities in relation to emergency planning under the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984. Suggestions for a more general duty on local authorities have been raised as part of current discussions on the structure of the response to civil emergencies in the United Kingdom.

Nuclear War

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what role local authorities will be expected to perform in the event of nuclear war.

Mr. Hurd: The functions of local authorities in a war emergency are prescribed by regulations made under section 2 of the Civil Defence Act 1948, in particular the Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations 1983 (S.I. 1983/1634). Guidance on the discharge of these functions is contained in the publication "Emergency Planning Guidance to Local Authorities", a copy of which is in the Library.

Carlisle Committee

Sir Peter Hordern: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish the Report of the Carlisle committee on parole.

Mr. Hurd: The report of the Committee on the Parole System in England and Wales under the chairmanship of Lord Carlisle of Bucklow is published today. I am most grateful to Lord Carlisle and his colleagues for completing this wide-ranging review in just over a year, and for producing so clear and thought-provoking a report.

The Committee proposes that:

(a) for prisoners serving sentences of four years or less, parole should be replaced by conditional release after half the sentence has been served, unless release is delayed on account of misbehaviour;

(b) for prisoners serving sentences of more than four years, there should continue to be a selective system of parole, but they would become eligible only after serving half their sentences, instead of one-third as under the present law;

(c) everyone sentenced to twelve months or more and all young offenders should be subject to a period of supervision by the probation service after release;

(d) all prisoners should, if convicted of a further offence committed before the full term of their sentence has expired, be liable (in addition to any new sentence imposed) to return to prison for so much of their original sentence as has not already been served in custody;

(e) partly suspended sentences should be abolished.

These and other recommendations would require legislation.

The report deals with issues of great importance. Some of the Committee's recommendations raise difficult questions in the context of the Government's policies for ensuring that the public is adequately protected and that offenders who commit serious crimes are adequately punished. I shall be considering how best these questions might be resolved, and I shall welcome the widest expression of parliamentary, public and professional opinion on the issues raised by the report. It would be helpful if comments on it could reach the Home Office by 10 March 1989.

For the present the existing statutory scheme and the existing criteria will remain in force.

SCOTLAND

Schools (Technical Drawing)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what decisions have been taken on the recommendations made by the review group on the future of technical drawing in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend has decided after careful consideration of the review group's recommendations that a standard grade course in technical drawing should now be developed to replace ordinary grade. The new course will be constructed in modular form so that it can also be offered as a series of short courses to provide maximum flexibility. A revised higher in technical drawing will also be developed to follow on from the new standard grade.

NHS (Funding)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what additional funds he proposes to make available to the Health Service in Scotland;

(2) what extra money he will make available for increased spending in the priority services for the elderly and the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend will announce shortly his plans for financial allocations for all Scottish Office services, including health, for the years 1989-90 to 1991-92.

Sharpen Report

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement outlining the Government's response to the issues raised in the Sharpen report.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government's response to the recommendations of the Sharpen report is set out in my right hon. and learned Friend's foreword to the report published on 9 November and in "The Scottish Health Service" published on 2 November. Copies of both documents are available in the Library.

Investment Grants

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will give (a) the total number of applications received for investment grants from 1 April to the most recent date for which figures are available, (b) the total number of applications approved, (c) the total amount of expenditure involved and (d) the total estimated expenditure planned for that period and the estimated expenditure for 1989-90 and 1990-91;

(2) if he will give (a) the total number of applications received for innovation grants from 1 April to the most recent date for which figures are available, (b) the total number of applications approved, (c) the total amount of expenditure involved and (d) the total estimated expenditure planned for that period and estimated expenditure for 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is as follows for the period 1 April to 31 October.

Regional Enterprise Grants
(i) Investment grants
Number of applications received:	182
Number of applications approved:	84
Value of applications approved:	£527·7 thousand
(ii) Innovation grants
Number of applications received:	46
Number of offers applications approved:	11
Value of applications approved:	£260·6 thousand

The provision for regional enterprise grants for the financial year 1988-89 is £1·6 million. The provision for regional assistance for 1989-90 and 1990-91 will be announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland in his December statement. Figures for individual programmes will be published in the Scottish Commentary in February 1989.

Cancer Screening

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those boards which are planned to have (a) basic screening units and (b) specialist assessment teams as part of the breast cancer screening programme; and if he will give the latest estimates when each team and each unit will commence service.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Basic screening units will be provided for all boards in Scotland by a mixture of static and mobile units, some shared between boards. On the basis of present plans specialist assessment will be available in Lothian, Greater Glasgow, Grampian, Tayside and Ayrshire and Arran health board areas. Lothian and Greater Glasgow are already providing basic screening and assessment services. Discussions are continuing with health boards for the implementation of the whole programme by March 1991.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those boards which are planned to have (a) mobile screening units and (b) static screening units.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: On the basis of present plans the information is as follows:

(a) Health boards with mobile screening units
Argyll and Clyde
Ayrshire and Arran
Grampian
Greater Glasgow
Highland
Lanarkshire
Lothian
Tayside

(b) Health boards with static screening units
Ayrshire and Arran
Forth Valley
Grampian
Greater Glasgow
Lothian
Tayside

A basic screening service will be available in all health board areas although some boards will share a mobile service with neighbouring boards.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the measures being taken to adapt existing computerised call/recall cervical cancer screening programmes to accommodate the breast cancer screening programme.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Because of differences in the age range of women involved and in the screening intervals we are not adapting the computerised cervical cancer call and recall system to accommodate the breast cancer screening programme in Scotland. We are developing a new computer programme, with the assistance of ICL, for the breast cancer screening call and recall and office systems.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those boards where women are already being called by a computerised system for breast cancer screening; and if he will give the age bands of the women being called.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The programme in Lothian health board is currently being run on an existing computer programme which was developed with Edinburgh university during the research into the feasibility of introducing nationwide screening. This will be subsumed early next year by the national computer programme currently being developed. Women in the age range 50 to 64 are being called in Lothian.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about measures currently being taken to train staff to work in specialist assessment teams.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We have established a national training centre in Edinburgh which is charged with the responsibility for training staff from all the disciplines concerned with breast cancer screening and assessment. One course was held in September 1988 and two more are planned for March and September 1989. It is intended to have courses to link in with units being brought into operation.

Legal Aid

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will outline the policy which underlies the decision not to operate the legal aid system for applicants in industrial tribunals.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Because tribunal procedures are not adversarial, and are intended to be comparatively informal, it should not be necessary for persons appearing before them to have legal representation.

Legal advice and assistance is however available to an eligible applicant for general advice on a case coming before a tribunal, and for assistance with preparatory work.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing Benefit

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will provide each member of staff assessing entitlement to housing benefit transitional payments with a copy of the procedure to be used to calculate entitlement.

Mr. Scott: All members of staff at the transitional payments unit have received full training on the procedures for calculating eligibility to transitional payments. These detailed procedures are contained within a manual of instructions to which all members of staff have full access.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what procedure is used to calculate entitlement to housing benefit transitional payments.

Mr. Scott: Leaflet RR4 "Housing Benefit—New Rules" contains an explanation of the method for calculating housing benefit transitional payments. A copy of the leaflet is in the Library. More detailed instructions have been produced for the staff at the transitional payments unit.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claims have been made for housing benefit transitional protection; and how many of these were (a) successful and (b) unsuccessful.

Mr. Scott: Of the 381,574 applications for housing benefit transitional payments received by the transitional payments unit at 22 November, 281,416 had been assessed. 141,140 applications were successful and 140,276 cases were not. In 73,524 cases the transitional payments unit are awaiting the return of inquiry forms from local authorities.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) whether he plans to introduce an appeals procedure against decisions taken under the housing benefits transitional arrangements;

(2) whether there is any current facility for appealing against decisions under the housing benefit transitional arrangements.

Mr. Scott: Transitional payments are made by the Department of Social Security on behalf of the Secretary of State on an extra-statutory basis and therefore carry no formal right of appeal. However we have adopted a review procedure whereby applicants who are not satisfied with the notice of award/refusal which they have received can write to the unit and request that the decision on their application be looked at again. When such a request is received the case is looked at again by a different officer of a more senior grade to check that the case has been dealt with correctly.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current average waiting time for decisions under the housing benefit transitional arrangements.

Mr. Scott: The clearance times for applications for transitional payments will vary considerably from case to case and depend on how long the local authorities take to return the inquiry forms and whether further inquiries have to be made from the unit. But for straightforward cases, it takes at present two days from receiving an application in the unit to sending the inquiry form to the local authority, 31 days for the local authority to return the inquiry form to the unit, and a further five days from receiving that inquiry form at the unit to deciding whether a payment can be made. The transitional payments unit has contacted a number of local authorities to encourage them to return the inquiry forms more promptly.

Social Fund

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he has taken to publicise the availability of the social fund in advice agencies and social services departments.

Mr. Scott: An information pack on the social fund was issued to social services and social work departments, health authorities and a number of voluntary organisations earlier this year. DSS local offices also give information to both statutory and voluntary local agencies about the social fund. Leaflet SB16 "A guide to the Social Fund" is aimed specifically at professional and voluntary advisers and is available from local social security offices.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he has taken to publicise the availability of the social fund; and at what expense.

Mr. Scott: Information about the availability of social fund payments is contained in a variety of leaflets, forms and posters and also in leaflet SB16 "A guide to the Social Fund". Over £550,000 has been spent to date on publicity material on the social fund.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) whether he will publish a table showing the number of (a) social fund applications, (b) social fund rejections, (c) applications for review of the decisions taken by social fund officers, (d) decisions revised by social fund officers on review, (e) applications to the social fund inspector, (f) decisions upheld by the social fund inspector, (g) decisions referred back to the social fund officer by the social fund inspector and (h) applications for judicial review of social fund decisions;

(2) whether he will publish a table showing, for each social fund office in England, Wales and Scotland, the monthly expenditure figures for (a) community care grants, (b) budgeting loans and (c) crisis loans, and indicate for each office the proportion of the projected expenditure which has been spent to date.

Mr. Scott: Information relating to items (a) to (g) is contained in the national tables which have been placed in the Library as my hon. Friend announced in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on 9 November at columns 223-24. There have been no applications for judicial review.

Information on monthly expenditure by local offices and on their individual allocations is also in the Library.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of social fund expenditure has been budgeted to replace those situations previously covered by the Supplementary Benefits (Urgent Cases) Regulations.

Mr. Scott: There is no separate budget specifically to cover the situations previously covered by the urgent cases regulations. However, for planning purposes the total loans budget allocation of £143 million assumed a sum of £33 million being for crisis loans, which includes an element for situations covered by the urgent cases regulations.

Benefits

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the latest estimated amount of benefit being paid out to patients in private care/rest homes for (a) each of his Department's benefit centres, (b) each region and (c) the nation as a whole.

Mr. Scott: Information is not available in the form requested at (a) and (b). However, the annual income support expenditure on people in independent residential care and nursing homes in Great Britain as a whole was estimated to be £878 million in May 1988.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Invisible Earnings

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his estimate for the value of invisible earnings, attributable to design, in each of the last eight years.

Mr. Forth: There are no separate available statistics on the value of invisible earnings attributable to design. Such figures are included indistinguishably in the services sector.

Design Policy

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many of his Department's staff are employed (a) full-time and (b) part-time on design policy.

Mr. Forth: Seven administrative staff are engaged in design policy work in the Department. All seven are full-time employees, but only five spend their whole time on such work.

These figures do not include staff engaged on the design initiative.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the budget for his Department's (a) design campaign and (b) design initiative.

Mr. Forth: The budget allocation for the Department's design promotion work in 1988-89 is £7·526 million. This includes a £5·885 million grant in aid to the Design Council.

There is no specific budget provision for the design initiative which is one of six demand-led consultancy options within the enterprise initiative. However, over 14 per cent. of current demand is for the design initiative and, to date, over £5 million has been committed to design projects.

Unemployment Data

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many of the areas proposed by the Government for inclusion in the list of objective 2 areas have a lower unemployment rate than the Wakefield metropolitan district.

Mr. Maude: Unemployment data are compiled for travel-to-work areas and are therefore not available for Wakefield metropolitan district in a form directly comparable with those for other areas.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many areas proposed by the Government for inclusion in the list of objective 2 areas include or belong to travel-to-work areas which have a lower unemployment rate than Wakefield and Dewsbury.

Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many areas proposed by the Government for inclusion in the list of objective 2 areas include or belong to travel-to-work areas which have a lower unemployment rate than Pontefract and Castleford.

Mr. Maude: The areas proposed by the Government to the European Comission for inclusion in the list to qualify for the European structural funds under objective 2 include Wakefield city metropolitan district as one of the "most seriously affected" parts of West Yorkshire. The district contains the whole of Wakefield and Dewsbury travel-to-work area and part of Pontefract and Castleford travel-to-work area.

The unemployment criterion for objective 2 regions is an average of three year's figures and is to be applied variously at county and lower level, according to the case. There are also other criteria, of equal importance.

There are 22 travel-to-work areas concerned which at present have a lower unemployment rate than Wakefield and Dewsbury, and a further 19 with a rate lower than Pontefract and Castleford.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many intermediate areas in the United Kingdom have a lower unemployment rate than the Wakefield and Dewsbury travel-to-work area.

Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many intermediate areas in the United Kingdom have a lower unemployment rate than the Pontefract and Castleford travel-to-work area.

Mr. Maude: There are at present 17 intermediate areas with a lower monthly unemployment rate than the Wakefield and Dewsbury travel-to-work area, and a further 18 with a lower rate than the Castleford and Pontefract travel-to-work area. These figures are based on the unadjusted unemployment rates for October 1988[1]. The unemployment rate was only one factor considered when the assisted areas map was drawn up in 1984.

Structural Funds (Assistance)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether the European Commission has accepted Her Majesty's Government's view that objective 2 areas should not be restricted to the present assisted areas.

Mr. Maude: Yes. Indeed the proposal to this effect originated with the Commission. Council Regulation (EEC) No. 2052/88 contains no provision to the contrary.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether the negotiations taking place with the European Commission are intended to reduce the list of areas proposed by the Government for objective 2 status; and whether assisted area status will be used as a criterion in such a reduction.

Mr. Maude: This question does not yet arise. The Government put their proposals to the European Commission in July, and stand by them. The Commission is not yet ready to discuss them with us.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Harland and Wolff

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he intends to await more detail of the Sealink interest in placing work with Harland and Wolff before taking a decision on either of the two bids for the privatisation of the yard or the management worker buy-out.

Mr. Viggers: That is my intention though I am anxious that negotiations over the future of the company are concluded quickly.

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to what extent he estimates that delay on deciding on a manager worker buy-out by Harland and Wolff will result in losing the Ultimate Dream contract.

Mr. Viggers: I have been having discussions with the chairman of Harland and Wolff and his colleagues on their ideas for a management/employee buy-out, I am ready to give immediate consideration to any proposal which they may decide to make. No formal bid has yet been put forward and I understand that they are still considering whether to base their proposals on the negotiation of an order for the Ultimate Dream or on other possibilities. The eventual negotiation of any order is, of course, a matter for the buy-out team.

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current position of all bids and declared interests in purchasing Harland and Wolff, Belfast.

Mr. Viggers: Detailed negotiations are under way with two companies which have submitted proposals for the acquisition of Harland and Wolff—both involving orders for new ships. I have also had discussions with the chairman of the company and his colleagues about the basis for a possible management/employee buy-out. Details of these discussions are commercially confidential.

[1] The rates were calculated on the basis of the number of unemployed claimants expressed as a percentage of employees in employment and the unemployed for each travel-to-work area in Great Britain on 13 October 1988.

ENERGY

War Dead (Disposal)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he proposes to make special provision of fuel stocks for use by local authorities in utilising cremation as a means of disposal of the dead in the event of war; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Yes.

Petroleum Engineering Inspectorate

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish staffing figures for the petroleum engineering inspectorate in each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The number of inspectors employed in the petroleum engineering inspectorate and the number of vacancies since 1980 is set out in the table.

Date	Staff in post	Vacancies
June 1980	25	3
July 1981	31	2
March 1982	32	3
October 1985	27	6
March 1987	36	8
July 1988	37	9
November 1988	39	7

Prior to 1988, figures are available only for the dates shown.

WALES

Housing (Rural Areas)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives he proposes taking to relieve the pressure on local people in rural parts of Wales who are experiencing difficulties in securing houses within their own communities, for renting or for purchase, because of the price increases during 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: We propose to increase to £1 million the funds available to local authorities in rural areas with a high concentration of second homes to purchase homes for sale or rent to local people. In addition Housing for Wales will devote a substantial proportion of its development programme to rural areas.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report (a) the actual and (b) the percentage fall in unemployment from August 1983 to August 1988 in each parliamentary constituency in Clwyd, Gwynedd and Powys.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information requested is as follows:

Total unemployed claimants[1]

	August 1983	August 1988	Actual change	Percentage change
Clwyd
Alyn and Deeside	4,684	2,811	−1,873	−40·0

[1] The figures are affected by a change in the compilation of the unemployment statistics in March 1986 to reduce over-recording.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Postage Costs

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what additional postage costs have been incurred by the Inland Revenue since 1 January, by issuing tax assessments to agents in separate envelopes rather than in bulk.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am afraid that this information is not available.

The Department has plans to utilise automatic mail handling equipment that will bring most agents' copies together, though it is unlikely that the new arrangements will be in place before 1990.

Woodlands (Maintenance Costs)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate costs previously claimed by woodland owners as maintenance expenses incurred in their woodland activities which were offset against income derived from other schedule D sources in Scotland and in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that the information on which to base a reliable estimate is not available centrally.

EC Budget Council

Mr. Bright: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent meeting of the European Community's Budget Council.

Mr. Brooke: The council considered the European Parliament's amendments and modifications to the 1989 draft budget established on 26 July at columns 500-01; and the Commission's proposed amending letter. The revised draft budget to which the council agreed totalled 46,190 mecu (about £32,100 million) in commitments and 44,668 mecu (about £31,050 million) in payments.

As regards non-compulsory expenditure, the council accepted amendments totalling 109 mecu (about £75 million) in commitments and 96 mecu (about £65 million) in payments (around one third of the total increases proposed by the Parliament at its first reading of the budget on 27 October). Only a small part of the amendments to which the council agreed were for "privileged" expenditure (the structural funds, the R and D framework programme and the integrated Mediterranean programmes). The bulk were for other, "non-privileged" non-compulsory expenditure. The overall growth of this form of expenditure in the revised draft budget by comparison with 1988 is 5·6 per cent. in commitment and 5·4 per cent. in payments, somewhat below the calculated maximum rate of 5·8 per cent. communicated by the Commission at the beginning of the budget procedure.

As regards compulsory expenditure, the council established an amending letter which, amongst other things, reduces the total provision for agricultural guarantee expenditure in the 1989 draft budget by 1,366 mecu (about £950 million) and increases the United Kingdom's abatement in 1989 under the Fontainebleau mechanism by 50 mecu (about £35 million).

Taking all of these factors together, the revised draft budget is around 2,200 mecu (about £1,500 million) below the overall ceiling in the financial perspective attached to the inter-institutional agreement (IIA) between the council, the Parliament and the Commission.

The council also agreed the basis on which it would enter into a process of co-decision with the European Parliament under article 203(9) of the Treaty to agree the overall growth of non-compulsory expenditure at the time of the Parliament's second reading of the budget in the week beginning 12 December.

CIVIL SERVICE

Foreign Visits

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what amount was reclaimed from his Office for expenditure incurred by Her Majesty's Embassies and High Commissions arising from ministerial visits abroad in the last financial year.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 27 October at column 372.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service in what form his Office maintains details of amounts reclaimed by Her Majesty's Embassies and High Commissions for costs arising from ministerial visits abroad.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 7 November 1988 at column 40.

THE ARTS

Libraries Green Paper

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will place responses to the libraries Green Paper in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: Public disclosures of the responses to the Green Paper is a matter for those who replied: some have chosen to publish their answers. As I said in reply to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) on 7 November 1988 at column 14, I will in due course make a statement in the House on the representations made to me.

DEFENCE

Development Programmes

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) further to the Government's reply to the third report from the Defence Committee, House of Commons Paper 674, how long a delay in a development programme must be before it is considered significant enough to report to the Defence Committee;

(2) what other criteria, apart from the length of time, are considered when deciding whether or not to inform the Defence Committee of delays in development programmes.

Mr. Sainsbury: A major project statement (MPS) is sent each year to the Public Accounts Committee and the Defence Committee, giving details of in-service dates and development and production costs of major defence equipments. In addition, the first in an annual series of defence equipment project reports (DEPR), containing information of a similar character, was sent to the Defence Committee last May. The primary criterion for inclusion of an individual equipment item in either document is whether it exceeds a cost threshold: length of delay in a development programme has no bearing on inclusion or exclusion. For fuller descriptions of these documents I would refer the hon. Member to HC371 pages 18-22 as regards the MPS and HC340 page xxxiii as regards the DEPR.

AWE Capital Programme

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when he decided to commission the British Nuclear Fuels' audit of the capital works programme at Aldermaston and Burghfield, which reported in February 1986; and why he decided to commission this report;

(2) when he agreed that the controller R & D establishments research and nuclear programmes should carry out a review of 32 AWRE projects; and why he decided to commission this report.

Mr. Sainsbury: Following indications that the estimated total cost of the AWE capital programme was rising and that slippage was forecast, MoD Ministers endorsed a limited independent programme audit by British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. (BNFL) in November 1985. The BNFL report was received by my Department on 7 March 1986. In the light of this Ministers subsequently agreed that the controller establishments and research and nuclear programmes should carry out a review of a wider group of 32 AWE capital and works projects. The reasons for the review are given in detail in paragraph 10—appendix 4 to the Comptroller and Auditor General's report on the "Control and Management of the Trident Programme" (HC 27).

Smith Report

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will publish the Smith report on the future management of non-nuclear research establishments.

Mr. Sainsbury: The report by the defence research study team into the feasibility of establishing the non-nuclear defence research establishments as an executive agency was submitted in the summer. We are now considering the way ahead in the light of its conclusions and recommendations. This will include the question of publication of the report.

Statistics Organisation

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the report on the possibility of using the private sector in the Defence statistics organisation.

Mr. Sainsbury: The report examined the potential for using the private sector in the work of the Defence statistics organisation. It represented a preliminary stage in the process leading towards a full feasibility study. It is not appropriate to publish such an internal advisory document.

Milan 2T

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department will be participating in the Milan 2T tandem warhead development programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: Currently we have no requirement for an alternative Milan warhead and accordingly are not participating in the Milan 2T warhead development programme.

Gunnery Competition

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether British Army units will be participating in next year's Canadian Army gunnery competition.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Challenge

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to improve the fire control system currently fitted to the Challenger tank.

Mr. Sainsbury: Improvement to the fire control system for existing Challenger tanks are currently under development.

Battlefield Lasers

Mr. Allan Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the value of the two contracts placed with Ferranti for the development of battlefield lasers capable of inflicting damage on optical sensors; when the contracts were placed; and if these contracts specify that the lasers should be capable of inflicting temporary damage to the human eyeball.

Mr. Sainsbury: The contract placed wth Ferranti Defence Systems covers investigation of laser technology alone and does not specify the requirement to inflict any damage, temporary or permanent, on any sensor, including the human eyeball. The contract was placed in 1982 but its terms and value are a commercial matter between the Department and Ferranti.

War Dead (Disposal)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department has carried out or commissioned research into the psychological difficulties likely to be experienced by those involved in mass burials in the event of war; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There has not been any research into the psychological difficulties likely to be experienced by those involved in mass burials in the event of war. The effects upon those individuals suffering from post traumatic stress disorder following their experiences in all aspects of the Falklands campaign have been observed.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department has carried out or commissioned research into disposal of the dead in the event of war; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Tri-Service policy on the disposal of bodies of service personnel killed in action overseas was reviewed in 1983, mainly as a result of the Falklands conflict.

It was agreed that bodies of service personnel killed in action should in the first instance, and in accordance with established practice, be buried locally. The question of later burial in military cemeteries close to the battle areas, or of repatriation of the bodies, will be decided after the cessation of hostilities.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements exist in his Department for the provision of military assistance to local authorities for the disposal of the dead in the event of war.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No troops are specifically allocated to undertake military aid to civil authorities. In the event of war, any requests by local authorities for the provision of military assistance to carry out tasks in the community would be considered in the light of the circumstances and availability of resources at the time.

TRANSPORT

Air Misses

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will be issuing a report on the air miss between aircraft of British Airways and Bulgarian Ailines which occurred on 6 February; and if he intends to make a statement to the House.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In accordance with the regulations, a draft of the report has been sent by the air accident investigation branch, in confidence, to those persons whose reputations might be adversely affected by it, to give them an opportunity to make representations to the inspector.

The Chief Inspector of Accidents expects to present the report to the Secretary of State by early in the new year. The report should be published a few weeks thereafter, provided there is no review board requested by affected persons.

London Assessment Studies

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if any limits on access to the London transportation survey model have been laid down in respect of the consultants for the London assessment studies.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning the London assessment studies; and when he expects to make a statement on future road planning for London.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have received representations on various aspects of the assessment studies from the London local authority associations, the London Planning Advisory Committee, individual local authorities, national organisations with an interest in transport matters, amenity groups, residents associations, and members of the public.

The consultants are due to submit their reports in summer 1989. There will then be an opportunity for public comment before any decisions are taken.

Channel Tunnel

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport from how many companies and consortia of companies bids have been invited to pre-qualify for the financing and construction of a new railway link between London and the Channel tunnel by the private sector; and if he will make a statement on the progress with this initiative.

Mr. Portillo: I understand that the British Railways Board's invitation is a general one which has not been restricted to particular companies or consortia. Interest has been expressed by a number of companies, but no firm applications have yet been received by the board. The deadline for applications is the end of January 1989.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether, if British Rail's proposed high-speed line between London and the Channel tunnel is financed in the public sector, the cost of the associated environmental works will form part of the capital cost of the project for the purpose of calculating the rate of return.

Mr. Portillo: Yes.

Marine Inspectorate

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish staffing figures for the marine inspectorate in each year since 1979.

Mr. Portillo: The staff-in-post figures for each of the years are as follows:

	Figures
1979	605·0
1980	582·5
1981	559·0
1982	510·0
1983	504·5
1984	509·0
1985	484·5
1986	446·0
1987	412·5
1988	380·5

Railway Inspectorate

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish staffing figures for the railway inspectorate in each year since 1979.

Mr. Portillo: Staffing figures for the railway inspectorate for each year since 1979, as at 31 December, are:

	Number
1979	36
1980	37
1981	37
1982	35

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Deoxygenated Water

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evidence he has of the existence and location of large areas of deoxygenated water in the seas around Britain and of the causes of this condition; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: There has been no evidence of any such areas in British coastal waters for a number of years.

EC (Cereals)

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the United Kingdom intervention price for cereals would have been at 1988 values, for each year 1975 to 1988 if there had been no green pound disparity.

Mr. Ryder: The table sets out the prices at which feed quality wheat would have been bought into intervention in the United Kingdom if it is assumed that common agricultural prices had been converted at the market rate of exchange for the pound sterling obtaining at the beginning of the marketing year. These prices have been converted to 1988 values using the GDP deflator.

The amount of levy deducted, per tonne in 1988 values, is as follows: 1986, £4·20; 1987, £4·57; 1988, £8·19.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the United Kingdom intervention price for cereals, at 1988 values, for each year 1975 to 1988, together with the co-responsibility levy, where applicable, which would have been deductable.

Mr. Ryder: The following is the information:

1. Rounded to nearest £1.
2. The prices shown are start of season intervention/buying in prices applicable in the United Kingdom for feed quality grain converted to 1988 prices using the GDP deflator.
3. Prices for 1975 to 1977 were those established under transitional arrangements.
4. Basic co-responsibility levy has been deducted from 1986: the full additional co-responsibility levy has been deducted in 1988, though in practice producers will receive some refund of this. The amount of levy deducted per tonne in 1988 values, is as follows: 1986, £3·76; 1987, £3·75; 1988, £7·06. (Although from 1 January 1989 this will be reduced to £5·57.)

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what he anticipates will be (a) the United Kingdom and (b) total European Economic Community intervention stocks of cereals at 1 January 1989.

Mr. Ryder: At 13 November 1988 the quantity of unsold intervention stocks held in the Community was 9·9 million tonnes of which 1·4 million tonnes was held in the United Kingdom. I cannot forecast possible changes in these stocks by 1 January, but a note setting out the volume of intervention stocks in the United Kingdom and the EEC is deposited in the Library of the House and is updated monthly.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current annual consumption in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the European Economic Community of (i) cereals produced within the European Economic Community and (ii) cereals imported from outside the European Economic Community.

Mr. Ryder: The information requested, relating to the past complete marketing year (1987-88) is as follows:

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the total European Economic Community intervention stock levels for cereals, at 1 January in each year from 1975 to 1988.

Mr. Ryder: The unsold intervention stocks, at a date nearest to 1 January for each of the years 1977 to 1988, are as follows. Stock levels for 1975 and 1976 are not available.

Animal Corpses (Cremation)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department has carried out or commissioned research into the mass cremation of animal corpses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department has gained experience of the mass cremation of animal corpses in dealing with disease but has not carried out or commissioned any specific research into the matter.

War Dead (Disposal)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement regarding the prevention of pollution of food supplies arising from the disposal of the dead in the event of war.

Mr. Ryder: Arrangements for those killed in the event of war would depend on the type of attack sustained. Any hazard to food supplies would be assessed in the light of circumstances.

HEALTH

NHS (Agency Staff)

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he intends to review the amount agencies charge the National Health Service for hiring medical staff for work in hospitals or as locums; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No. Health authorities may have to pay over 120 per cent. more for an agency doctor than they would for an NHS-employed doctor doing the same job. The spending on agency staff increased from £26·3 million in 1984-85 to an estimated £32·2 million in the current year. I have today told health authorities that the amount that they can pay agencies supplying locums will be pegged at 1987-88 levels. This will save some £750,000 in England this financial year. I am consulting health authorities, the medical profession and the agencies about proposals designed to produce further savings in future years.

Care of the Elderly

Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list by regional health authority (a) the number of 65 to 70 year olds receiving National Health Service care and (b) the number of 65 to 70 year olds receiving private sector care;

(2) if he will list by regional health authority (a) the number of 70 to 75 year olds receiving National Health Service care and (b) the number of 70 to 75 year olds receiving private sector care;

(3) if he will list by regional health authority (a) the number of 75 to 80 year olds receiving National Health Service care and (b) the number of 75 to 80 year olds receiving private sector care;

(4) if he will list by regional health authority (a) the number of 80 to 85 year olds receiving National Health Service care and (b) the number of 80 to 85 year olds receiving private sector care;

(5) if he will list by regional health authority (a) the number of people over 85 years old receiving National Health Service care and (b) the number of people over 85 years old receiving private sector care.

Mrs. Currie: There are many aspects of care for elderly people provided by the NHS. We do not hold information about the use made of all NHS services, on the basis of age groups. Similarly we do not hold information by age group on the use made of all kinds of private sector care.

Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the balance of care for the elderly, between the private and public sectors;

(2) whether his Department is monitoring the growth of the private sector in the field of care of the elderly; and what steps are being taken to measure whether the private sector can meet future consumer demands.

Mrs. Currie: We collect annual statistics on provision in private nursing homes and residential care homes registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984. We do not collect information centrally about private domiciliary care. We see the future of both health and social services care as one in which the individual and his or her family should have a choice. In the light of Sir Roy Griffiths' report we are considering how the provision of care should be organised across all sectors to best address future consumer demands.

Intermediate Treatment Initiative

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many projects funded under the intermediate treatment initiative of local authority circular 63/3 have had their grants withdrawn or suspended; and for what reasons.

Mrs. Currie: A total of 110 projects were set up under the intermediate treatment initiative in England. None have had their grants withdrawn. Initiative grants are paid on a quarterly basis. A number of projects have had such payments suspended at some point. This was because either they accumulated a large balance of unspent grant; or their annual acounts were overdue; or, in a few cases, because the project did not fully comply with the conditions of the grant. Grants to three projects are currently suspended for one of these reasons.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the hospitals in Birmingham which have received ministerial visits since June 1987.

Mrs. Currie: On 1 July 1988 I visited Selly Oak hospital, south Birmingham.

Geriatric Patients

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for health how many geriatric patients in the Newcastle district health authority area are waiting for placement in (a) geriatric hospitals and (b) residential homes.

Mrs. Currie: We do not have information in the precise form requested. Available information is as follows. On 31 March 1988, the latest date for which we have figures, six patients were on the Newcastle district health authority geriatric medicine in-patient waiting list. We do not have figures for the number of patients awaiting admission to residential homes. The hon. Member may wish to consider requesting other information from the health and local authorities concerned.

Cancer Screening

Mr. Frank Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list those districts which are planned to have (a) basic screening units and (b) specialist assessment teams; and if he will give the latest estimates when each team and each unit will commence service;

(2) if he will list those districts which are planned to have (a) mobile screening units and (b) static screening units;

(3) if he will list those districts where women are already being called by a computerised system for breast cancer screening; and if he will give the age bands of the women being called.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) on 1 November 1988 at columns 596-97.

All family practitioner committees have the necessary computer software to provide screening offices with invitation lists. Precise arrangements to phase the calling of the women aged between 50 and 64 resident in the districts served by the initial screening centres over the next three years will vary from unit to unit.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give, at current prices, the cost of a mobile basic screening unit.

Mrs. Currie: The cost of mobile mammography screening equipment varies in accordance with the complexity of the procedure that it is designed to carry out. Typical costs exclusive of VAT for the mobile trailer, X-ray machine, electricity generator and film handling system would range from £63,000 to £88,000. The cost of the towing vehicle is not included in these figures.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the measures being taken to adapt family practitioner committee computerised call/recall cervical cancer screening programmes to accommodate the breast cancer screening programme.

Mrs. Currie: All family practitioner committees in England and Wales now have the ability to provide health authorities with computerised call/recall facilities to enable them to carry out their breast screening programme.

Nurses (Grading)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will take steps to ensure that no National Health Service official or manager who holds a contract embodying a provision that confers on its holder financial reward related to financial outturn such that he benefits from low gradings of nurses and midwives is permitted to sit on any appeal tribunal or panel that hears appeals by nurses or midwives against their grading.

Mr. Mellor: No health service officials or managers stand to benefit financially from low gradings of nursing and midwifery staff.

Care in the Community Report

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to make a statement on his proposals arising from Sir Roy Griffiths' report on care in the community.

Mr. Mellor: We are continuing to give very careful consideration to Sir Roy's report and to the numerous representations that we have received. We will bring forward our own proposals in due course and are mindful of concern that action should not be unduly delayed.

NHS Employees

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) men and (b) women are (i) district general managers and (ii) regional general managers in the National Health Service.

Mr. Mellor: Of the 14 regional general managers 13 are men and one is a woman. The 190 district general managers comprise 182 men and eight women.

NHS Vacancies

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the current level of vacancies for technicians in the National Health Service laboratories;

(2) what is the current level of vacancies for medical secretaries in the National Health Service;

(3) what has been the percentage change in the use of agency staff as medical secretaries in the last six years.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold such information centrally.

Maternity Leave (Nurses)

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what maternity leave nurses in the National Health Service are entitled to.

Mr. Mellor: Nurses, along with all other NHS employees, who have more than one year's service are entitled to 18 weeks paid maternity leave. Those with more than two years' service are additionally entitled to unpaid maternity leave until the end of the 29th week after the week of confinement. In all cases, additional unpaid leave may be granted at the discretion of the employing authority.

Nurses

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the average number of years worked in the National Health Service by nurses after qualification.

Mr. Mellor: Recent trends in the numbers of nursing and midwifery staff in post and newly qualified nurses suggest that following qualification each nurse provides 11-12 years full-time service in the NHS.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current level of vacancies for nurses in the National Health Service.

Mr. Mellor: We do not collect information about vacancies centrally. However, a sample survey for the Pay Review Body showed that at 31 March 1987 about 3·5 per cent. of all nursing and midwifery staff posts had been vacant for three months or more.

Hostel and Community Services

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those district health authorities and special health authorities which have set up trusts or charities to run hostel/community services for patients discharged from long-stay hospitals; what are the estimated savings to each authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We do not routinely collect information of the sort requested. I will write to the hon. Member to let him have such information as we do hold on health authority activity in this field.

War Dead (Disposal)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement regarding the current guidance issued to local authorities regarding the disposal of the dead in war; and if he intends to issue revised guidance;

(2) what reserves of equipment and chemicals are held by his Department for distribution to local authorities to assist in the disposal of the dead in the event of war; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if his Department has carried out or commissioned research into the psychological problems likely to be encountered by those involved in mass burials in the event of war; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what advice is being offered by his Department to London local authorities regarding the disposal of dead bodies in the event of nuclear war;

(5) what discussions have taken place between his Department and religious leaders regarding the disposal of bodies in mass graves in the event of nuclear war; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Government advice concerning the disposal of the dead in war, including nuclear war, is contained in section 10 of the Home Office publication "Emergency Planning Guidance to Local Authorities" issued in 1985. A copy is available in the Library. The "Handbook on Environmental Health" to which reference is made in part 5 of the DHSS health circular (88)31—"Emergency Planning in the NHS: Health Service Responsibilities in Civil Defence"—issued in July 1988, is currently the subject of consultation. This handbook which is concerned with environmental health in war, has been prepared by an outside consultant and it contains advice on the prevention of the spread of disease and the promotion of community health. The handbook includes a chapter dealing with the disposal of the dead and also takes account of the emotional and social stress which might be caused by mass casualties. A copy will be placed in the Library on publication.

There is no central reserve of equipment or chemicals held by the Department to assist in the disposal of the dead. There have been no discussions between leaders of religious denominations and this Department on the disposal of bodies in mass graves.

Women Employees

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement about the employment of women in the National Health Service;

(2) if he will list those district health authorities which provide work place nurseries and specify how many places they provide.

Mr. Mellor: Women make a vital contribution to every aspect of the National Health Service and comprise about 70 per cent. of its work force. We are committed to ensuring that no unnecessary obstacles are placed in their way in terms of their training, career development and the opportunity to deploy to the full their talents, professional skills and expertise. Whilst much has been done in this area, further progress is possible. That is why we agreed to the establishment of the national steering group on equal opportunities for women in the NHS, whose general remit was to consider the personnel policies and procedures necessary to provide equality of opportunity in NHS employment, and in particular to make recommendations for management of the career break. Although the group has yet to report, it has already issued practical guidance direct to health authorities, including advice about the procedures of recruitment and retention, which the then Health Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) publicly welcomed and commended to authorities. Once we have the group's report, which I understand is expected shortly, we shall consider what further action we can take.

We do not hold information about the numbers of workplace nurseries and places available locally within district health authorities centrally.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Action Trust (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any proposals to establish a housing action trust in Nottingham.

Mr. Trippier: No.

Landfill Sites

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any intention of privatising landfill sites controlled by local authorities.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have no plans to do so at present. We are considering ways to introduce greater competition into local authorities' waste disposal operations.

Sewers and Water Mains

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much has been invested in repairs and maintenance of (a) the sewer systems and (b) the water mains in (i) the Severn Trent water authority area and (ii) Stoke on Trent, in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Moynihan: Information requested by the hon. Member is not held centrally.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what debts are currently attributable to (a) the sewer systems and (b) the water mains in (i) the Severn Trent water authority and (ii) Stoke on Trent.

Mr. Moynihan: Water authority debt is attributable to the undertaking as a whole, and not allocated by service area.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates he has of the expenditure needed to bring (a) the sewer systems and (b) the water mains of (i) the Severn Trent water authority area and (ii) Stoke on Trent up to modern standards.

Mr. Moynihan: Information requested by the hon. Member is not held centrally.

Land Holdings

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish a table showing (a) the land holdings and (b) their current asset value of the Severn Trent water authority (i) generally and (ii) in Stoke on Trent.

Mr. Moynihan: The net asset value of the authority's land and buildings is shown in its published annual accounts. The other information is not available.

Rating Reform

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each charging authority area, attributing grant income received by precepting authorities under the current grant system to each area in proportion to the aggregate of rateable values in that area (a) the estimated rate support grant for 1988-89, (b) the estimated amount of revenue support grant which would have been payable in 1988-89 under the proposed new grant system, had the new system been in its first year of operation in 1988-89 with full safety nets and assuming needs assessments at 1988-89 grant-related expenditure levels, (c) the estimated amount of revenue support grant payable in 1988-89 under the proposed new grant system after the end of safety nets and assuming needs assessments at 1988-89 grant-related expenditure levels, (d) the difference between (a) and (b), (e) the difference between (a) and (c) and (f) the difference between (b) and (c) showing aggregates for each figure for each class of charging authority and for each region.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information consistent with the published community charge figures has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each charging authority area, attributing grant income received by precepting authorities under the current grant system to each area in proportion to the aggregate of rateable values in that area (a) the estimated revenue from non-domestic rates in 1988-89, (b) the estimated amount which would have been raised in revenue by the national non-domestic rate in 1988-89, after the end of transitional arrangements and assuming rateable values at current levels, (c) the amount which would have been paid from the national non-domestic rating pool to each area in 1988-89, (d) the difference between (a) and (b), (e) the difference between (a) and (c) and (f) the difference between (a) and (c) showing aggregates for each figure for each class of charging authority and for each region.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

London Fire and Civil Defence Authority

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to confer powers under section 138 of the Local Government Act 1972 to the London fire and civil defence authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. Earlier this year we considered very carefully the views of the authority on this point and decided that the case had not been made for legislation to confer on them powers under section 138 of the Local Government Act 1972.

Kings Cross Fire

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what additional resources have been made available to Camden borough council to deal with immediate and longer term problems associated with the Kings Cross fire.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Additional resources have not been made available to Camden borough council for this purpose.

"Tidy Britain"

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will identify by location and type the 19 experimental projects currently underway as a result of the "Tidy Britain" initiative; and what involvement is being provided by local authorities.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The experimental projects currently being carried out by the "Tidy Britain" group fall into the following categories and locations:

Transport——Rail
  Liverpool to Southport line
  London Bridge to Sevenoaks line
  Glasgow to Motherwell line

Major roads
  A38, 10 mile section from Bristol city centre northwards.
  A1 Lincolnshire section.

Service areas
  A1—Grantham services area
  M6—Keele motorway services

London Underground
  Elephant and Castle station
  Dollis Hill station
  Hampstead station
  Turnham Green station
  Charing Cross station
  Leicester Square station
  Westminster station

Commercial areas——Capital high street
  Bond street

Provincial high streets
  Nottingham
  Nelson
  Doncaster

Industrial estate
Gateshead, adjoining Garden Festival site

Local Government——Peripheral city
Leeds—three areas around city centre

Litter Act enforcement (North East)
Seven district councils in Northumbria:
Blythe
Tynedale
North Tyneside
Sedgefield
Middlesbrough
Hartlepool
Durham

County litter plans development
Lancashire
Buckinghamshire
Berkshire
Oxfordshire

Review of the Community Environment Programme
Wigan
Llanelli
Bridlington
Dunfermline
Rhondda

Tourism
Yorkshire Dales
Forest of Dean
Tower of London
Beaches in East Anglia and Wales (Glamorgan coast)

Special events
The Derby
The Bath and West Show
Cowal Highland Gathering

Local authorities are involved in the majority of projects. The form of their involvement varies with the type of project.

Water Authorities (Pensions)

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements the Government are making to ensure that water authority employees can continue to be members of an index-linked pension scheme.

Mr. Howard: Each authority is offering a "mirror image scheme", so called because it will offer the same benefits, including full index linking, for the same level of contribution by employees as the local government superannuation scheme. The water authorities are preparing trust deeds for the mirror image schemes, and the Secretary of State will not approve these until he is satisfied that the commitment to match the local government superannuation scheme has been met. The mirror image scheme will be open to employees who stay in the local government superannuation scheme until the transfer date, when the assets, rights and liabilities of water authorities, except for those being vested in the NRA, are vested in their successor companies. As an additional alternative, most water authorities are offering employees new water pension schemes with a different mix of benefits which includes limited index linking; these new water pension schemes will continue to be available after the transfer date.

Employees will be able to choose whether to leave their accrued pension rights in the water authorities superannuation fund, which will in future be administered by the National Rivers Authority, or to transfer accrued rights to the mirror image schemes or the new water pension schemes being set up by the water authorities. The pension rights of existing pensioners, and those who have left or choose to leave their accrued rights in the fund will also be preserved. Clause 160 of the Water Bill would give the Secretary of State a power to pay into the fund and a duty to ensure that the fund can meet its liabilities.

The Government will introduce further regulations under the Superannuation Act 1972 to make index-linked increases a liability of the fund and to make an appropriate distribution of the resources already in the water authorities superannuation fund between that part of the fund which will continue under the management of the NRA, and the pension schemes run by the industry so that these schemes will be funded to meet both basic pension liabilities and those index-linked increase liabilities that have accrued up till the date of transfer of members into those schemes.

The Water research centre, the Water Authorities Association, the Water Industry Training Association, British Water International Ltd., the International Association on Water Pollution Research and Control, and the International Water Supply Association will also be able to participate in these arrangements.

Enterprise and Planning Zones

Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what provision he proposes to make for the environmental assessment of projects in enterprise zones and simplified planning zones.

Mr. Howard: Department of the Environment Circular 24/88 (Welsh Office 48/88) and Scottish Development Department Circular 26/88, published today, explain that the Secretaries of State will use their powers to ensure that future enterprise zone and simplified planning zone schemes include provisions which exclude from the planning permissions granted by the schemes any developments which would require environmental assessment under the Town and Country Planning (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1988 or the Environmental Assessment (Scotland) Regulations 1988.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kurdish Refugees

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Government of Iraq concerning the treatment of Kurdish people.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have repeatedly expressed our concern for the treatment of the Kurdish community in Iraq and the need to respect their human rights.

Alex Lein

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make urgent representations to the Soviet Government to allow Alex Lein to join his sister in Israel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We regularly make representations to the Soviet authorities on behalf of those, such as Alex Lein, refused exit visas to allow them to leave the Soviet Union. We raised Mr. Lein's case most recently at the bilateral consultations on human rights in Moscow on 23 June and will continue to raise it at every appropriate opportunity, including during Mr. Gorbachev's forthcoming visit, until he is allowed to emigrate.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 28 November 1988

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Cathedrals (Maintenance Costs)

77. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners, how much money the Church Commissioners expect cathedral authorities to raise for the maintenance of their fabric and towards their running costs; how much is contributed to each of these costs by the Church Commissioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alison: Each cathedral is independently responsible for raising the money required for the maintenance and repair of the cathedral's fabric. The Commissioners give the cathedral authorities some assistance with staff salaries and clergy housing.

PRIME MINISTER

Surplus Food and Wine

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the impact on world food prices of the European Economic Community's disposal of food and wine at very low prices; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so. The Montreal mid-term GATT meeting is taking place the following week and will be addressing agriculture as a key element in negotiations.

Excise Duties

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the proposal by the Commission to harmonise excise duties.

The Prime Minister: No. I understand that this matter will next be discussed at the meeting of the Economic and Finance Council (ECOFIN), on 12 December.

Economic League

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister if she will issue instructions that no Government contracts be given to companies which subscribed to the Economic League.

The Prime Minister: No. The Government will continue to award their contracts on the basis of value for money.

Design Seminar

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Prime Minister what progress has been made in implementing the 25 suggestions for action which she made to the design seminar in 1982.

The Prime Minister: The first design seminar at 10 Downing street held in January 1982 marked the start of a substantial programme of Government activity to promote design awareness.

Recommendations made by senior industrialists, designers and educationists at the seminar fell into two broad themes: industry and education. These have been the centre of our design policy and objectives.

Our records show that 31 separate recommendations were made at the 1982 seminar. Of these, 27 could be said to be addressed to the Government or agencies close to them (for example the Design Council). Of those 27, activities and initiatives have been pursued in respect of 23.

Examples are:

design consultancy support for over 6,000 projects in small and medium size firms; measures to improve and assist the teaching of design in primary and secondary schools;

measures to improve design education at tertiary level and introduce design modules into management and business courses;

major awareness campaigns aimed at industry involving DTI Ministers; encouraging closer collaboration between the teaching of product design and engineering design;

assisting a greater volume of research and reports on design issues;

support for a wide variety of non-Government bodies to help in the task of spreading design awareness.

At a second design seminar I held in January 1987 our efforts were welcomed by a similar audience who urged the Government to continue with them. We have done so.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Mozambique

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is (a) the estimated expenditure on aid to Mozambique in the current year, (b) the breakdown of that expenditure by programme and project and (c) the degree of priority currently being given to Mozambique within the Government's overall aid programme.

Mr. Chris Patten: Gross British bilateral aid to Mozambique in 1987, the latest year for which figures are available, was £22·8 million, including expenditure on Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference (SADCC) projects in Mozambique. The main elements were programme aid (£5·2 million), project aid (£5·1 million) disaster relief (£4·6 million) and food aid (£4·5 million). Mozambique was our seventh largest bilateral recipient last year.

Vietnam

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, what is his policy on the provision of development aid and food aid to Vietnam.

Mr. Chris Patten: We do not provide bilateral development aid or food aid to Vietnam.

Through the European Community we are contributing our share (about £540,000) of the cost of emergency food aid for Vietnam supplied this year.

Development Assistance

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the United Kingdom's net official development assistance as a percentage of gross national product for each calendar year from 1978 to 1987; and what is his estimate for 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information for the years 1978 to 1987 is as follows:

	Per cent.
1978	0·45
1979	0·51
1980	0·35
1981	0·42
1982	0·37
1983	0·35
1984	0·33
1985	0·33
1986	0·31
1987	0·28

It is not possible accurately to predict the percentages of gross national product which net official development assistance will constitute in 1988 or 1989.

International Development Association

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will propose to the World Bank that all funds from the International Development Association should be free rather than loans.

Mr. Chris Patten: No. The International Development Association lends at no interest on highly concessional terms for 35 to 40 years and repayments are recycled to increase the funding available for new lending. Moreover, agreement on the present lending terms for IDA was an essential element in achieving the last replenishment level of well over $12 billion.

Aid Programme (Cost)

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the expected cost to the aid programme of (a) Britain's contribution to the International Monetary Fund enhanced structural adjustment facility and (b) the Chancellor of the Exchequer's debt initiative in each of the years 1988-89 to 1990-91 inclusive for which an estimate has been made by his Department.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answers I gave the hon. Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor) on 25 November, at column 13.

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will propose to the European Community that all past aid to the poorest countries be converted to grants and all new aid in the form of a gift.

Mr. Chris Patten: Most European Community aid to the poorest countries is already given as grants. Loans are provided generally to the better-off developing countries, and on generous terms.

Repayments on past loans provided under the European development funds for the poorest ACP countries have recently been recycled as a contribution to the Community's special programme in favour of low-income, debt-distressed countries in sub-Saharan Africa.

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will consider asking both the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund to adopt the six guidelines agreed by Ministers at the development assistance committee meeting in December 1987.

Mr. Chris Patten: As the guidelines agreed at the development assistance committee propose, the IMF and World Bank are paying increasing attention to designing structural adjustment programmes with safeguards to protect the poor. The World Bank is increasing support for special compensatory lending programmes in a number of countries in order to preserve basic social services during periods of adjustment. We welcome these developments. But the decisions on how to implement adjustment programmes, and how to protect vulnerable groups, must ultimately be for the Governments of the countries concerned.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Mental Illness (Prisons)

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what have been the findings of the study by the Institute of Psychiatry, London on (a) schizophrenia and (b) mental illness in the prison population; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As I said in my reply to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad) on 25 January, at column 1, this important study, which is intended to provide a sound basis on which the Department is able to consider the further development of its policies on mentally disordered offenders in the prison system, will take three years. The report from the Institute of Psychiatry is expected in October 1990.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new arrangements have been made for patients in prison suffering from mental illness to be assessed by National Health Service medical staff prior to release back into the community; what has been the extent of such assessments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The desirability of developing such arrangements for facilitating the continuity of care of a mentally disordered inmate on release from prison was included in the recommendations of a joint Home Office/Department of Health working group and accepted by the Government. Progress is as follows.

The Departments are in discussion about guidance to regional and district health authorities and also with the professions on how this ought to be given effect. Revised prison department instructions and a model letter for use by prison medical officers, both presently in draft, will provide an administrative framework for NHS medical staff to be invited to visit an inmate and to discuss his case with the responsible medical officer.

Mentally Disordered Offenders

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made as to whether the courts are fully aware of the non-custodial options open to them, particularly their powers of remand to hospital for report or treatment under sections 35 and 36 of the Mental Health Act 1983, and of the facilities available in the health system; what trends in exercising such options have taken place since the report by the director of prison medical services on mentally disordered offenders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Statistics on the extent to which courts have made use of their powers under sections 35 and 36 of the 1983 Act since the publication of the report of the interdepartmental working group on mentally disordered offenders will be available in due course. We are also considering research into the remand prison population, with particular reference to the procedures for courts to obtain medical reports and the working of these provisions.

A handbook for the courts on the treatment of offenders already describes their powers under the 1983 Act, and we are preparing further guidance to the courts and other criminal justice services.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what information he has as to how many of those convicted of crimes in England and Wales in each of the last two years had previously been admitted to National Health Service mental illness hospitals with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses;

(2) how many of those convicted of crimes in England and Wales in 1987 have ever been admitted to National Health Service mental illness hospitals and units with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not collected centrally about the medical history of persons found guilty by the courts.

Immigration Detention Centres

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what procedures are in place to stop Securicor staff at immigration centres and on immigration escort duty, from giving to outside agencies names and other information about those in detention and being escorted, and those associated with them.

Mr. Renton: Securicor staff are instructed to regard all information provided for the performance of their duties and all other information gained by them in the course of their duties as confidential and not to be discussed with any unauthorised person.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what undertakings have been given by Group 4 on rights of appeal for existing Securicor staff employed at immigration detention centres against a refusal to employ them by the Group 4 security company.

Mr. Renton: Any such arrangements would be matters for the companies concerned and not for my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will cancel the contract recently awarded to the Group 4 security company to administer immigration detention centres and provide escorts.

Mr. Renton: No.

Criminal Justice Act

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy, when laying a commencement order for section 35 and 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, to provide that it should cover all cases decided since Royal Assent.

Mr. John Patten: No.

Passport Office

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will implement the recommendations of the Rayner efficiency scrutiny report to increase the number of staff working in the passport office by a minimum of 326.

Mr. Renton: No such recommendation appears in the report of the 1982 Rayner scrutiny of the Passport Office. The trade union's claim for 326 additional permanent staff derives from an outdated formula for matching staff resources to peaks in demand. This bears no relevance to present-day requirements, particularly in the light of computerisation. Staffing levels at the United Kingdom passport offices are closely monitored, and have in general kept in step with the increasing demand for passports. Officials are in consultation with the trade unions about them.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the increase of the number of staff working in the passport offices in (a) Scotland, (b) Glasgow, and (c) Edinburgh, for each year since 1982.

Mr. Renton: The information for the Glasgow passport office, which is the only one in Scotland, is given in the table.

Year (At 1 April)	Staff Complement	Staff in Post
		Permanent	Casual	Total
1982	90	85	14	99
1983	89	89	11	100
1984	[1]83	85	6	91
1985	83	79	9	88
1986	83	83	11	94
1987	83	84	9	93
1988	83	82·5	21	103·5

[1] Six posts transferred to Belfast in June 1983 together with work on postal applications from Northern Ireland.

The recently computerised Glasgow office is gradually taking on the work of dealing with postal applications from the London area and by mid-1989 its complement will have increased by some 100 posts.

Television

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what national and international measures he is seeking to guarantee that television companies and the interests they represent will not interfere in the free and open political process once companies are allowed to transmit their programmes from other countries into the United Kingdom;

(2) what international agreements Her Majesty's Government are seeking to enter into for the safeguarding of the quality, standards and balance of the variety of television programmes once satellite and other television systems produced or broadcast from abroad are allowed into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Renton: We hope that, following the successful outcome of a conference of Council of Europe Broadcasting Ministers in Stockholm last week which I attended, it will be possible within the next two or three months to finalise work on a draft Council of Europe convention on transfrontier television. This will establish a European code of minimum standards for transfrontier services, whether transmitted terrestrially or by satellite or cable, covering both programme content and advertising. The convention will ensure that programmes meet certain fundamental requirements on matters such as taste, decency, objectivity and balance. Discussions are also continuing in the European Community on a draft directive on broadcasting which is intended to provide a limited harmonisation of member states' law on advertising, the protection of children and copyright in the broadcasting field. It will remain open to individual countries to impose on their own broadcasters stricter requirements than those contained in the convention of directive if they so choose, and we have recently set out our own proposals for future broadcasting legislation in our White Paper "Broadcasting in the 90s: Competition, Choice and Quality."

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list all the representatives of (a) television viewers' associations, (b) education authorities, (c) experts and (d) members of unions representing television workers, consulted by his Department prior to the publication of his White Paper on broadcasting;

(2) if he will list all the Scottish journalists, broadcasters, producers, entertainers, presenters and administrators with experience in television consulted by him prior to the publication of his White Paper on broadcasting.

Mr. Renton: The development of the proposals in the White Paper was informed by the many representations received and by the lively public debate on broadcasting matters. Representatives of the groups mentioned, including those involved in broadcasting in Scotland, have played an important part in this process. The Government would welcome any comments on its proposals by 28 February 1989.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what specific research was carried out and information gathered by his Department regarding the comparative standards and quality of the present television systems of Australia, Canada, Belgium, Denmark, France, West Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain, Sweden, the United States of America and the United Kingdom, prior to the publication of his White Paper on broadcasting.

Mr. Renton: I made visits to the United States, Canada, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, Belgium and the Federal Republic of Germany specifically to study the broadcasting systems in those countries. During the visits I had discussions with broadcasters and others about the nature of the services provided and the arrangements concerning the quality and standards of programming. More generally, we have kept in touch with developments in other countries through bilateral contacts, discussions in fora such as the Council of Europe and the European Communities, and by studying the available relevant material.

Police Training Centres

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will reconsider the decision to develop additional accommodation at the police training centre at Ryton rather than at the district police training centre at Cwmbran.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Police Training Council, whose membership includes representatives of the police service, local authorities and the Home Office, unanimously agreed at its meeting on 17 November, inter alia, that Ryton police district training centre should be the main site for the provision of additional police probationer training places. We do not propose to reconsider that decision. Some redevelopment at Cwmbran is currently under way to provide an additional 39 training places.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to improve the staffing levels at Wakefield prison in order to enable the Wednesday communion service to be reintroduced, and to enable category A prisoners to attend the service in the prison chapel on Sunday evenings.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The governor and chaplaincy can offer a full programme of religious activities, including a monthly Wednesday communion service. Providing extra discipline officers to allow category A prisoners to attend chapel twice on Sunday would be disproportionately costly.

Identity Cards

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Association of Chief Police Officers on the introduction of an obligatory national identity card; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have asked the Association of Chief Police Officers for a considered and updated view on the reintroduction of a national identity card system, and we are awaiting their response.

Electronic Surveillance

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the future role of electronic surveillance in the handling of offenders.

Mr. John Patten: The Government have not reached any final conclusions on the role of electronic monitoring in the handling of offenders. The Green Paper, "Punishment, Custody and the Community," (Cm. 424) suggests a possible use in helping to enforce curfews. This will be considered in the context of the other proposals in the Green Paper. Meanwhile, we are setting up a pilot project using electronic monitoring on unconvicted volunteers who have been remanded on bail. This will give us practical experience of the benefits and limitations of monitoring.

"Punishment, Custody and the Community"

Mr. Alton : To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the introduction of supervision and restriction orders, as outlined in the Green Paper, "Punishment, Custody and the Community."

Mr. John Patten: We have invited comments on the Green Paper proposals by 31 January 1989 and we shall consider them carefully.

Magistrates and Probation Officers (Liaison)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to improve the liaison and dialogue between magistrates and probation officers.

Mr. John Patten: This is indeed important. It is one of the key themes of the paper, "Tackling Offending: An Action Plan," which was issued by the Home Office in August to promote community-based punishments for young adult offenders. It asks the probation service to consult the courts on local "action plans" and suggests that communication between the probation service and the courts should be improved especially in the areas of social inquiry report writing and content of supervision programmes. We hope that local action plans will take effect next year.

The Home Office has recently taken part in discussions with the Magistrates' Association on working relations between the probation service and the magistrates' courts and on the work of probation liaison committees. Guidelines on both these subjects have been adopted by the Magistrates' Association as a result.

Lunar House

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many extra staff have been employed at Lunar house since 19 May; and in what capacities.

Mr. Renton: In my reply to the hon. Members for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) and for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) on 19 May, at column 533, I said that vigorous steps would be taken to recruit some 100 additional staff for the immigration and nationality department at Lunar house during the current financial year. As a result of these efforts, a net additional total of 83 staff have so far been recruited for general administrative work.

I also said on 19 May, at column 533, that we planned to recruit more than 100 staff outside London to deal with the influx of citizenship applications. We have recruited 121 staff to man the new nationality office which was opened on 22 August at Liverpool specifically for this work.

Student Demonstration

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to how many (a) police vans, (b) police officers, (c) boats, (d) helicopters and (e) horses were deployed by the Commissioner of Police in responding to the demonstration of students in and around Westminster on the afternoon of Thursday 24 November; and what was the cost to public funds of the operation.

Mr. Hurd: I understand from the Commissioner that the information is as follows:

	Numbers
Police vans	36
Police officers	1,500
Boats	2
Helicopters	1
Horses	47

I shall reply on the matter of additional costs as soon as possible.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to which officer was in overall charge of police strategy and tactics on the afternoon of Thursday 24 November in deciding the police response to the demonstration of students in and around Westminster, and as to who gave the order for a charge of mounted police to take place across Westminster bridge and as to what prior warning was given to demonstrators before this charge occurred.

Mr. Hurd: I understand from the Commissioner that the senior officer in overall charge at the scene of the demonstration was the deputy assistant commissioner of No. 8 area. It was the commander (operations) No. 8 area who authorised the advance of mounted officers on Westminster bridge. He did so only after repeated announcements by megaphone that this action would be taken if the demonstrators failed to disperse.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the establishment of the Nottingham city technical college will lead to the closure of any maintained secondary schools in Nottingham.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Nottingham city technology college has a strictly defined catchment area, served by a number of maintained secondary schools. It is unlikely that its establishment will lead any of these to close although it may reduce the demand for places.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the latest total estimate of the amount of public funds necessary to establish the Nottingham city technological college; and what is the latest total estimate of private investment available to establish this city technology college.

Mrs. Rumbold: The cash limit for capital expenditure on the Nottingham city technology college is £9·05 million. My right hon. Friend has agreed exceptionally to underwrite up to 85 per cent. of this figure. However, sponsorship of £1·6 million has now been pledged by the private sector and I am sure that more will be raised.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what deadline has been set for companies wishing to sponsor the Nottingham city technology college to indicate their financial commitment.

Mrs. Rumbold: All CTCs will aim to stimulate a continuing private sector investment.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received following the announcement of the proposed establishment of Dixons city technology college.

Mrs. Rumbold: None.

Top-up Loans

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will set out how much a single student living in private rented accommodation outside London would gain or lose as a consequence of his proposals in the White Paper, "Top-up loans for Students", Cm. 520, to abolish student entitlements to welfare benefits and introduce top up loans, assuming rents of (a) £20 per week, (b) £25 per week, (c) £30 per week and (d) £35 per week, taking the assumptions of grant levels as set out in the White Paper, paragraph 3.8;

(2) if he will set out how much a single student living in private rented accommodation in London would gain or lose as a consequence of his proposals in the White Paper, "Top-up loans for Students", Cm. 520, to abolish student entitlements to welfare benefits and introduce top up loans, assuming rents of (a) £35 per week, (b) £40 per week, (c) £45 per week and (d) £50 per week, taking the assumptions of grant levels as set out in the White Paper paragraph 3·8.

Mr. Jackson: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible, and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, how many students will be (a) better off and (b) worse off as a result of his proposals to introduce top-up student loans in 1990-91 and to freeze parental contributions and the level of student grants at their 1990-91 level, as well as abolishing entitlements to welfare benefits.

Mr. Jackson: The White Paper, "Top-up Loans for Students", includes illustrative figures for the value of the top-up loans in 1990-91. On that basis, the great majority of students affected by the top-up loan facility would be better off. The small numbers whose benefit claims would have exceeded the top-up loan facility will be able to seek further resources from the access funds.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the total amounts to be spent on student grants in the year 2007-8 assuming the freezing of the parental contribution scales and the level of grants at their 1990-91 levels as set out in paragraph 3·8 of the White Paper Cm. 520 and increases in average earnings of (a) 7·5 per cent. per annum, (b) 5 per cent. per annum and (c) 3 per cent. per annum.

Mr. Jackson: Expenditure on student grants in the year 2007-8 will depend on the rate of inflation between now and then. On the White Paper's assumption of a constant 3 per cent. rate of inflation after 1990-91, expenditure in 2007-8 on mandatory awards for maintenance for students in England and Wales will be £350 million in 1990-91 prices compared to forecast expenditure of £588 million in 1990-91. Expenditure on discretionary awards, and on the proposed access funds, will be additional. Since the grant and the parental contribution will remain in fixed proportion, the figures do not vary with the assumption about average earnings. The parental contribution scale will be reindexed annually so that after 1990 parents whose income rises at the same rate as the earnings trend will pay the same contribution from year to year in cash terms.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how the figures of £420 per year and £310 in the final year of study as top up loan facilities for students set out in the White Paper Cm. 520, paragraph 3.8, were calculated; and what assumptions were made in arriving at those figures.

Mr. Jackson: The maximum top-up loan facilities proposed in the White Paper have been set at levels which will provide students with additional resources and make it unnecessary for them to look for supplementary support from the social security system. The lower maxima for the final year have been calculated to cover 38 weeks—the average duration of term time and short vacations—instead of 52.

Student Grants

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of (a) the reduction in the value of the student grant since 1979 in real terms, (b) the current value of travel costs reimbursement, had they been retained at 1979 levels, (c) what would be the level of the minimum maintenance award at 1979 levels and (d) the average increase in parental contributions between 1979 and 1988.

Mr. Jackson: The information is as follows:

(a) The rate of maintenance grant for mandatory award-holders studying outside London and away from the parental home has fallen by about 13 per cent. since the 1979-80 academic year.

(b) The level of reimbursable travel expenses was not specified; amounts varied according to students' circumstances.

(c) The minimum maintenance award payable in 1979-80 would be £614 at September 1988 prices.

(d) The average parental contribution in the 1988-89 academic year is forecast to be 100 per cent. above the average contribution in 1979-80 at September 1988 prices.

Mature Students

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many applications were made by mature students for entry to courses in higher education in each year since 1979; how many were accepted; and what percentage this represented in each of those years.

Mr. Jackson: The numbers of United Kingdom domiciled applicants and acceptances aged 21 and over through the Universities Central Council on Admissions scheme have been as follows.

Information on applications to public sector courses is not available.

United Kingdom domiciled applicants and acceptances aged 21 and over (Universities)

	Applicants	Acceptances	Percentages accepted
1979	17,893	6,956	38·9

1987	19,117	8,436	44·1

University Applicants

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many university applicants there were in each year since 1979; how many candidates were finally accepted in each of those years; and what percentage this represented in each of those years.

Mr. Jackson: Applicants and acceptances through the Universities Central Council on Admissions scheme for universities in the United Kingdom were as follows:

Academic year of entry	Applicants	Acceptances	Percentage accepted
1979	166,362	82,398	49·5
1980	168,354	84,695	50·3
1981	167,096	80,341	48·1
1982	171,496	77,752	45·3
1983	172,738	74,860	43·3
1984	173,674	77,431	44·6
1985	176,553	82,889	46·9
1986	173,779	84,524	48·6
1987	176,246	86,546	49·1

Until 1982, applications for places in the university of Aberdeen, and until 1985 those for the universities of Glasgow and Strathclyde were partly outside the UCCA scheme. The earlier figures are, therefore, not strictly comparable with the later ones because of changes in the number of institutions within the scheme.

Students (Statistics)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the number of students in (a) universities, (b) PSHE institutions and (c) all higher education institutions, from social group III M, social group IV and social group V, for each year since 1979, and list these figures as a percentage of the total number of students of known social group in each sector.

Mr. Jackson: The numbers and percentages of United Kingdom domiciled candidates accepted through the Universities Central Council on Admissions for entry to United Kingdom universities whose social class background is known are shown in the table.

Similar information is not collected by the Polytechnic Central Admissions System, but a sample survey of young people attempting examinations qualifying them for HE entry in 1985 indicated that about 26 per cent. of young entrants to PSHE institutions were from social classes III M, IV and V.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list in the Official Report the age distribution of students in (a) further and (b) higher education according to the folowing ranges: 18 to 21 years, 22 to 25 years, 26 to 35 years, 35 to 50 years and 50 plus years;

(2) at the latest available date, how many people in Great Britain aged 16 years or over were in (a) schools, (b) sixth-form colleges, (c) further education colleges, (d) polytechnics, (e) universities and (f) other educational establishments, separating them by age into single years from 16 to 20 years and in bands aged 21 to 24 years, 25 to 29 years, 30 to 39 years, 40 to 49 years and 50 years and over.

Mr. Jackson: The readily available information is as follows. Sixth-form colleges are included in the figures for schools.

[3] Including central institutions in Scotland.

[4] Provisional. Excluding some 1,300 students for whom data by age are not available.

[5] Excluding 9[illegible]100 (provisional) students enrolled on nursing and paramedical courses at Department of Health and Social Services establishments.

[6] Including 11,084 students (5,561 men) in polytechnics in England and Wales. Including estimated age detail for 1,663,000 students aged 16 years or more in adult education centres; excluding youth clubs and centres, 77,000 in 1984-85 (England). Excluding 531,000 (provisional) students on courses run by responsible bodies for whom age detail was not available.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the total number of home full-time and sandwich students in higher education in each year since 1979; what has been the total full-time equivalent number of part-time students in higher education in each year since 1979; and what has been the total number of home full-time entrants to unversities in each year since 1979.

Mr. Jackson: The information required is shown in the following table.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the age participation index for students in full-time advanced further education in each country in the European Community.

Mr. Jackson: The readily available information as follows:

New entrants[1] to higher education

Country[2] (main ages on entry)	Latest year	[3]Participation rate (percentage)
Denmark (18-20)	1985	35
France (18-20)	1985	32

Netherlands (18-20)	1985	38
Portugal[4]	1984	14
Spain (18-20)	1985	31
United Kingdom[6] (18-21)	1986	32

[1] Includes full-time and part-time students entering higher education for the first time ie excluding postgraduate students and others already having a qualification in higher education. Not all other countries may adhere to this general definition.

[2] Compatible information is not available for Luxembourg since most higher education is undertaken abroad. Ireland figures partly estimated; data for Belgium war not available.

[3] To aid comparison and overcome the problem of the varying lengths of courses in different countries the participation rate used is the percentage of all new entrants (defined above) to a derived relevant single year group. The latter is calculated by taking the total populations for the ages providing at least 70 per cent. of the new entrants and dividing by the number of ages involved. For the United Kingdom this is the population of ages 18 to 21 divided by 4, OECD recommend this procedure.

[5] Includes new entrants to postgraduate courses.

[6] Excludes the private sector and students from abroad. Includes nursing and paramedical students at Health Department establishments.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the latest progress in research into schizophrenia.

Mr. Jackson: The Medical Research Council's schizophrenia and allied conditions committee has reviewed the current state of research and has recently published its findings and recommendations. A copy of the committee's "Research into Schizophrenia" is held in the Library. The council's neurosciences and mental health board is now considering the recommendations.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much of its 1987-88 budget the Medical Research Council spent on research on (a) mental health and (b) schizophrenia; and what percentage these figures represent of the Medical Research Council's total budget.

Mr. Jackson: I understand that in the last financial year, 1987-88, the Medical Research Council's expenditure on research specifically into mental health (including addiction) was £10·4 million, which represents 8 per cent. of its overall budget. The council's expenditure on schizophrenia was £461,000, or 0·3 per cent. of its budget. The MRC is also funding a range of other research which may be of relevance to mental health and schizophrenia.

Further Education

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report tables showing the proportion of pupils who remain in full-time education after it has ceased to be compulsory, broken down by each local education authority area, by sex, by ages 16, 17, and 18 years, by type of school or college, maintained school, further education college, private school, and so on, for the latest available year and for each of the preceding 10 years, together with aggregate totals.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The following table sets out the percentage of 16 to 18 age groups staying on in full-time education and on YTS in 1975, 1987 and 1988.

Disaggregated information in respect of individual local education authorities will be published in a statistical bulletin early in the new year.

Nursery Education

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been (a) the total number and (b) the proportion of three and four-year-olds in (i) nursery schools, (ii) nursery classes, and (iii) primary classes for each year since 1958.

Mr. Butcher: The total number and proportion of three and four-year-olds in maintained nursery schools and nursery classes and infant classes in primary schools in England each year since 1980 was as follows:

WALES

Schizophrenia

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many current occupants of National Health Service hospital and unit beds in Wales have a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses; and what those figures are as a percentage of (a) mental and (b) all beds in Wales.

Mr. Grist: It is not known how many of the current occupants of National Health Service hospital and unit beds in Wales have a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses; however, it is estimated that on average about 376 beds in 1987 were occupied daily by this category of patient. This represents 9·8 per cent. of the average daily occupied by mental illness[1] beds and 2·3 per cent. of all occupied beds.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list the admissions by diagnosis and order of admissions, including percentage change in numbers and rates per 100,000 population, of patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses in Wales in the last year for which figures are available;

(2) if he will list the admissions by diagnosis and order of admissions, including percentage change in numbers and rates per 100,000 population, of patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses, in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many patients with a primary diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in Wales in the last year; and how many were admitted for a hospital stay more than once during the year.

Mr. Grist: In 1987, there were 1,832 discharges or deaths of persons with a primary diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses from mental illness hospitals and units in Wales; it is not known how many patients were admitted more than once during the year.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to how many people discharged from hospital following a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses and subsequently taken by the police under the Mental Health Act to hospital have been refused admission in Wales in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Grist: This information is not available.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what research projects his Department is funding in the current year to test the effectiveness of community care for people suffering from schizophrenia psychoses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The Department of Health's directly commissioned research covers Wales and I refer my hon. Friend to the replies given to him today by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in Wales in each of the last five years; and how many of them were taken into local authority residential care in the same year.

Mr. Grist: The information is given in the following table:

Schizophrenia Psychoses

	Deaths	Discharges	Discharged directly to local authority
			Residential Accommodation	Home for the Mentally disordered
1983	21	1,715	11	3
1984	20	1,701	19	0
1985	22	1,833	13	8

[1] Mental illness, mental illness (children), adolescent psychiatry, elderly mentally infirm and psychogeriatrics.

	Deaths	Discharges	Discharged directly to local authority
			Residential Accommodation	Home for the Mentally disordered
1986	26	1,824	17	1

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received in the last year on the provision of community care for patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses discharged from National Health Service mental hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: We have received a number of representations about the development of community based services for those suffering from mental illnesses, including those with schizophrenia. The bulk of these have been received in response to our strategic proposals for the development of mental illness services which we published in a consultation document in May of this year. We intend to issue a final document in the light of these responses next spring.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to how many people discharged from mental illness hospitals in Wales in the last year after a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses having been proved vulnerable homeless subsequently became voluntary homeless.

Mr. Grist: The information is not available centrally.

Mental Illness Hospitals

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many new mental illness hospitals were opened and how many closed in Wales in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Grist: None, in the year ending 31 March 1988.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the mental illness hospitals scheduled to (a) open and (b) close in (i) the current and (ii) the next year.

Mr. Grist: In its strategic plan, South Glamorgan health authority has proposed the closure of the Royal Hamadryad hospital during 1988-89, with all beds being transferred to St. David's hospital, Cardiff.

No mental illness hospitals are scheduled to open in 1988-89 and none is scheduled to open or close in 1989-90.

Hospital Services

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future of the hospital service in Gwynedd.

Mr. Grist: My right hon. Friend is currently considering the proposals of Gwynedd health authority for the future of hospital services within its district. It would therefore not be appropriate for me to make a statement at this stage.

Mentally Ill People

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what funds have been specifically earmarked for the care of the mentally ill following the closure of mental hospitals in Wales in the last year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: No mental illness hospitals have closed during the last year. In 1988-89 some £2·4 million of additional central funds have been allocated to Welsh health authorities for new projects for the care of people with a mental illness.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many residential places in the community will be provided in (a) the current and (b) the next year for those discharged from mental hospitals in Wales.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is not available. The number of places in homes for the mentally ill in each local authority in Wales is published in "Activities of Social Services Departments in Wales," a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Psychiatric Nurses

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many community psychiatric nurses there have been in Wales in each of the last two years.

Mr. Grist: At 31 October 1988 district health authority records showed there to be 178 (whole-time equivalent) community psychiatric nurses (mental illness) in post in Wales. No reliable figure is available centrally for 1987.

University of Wales

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received nationally and internationally concerning the closure of the University of Wales college of medicine research team for the care of the elderly.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: To date, 43 representations have been received from England and Wales.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will reconsider the decision not to renew the contract with his Department of the University of Wales college of medicine research team for the care of the elderly from January 1989.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. We do not consider that there are grounds for reviewing the decision which was taken following a thorough assessment of the team's work by independent experts led by the chief scientist of the Department of Health. However, funding is to continue until 31 July 1989 so that certain research projects may be completed.

The contract with the current team for care research into care of the elderly has been extended until 31 July 1989 and discussions are taking place with the University of Wales college of medicine about future long-term arrangements.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will consider an appeal mechanism analagous to that at the Medical Research Council in respect of the University of Wales college of medicine research team for the care of the elderly loss of contract with the Department.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales why the project by the University of Wales college of medicine research team for the care of the elderly on the prevention of fractures is to be abandoned.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: During its extension period the research team is to secure the data base for this study. Subject to the future arrangements for reorientation of research into the care of the elderly the data may be drawn upon for a similar study.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations have been made to him (a) in [illegible]our of and (b) against the proposed increase in tolls on the Severn bridge.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend received 16 representations; all against the proposed increases in toll charges. These have been referred to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport who is the responsible Minister.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration he has given to assessments of the impact of the Severn bridge on the economy of (a) Newport and (b) Gwent in determining his policy in regard to (i) tolls and (ii) the need for a second crossing.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The impact of the Severn bridge tolls on the Welsh economy has been considered at two public inquiries when the inspectors concluded that their effect was insignificant. A further public inquiry into proposed toll increases will be held in February 1989.

The existing Severn crossing will continue to carry traffic safely for many years to come. However, in view of the increased traffic arising from economic growth, not least in Gwent and the rest of south Wales, the Government have made clear their commitment to provide a second crossing of the estuary before traffic flows are too great for the existing bridge. That is why urgent actions have been announced.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Elderly People

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what provision is made for emergency payments by his Department for elderly people who have had their pension stolen and are unable to pay for their basic necessities.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: When an order book or girocheque is stolen arrangements are made to continue payment of benefit.

If, in the interim, the pensioner needs help with living expenses he may apply for a social fund crisis loan.

Death Grants

Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, how many death grants were given in the year 1986-87 and at what cost; how many funeral payments were paid during the year 1987-88 and at what cost; how many funeral payments have been made, so far, in the current financial year and at what cost; how much of the amount paid out in the current financial year is due to be repaid to the social fund; and how much has been repaid.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information is as follows:

	Type of payment	Number of payments	Amount paid £
1986-87	Death grants	585,335	17,560,050
1987-88	Funeral payments	36,986	16,185,943
1988-89	Funeral payments to 31 October 1988	19,129	9,331,130

Funeral payments are recoverable from the estate, if any, of the deceased. Up to 31 October 1988 a total of £196,487 has been recovered.

Pensions

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the number of old-age pensioners who receive (a) no national insurance pension and (b) less than the full amount of national insurance pension because their contribution record is incomplete, distinguishing between single pensioners, married pensioners where the wife only has category B pension and married pensioners where both spouses have been in paid work; and if he will give an indication of the age levels of those affected.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In 1987-88 there were approximately 95,000 people of pensionable age not in receipt of national insurance retirement pension and in receipt of supplementary pension[1].

Statistics do not give the breakdown between single and married pensioners in receipt of retirement pension. The table shows numbers of pensioners according to category and age, who are in receipt of less than 100 per cent. full basic retirement pension.

Aged	Category A men	Category A women	Category BL wives	Category ABL wives[2]	Widows

[1] Supplementary Pension replaced by Income Support in April 1988.

[2] Category A—Pension on own contributions.

Category BL—Pension on husbands contributions.

Category ABL—Combined category A and BL pensions where this combined rate does not exceed the category BL rate.

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the current rate of supplement to the basic rate of retirement pension for those aged 80 years and above if that supplement had been indexed to the cost of living since its introduction in 1971; and what would be the annual cost of adopting such a rate.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The current rate of age addition for pensioners aged 80 and over, if uprated in line with prices since its introduction, would be £1·29. The annual cost of adopting this rate would be approximately £13[illegible] million. This represents additional expenditure of approximately £105 million.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will bring forward proposals to give equal treatment in respect of the retirement pension to pensioners with earned income to those with unearned or investment income.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no plans to do so. The earnings rule is a test of retirement and therefore applies only to income from work.

Bradford Resource Centre

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many staff from local offices of his Department in the Bradford district have undertaken training courses organised by Bradford resource centre since 1979.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None.

Hardship Payments

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the criteria for eligibility for a hardship payment; why all applicants for hardship payments are referred to his Department in London; what published information is available to the public about eligibility for hardship payments; and what action he proposes to make the public more aware of the availability of hardship payments.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Each application is deat with on its merits but the factors which are considered when making decisions on severe hardship include the young person's health and vulnerability, (including the threat of homelessness); the availability of any income or savings; the prospects of a speedy entry in YTS; the availability of work, including casual and part-time employment; whether the claimant has any friends or relations who could put him up or otherwise offer assistance, and the extent and pressing nature of any financial commitments.

Cases are referred to headquarters for decision as this leads to a consistency of treatment in exercising this safety net power and provides an opportunity to monitor the new scheme.

One million copies of a supplement to leaflet FB23 "Young Persons guide to Social Security" were distributed in May and contained advice about the severe hardship provisions. The main leaflet has now been reprinted and the October edition contains the same information. An explanation of the factors taken into account in deciding applications under these provisions was given to the press on 30 September and a copy has been placed in the Library.

There is no intention to issue any further publicity.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many young people aged 16 and 17 years who left school in the summer have been granted hardship payments since 12 September; how many applications for hardship payments have been refused; how many applications are under consideration; what is the average payment made; and if he will list this information for each local office of his Department in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In the period from 12 September to 18 November a total of 1,213 applications for a direction by the Secretary of State under the severe hardship provision had been received. In 802 cases (66 per cent.) a direction was given to enable payment to be made and in 411 cases (34 per cent.) a direction was refused. The figures include both those who left school this summer and those who left previously. Decisions are given by telephone within 24 hours of the full details being referred to headquarters. Once a decision is given that a young person is entitled to income support on the grounds of severe hardship the adjudication officer in the local office awards benefit at the appropriate weekly rate for the duration of the direction.

The other information requested is not immediately available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Housing Benefit

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the rent ceilings for each London borough above which no more housing benefit is payable.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There are no such ceilings. Under the Housing Benefit (General) Regulations 1987 (S.I. 1987/1971) it is for local authorities to determine the level of rent eligible for housing benefit in each case. Authorities have powers to limit the rent eligible for benefit where they consider the rent is unreasonably high. Any decision by the authority to limit the eligible rent must be taken on an individual case basis, taking account of the personal circumstances of the claimant.

Under the arrangements for subsidising local authorities' housing benefit expenditure, a reduced rate of subsidy is payable where housing benefit is awarded on rents above the subsidy rent threshold for the area. The table shows the subsidy thresholds for the London boroughs.

Community Care

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will publish in the Official Report the advice issued to regional and local offices by Branch RD22 of his Department on how to reply to letters from hon. Members regarding the low level of spending on community care grants; and why it was considered necessary to issue such advice.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In order to ensure that letters from local offices to hon. Members are as helpful as possible, regions were reminded in July of general advice on the handling of correspondence and of the following points about social fund budget management:

—local office budgets are annual, not monthly

—the overall aim is, within the framework of the law, directions and guidance, to use the local office budgets to ensure, as far as is reasonably possible, that applications of similar priority receive similar treatment throughout the year, whenever they occur

—the first few months of the scheme may not be typical, for instance in terms of the volume of applications.

Income Support

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the additional cost of increasing the income support personal allowances in April 1989 to the illustrative rates in the technical annex to "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9691), uprated to take account of changes in the Rossi price index for the periods taken into account in the 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989 upratings and increased in respect of the 20 per cent. community charge contribution; and what would be the resulting personal allowance.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The personal allowances are set in the context of the overall rates of income support, including the rates of children's allowances and the various premiums. It would therefore not be meaningful to recalculate one element of the illustrative figures in the technical annex.

Child Support

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update to November 1988 the information provided in the reply of 8 November 1982 to Dr. McDonald the then hon. Member for Thurrock, Official Report, columns 51-52, relating to child support.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is set out in the table and reflects the fact that uprating is now in April each year.

Cold Weather Payments

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were receiving income support in each of the categories eligible, for cold weather payments (a) in Great Britain and (b) from each of the Derby social security offices, at the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Scott: Information is not available in the form requested. Maximum estimates of those in the eligible categories, which take no account of the effect of capital, are as follows:

	Numbers
Higher pensioner premium	520,000
Pensioner premium	1,250,000
Disability premium	270,000
Disabled Child premium	10,000

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Postal Services (Disruption)

81. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether he will draw up contingency plans to eliminate inconvenience to right hon. and hon. Members arising from the disruption of postal services.

Mr. Wakeham: I hope that there will not be any disruption of postal services. In the event of industrial action by post office staff, I regret that it is not possible to isolate totally right hon. and hon. Members. However, I am assured that the postmaster of the Palace of Westminster will make every effort to assist Members who bring special cases of difficulty to his notice.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheepmeat

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the sheepmeat regime.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The EC Commission has recently produced revised proposals for a review of the sheepmeat regime. Discussion on these proposals are at an early stage.

Milk Marketing Board

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the chairman of the Milk Marketing Board; and what was discussed.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have regular contacts with the chairman of the Milk Marketing Board to discuss various issues affecting the dairy industry.

Paper-making Industry

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to receive the three reports, recently referred to by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder), dealing with problems of lead dioxide, chlorine dioxide and bleach, in relation to the paper-making industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: We are aiming to produce the reports referred to in three months. I assume the question refers to the use of paper-based packaging materials. Dioxins can be formed during the bleaching of wood pulp and it has been found that low levels may be present in paper products made from bleached pulp. Recent studies in Scandinavia and North America have suggested that small amounts of dioxins can subsequently migrate into foodstuffs from paper-based packaging materials. The available data indicate that the levels are extremely small and do not pose a hazard to health, but none the less my Ministry is now carrying out a thorough investigation of dioxins in food, including a programme of laboratory analysis, to decide if any action is necessary.

Alternative Land Use

Mr. Adley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with the National Farmers Union on the anticipated alternative uses of farmland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend and I frequently meet NFU office holders and members to discuss a wide range of issues, including alternative uses of farmland.

Nitrates

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he proposes to discuss the desk studies on the effect of nitrates on farmland with industry representatives.

Mr. Ryder: The desk studies will be discussed with industry representatives in the near future.

European Agriculture Guidance and Guarantee Fund

Ms. Quin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list, for each standard planning region, the amount received in financial support from the guarantee section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund, for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. MacGregor: Information on receipts from the guarantee section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund is not recorded by planning region.

Fisheries Policy

Ms. Quin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list, for each standard planning region, the amount received in financial assistance for fisheries from the European Economic Community budget for each year since the coming into force of the common fisheries policy.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Information on financial assistance from the European Community for fisheries is not recorded by planning region.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne may expect a reply to the matter raised with the Parliamentary Secretary Baroness Trumpington on behalf of Mr. D. V. Richards, of Grovewood House, 1 Roseware close, Camborne, on 25 July.

Mr. Ryder: A reply to the letter of 25 July from my hon. Friend was dispatched on 25 November. I understand that officials in this Ministry contacted Mr. Richards direct about the points he raised in this correspondence on 11 August.

Bovine Somatotropin

Mr. Ward: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in view of the surplus of dairy products within the European Economic Community, he will cancel the trial of bovine somatotropin.

Mr. MacGregor: Applications for product licences or animal test certificates under the Medicines Act 1968 must be considered on the basis of safety, quality and efficacy. I am not empowered to take into account economic factors.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Wray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the places or regions in which cattle infected by bovine spongiform encephalopathy are found in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: Up to 25 November, 1,677 cases of BSE had been confirmed in the following counties and regions of Great Britain:

County	Confirmed cases
Avon	16
Bedfordshire	6
Berkshire	22

Mr. Wray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures his Department have introduced to prevent human consumption of beef infected by bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. MacGregor: From 8 August this year, all cattle suspected, on clinical grounds, of being affected with bovine spongiform encephalopathy have been compulsorily slaughtered and their carcases either incinerated or buried.

Nuvan 500 EC

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make the results of research into the presence of residues of Nuvan 500 EC in salmon flesh available to the public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: Surveillance for residues of the active ingredient dichlorvos in the flesh of farmed salmon is in progress and the results will be published in the food surveillance paper series. Until the work is complete it would be premature to make a statement.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when and where the results of research into the environmental and health effects of Nuvan 500 EC will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: Data including the results of research provided by a company in support of the approval of a pesticide are a matter of commercial confidentiality. The publication of such information would therefore be a matter for the company concerned. However, the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland's marine laboratory in Aberdeen is carrying out investigations into the environmental effect of Nuvan 500 EC and its possible toxicity to a number of marine organisms. This work has not yet been completed, but consideration will be given to the publication of the results of research where publication will not breach commercial confidentiality.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether (a) all products known as pesticides and (b) Nuvan 500 EC should comply with the Control of Pesticides Regulations for supply, storage and handling; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: The Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986 cover pesticides as defined in regulation 3. This includes the product Nuvan 500 EC as approved for use in poultryhouses. The regulations cover sale, supply, storage, use and advertisement.

Research

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with the Nature Conservancy Council about future priorities for research on environmentally sensitive agriculture and nature conservation; and if he will make a statement about the outcome of his research programme.

Mr. Ryder: Ministers and officials of my Ministry keep in close touch with the Nature Conservancy Council at all levels and research priorities are a frequent topic in these contacts.

My Ministry is currently in discussions with the NCC about the direction of projects and programmes concerning the monitoring of environmental effects in environmentally sensitive areas, set-aside and the interrelationship between agriculture and the environment, including wildlife and water quality.

Chernobyl (Compensation Claims)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will establish local adjudicating panels to determine the level of compensation to be paid to the 122 farmers in England and Wales who lost outstanding claims following the Chernobyl nuclear accident.

Mr. MacGregor: No, I have already made the Government's position clear on these cases.

Chernobyl (Aerial Survey)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place in the Library the maps and reports of the recently completed post-Chernobyl aerial survey of Cumbria which was shown to representatives of the National Farmers Union at Eden Bridge house, Carlisle, on Wednesday 23 November.

Mr. Ryder: We have not yet received the final report on this survey. The map referred to was a preliminary contour map of the caesium deposition. The numerical interpretation of this data is being carried out and a full report will be placed in the Library of the House when it is available.

Milk Products

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the cost to the European Economic Community for export restitution and other costs for the export of all milk products for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: Expenditure by the European Community on exports of milk products in 1987 was 2,823 million ecu (£2,030 million).

New Zealand Butter

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what decision has been made by the Council of Ministers on New Zealand butter access; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Since United Kingdom accession the Council has on a number of occasions decided upon the level of New Zealand butter imports at a reduced rate of levy. The current arrangement expires at the end of this year and the Council has not yet decided what should succeed it.

Farm Capital Grants

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the future of farm capital grants.

Mr. MacGregor: Since the agriculture improvement scheme was introduced in 1985 there have been many important changes in our agricultural policy. Among these, we have introduced a number of initiatives to assist farmers in conserving the countryside and controlling pollution.In the European Community we have also made good progress in dealing with the surpluses and bringing production more into line with demand. In consultation with my right hon. Friends, the Secretaries of State for the Environment, Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, I have been reviewing the agriculture improvement scheme to see whether capital grants can more closely reflect these changing priorities.

As a result, I have decided to introduce a new grant scheme called "The Farm and Conservation Grants Scheme" in February 1989. Its provisions have still to be negotiated with the EC Commission but, subject to obtaining that agreement, I plan to make the following changes.

First, I intend to increase the assistance we offer to lowland farmers to install facilities for the storage, treatment and disposal of slurry and silage effluent. Grant rates in the lowlands will be significantly improved and the coverage extended, for example, to include fixed disposal piping and safety fencing. I have agreed with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary a provision of up to £50 million over the next three years on these grants. This compares with £17 million spent in the first two years of the AIS. Reducing the incidence of farm pollution must be a top priority for the industry. By these means the Government will be further assisting farmers in tackling the problems.

Secondly, I plan to introduce three new conservation grants. These will encourage the regeneration of native woodlands and of heather moors and assist in the cost of repairs to vernacular farm buildings.

It is clear that certain grants which have helped to stimulate the productive capacity of the industry in the past are less appropriate in present circumstances. Grants for new farm buildings, roads and one or two minor items will be discontinued. Grants which help to keep grazing land in good heart will remain.

For horticulture, enhanced rates of grant for the replacement of heated glasshouses will also remain, with grants for orchard replanting being reinstated, both until the end of 1993.

I believe it is important that the grants, with their increased emphasis on pollution and conservation, should reflect the fact that these are priority areas for farmers in both the lowlands and the less-favoured areas. I plan therefore to narrow the differential for most grants to 10 per cent. I would, however, expect the grassland grants and the three new conservation grants to be of particular benefit in the less-favoured areas.

The arrangements recently announced by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, under which national park authorities can offer additional grants on some items up to a maximum of 80 per cent. will now be adapted to the new grant scheme.

To ensure proper management of the transition from the current scheme to the new one I am closing the agriculture improvement scheme forthwith. Orders taking immediate effect have been laid before Parliament today. Farmers who have already committed themselves to investment in the expectation of claiming grant will now have until 31 May to deliver their claim unless they hold (or have applied for) an improvement plan. Grants already included in an approved improvement plan or one on which approval is awaited will not be affected by the closure. Two specific categories of grant will also be exempt from the closure orders. These are the special glasshouse replacement grants which I announced in July and those for growers in the Isles of Scilly, on which orders were laid on 16 November. In addition, in Northern Ireland only, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be continuing the grants for waste disposal which have only recently been reintroduced there.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Economic League (Subscriptions)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proceedings have been taken, and against which companies, under the Companies Act for failing to declare subscriptions to the Economic League; and what penalties have been imposed on companies for failing to make suitable decarations.

Mr. Maude: Since 1979 no proceedings have been taken by my Department against a company's directors for failure to comply with the statutory requirement to report contributions for political purposes.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he proposes to seek to make amendments to the Companies Act 1967 to stop companies avoiding declarations about subscriptions to the Economic League; and what representations he has received about such companies' failure to make such declarations.

Mr. Maude: I have no evidence that directors of companies are not complying with their obligations under section 235 of the Companies Act 1985 to state in their annual report gifts of money for political purposes, and I have received no representations on the matter.

Mergers and Takeovers

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many British industries which were the subject of mergers or takeovers for each year since 1975, reduced their work force; and what was the number of redundancies in each case.

Mr. Maude: My Department does not maintain statistics on employment and redundancies. The Department of Employment does not maintain statistics on redundancies which can be correlated to merger activity, but overall redundancy statistics by industry are published in the labour market data section of the Employment Gazette.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what evidence is gathered by his Department regarding the effect on efficiency of mergers and takeovers of British industrial companies.

Mr. Maude: My Department monitors available academic evidence.

House of Fraser (Holdings) plc

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he has received the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading as to whether the report of the inspectors on the affairs of House of Fraser (Holdings) plc demonstrates the existence of new material facts such as to justify a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Maude: Yes. On 25 November, in accordance with the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading, my right hon. and noble Friend, the Secretary of State, announced his decision not to refer the acquisition in 1984 and 1985 by Al Fayed Investment and Trust (UK) plc of House of Fraser plc.

Faserwerk Bottrop GmbH

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) whether he has received any representations about discriminatory assistance given to Faserwerk Bottrop GmbH by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany;

(2) what action he proposes to take in the light of the discriminatory assistance given to Faserwerk Bottrop GmbH by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany;

(3) if he will make a statement on the implications for progress towards the single European market of the discriminatory assistance given to Faserwerk Bottrop GmbH by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany;

(4) whether he is aware of any action taken by the European Commission in the case of the discriminatory assistance given to Faserwerk Bottrop GmbH by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have received representations about the assistance given by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany to Faserwerk Bottrop GmbH and officials have discussed this matter both with the Commission and with representatives of the British polypropylene producers. The proposal to grant aid was properly notified by the Federal German Government to the European Commission. The Commission concluded that the proposed aid would not distort competition within the European Community in synthetic fibres for the traditional textile and clothing sector and was consequently compatible with the common market.

The Government fully support the European Commission in its efforts to ensure rigorous and even-handed enforcement of the state aid rules. This is an important aspect of creating a genuine single European market. I would therefore expect the Commission to apply the same criteria in its assessment of any similar aid proposals, including those for United Kingdom companies which meet the criteria for DTI financial support. Officials will be discussing in greater detail the issues raised by this case with the Commission shortly.

Balance of Trade (Iraq)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what are the balance of trade figures for trade between the United Kingdom and Iraq; what export credit guarantee money has been made available to United Kingdom firms since the end of hostilities; and what support is given to United Kingdom businesses by Her Majesty's embassy in Iraq.

Mr. Alan Clark [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The value of United Kingdom visible exports to Iraq in 1987 was £272 million and imports totalled £324 million. (Country of origin basis.)

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave details of new credit facilities offered to Iraq during his recent visit to Baghdad in his written answer to the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) on Monday 14 November, at column 399.

Our embassy in Baghdad provides the normal range of services in support of British exporters.

DEFENCE

Chieftain Tank

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to make known the Government's decision on the replacement for the Chieftain tank.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on Friday 25 November at column 405.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to the implications for employment at Commercial Hydraulics, Liverpool Ltd., in awarding the contracts for the Chieftain tank replacement programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: All relevant factors are being considered.

Tornado

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the timetable to be adopted for the Tornado mid-life update.

Mr. Sainsbury: We hope to reach a decision in the near future on the Tornado GR1 mid-life update programme.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mortgages (Tax Relief)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total loss of revenue to the Treasury arising from mortgage tax relief in each of the last nine years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The estimated costs of mortgage interest tax relief in the United Kingdom are shown in the table. Figures for 1983-84 onwards include the cost of relief given to non-taxpayers.

Cost of mortgage tax relief

	£ million
1980-81	1,960
1981-82	2,050
1982-83	2,150
1983-84	2,780
1984-85	3,580
1985-86	4,750
1986-87	4,670
1987-88	[1]4,800
1988-89	[1]5,250

[1] Provisional.

Secret Service

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for how many years class XX, vote 3, Cabinet Office: Secret Services, has appeared in the Vote on Account.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Every year since the inception of Votes on Account over a century ago, they have applied to the Secret Service Vote in the same way as to all other substantive Estimates.

Taxation

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many tax units aged 65 years and over paid capital gains tax in the financial year 1987-88;

(2) how many tax units aged 60 years and over paid capital gains in the financial year 1987-88.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that the information requested is not available; but it is estimated that some 50,000 taxpayers aged 65 and over incurred capital gains tax liabilities on assets disposed of during 1985-86.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many pensioner tax units pay at the 40p rate.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is estimated that in 1988-89 some 150,000 married couples and single persons aged 65 and over will be liable to income tax at the higher rate. Estimates are based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and are provisional.

Pensions

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many pensioner tax units receive occupational pensions; and if he will break down this figure into bands of occupational pension income of £1,000, up to a maximum or £20,000.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Provisional estimates for 1987-88 based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes are in the table. The estimates cover only those aged tax units where the Inland Revenue has records; many aged tax units with small amounts of occupational pensions will not have records. A more detailed income analysis would be unreliable.

Aged tax units[1] receiving occupational pensions

Occupational pension £ per annum	Aged tax units[1] million
Less than 1,000	1·9
1,000 to 5,000	1·3
5,000 to 10,000	0·3
Over 10,000	0·1
Total	3·6

[1] Single people aged 65 or more and married couples with at least one spouse aged 65 or more.

Banking Services

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will advise when he expects to receive the report of the Jack committee on banking services law; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: The review committee on banking services law under the chairmanship of Professor Robert Jack is expected to pass its report to the Treasury and the Bank of England in January. It is the intention of the Government to publish the committee's report shortly thereafter.

Tax Fraud

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many full-time staff have been engaged in investigation of tax fraud and evasion for each year since 1975.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Inland Revenue resources, expressed as units of full-time staff, employed in investigating tax evasion and tax fraud are as follows:

	Staff units
Year ending 31 October
1980	1,265
1981	1,405
1982	1,580
1983	1,705
Year ending 31 March
1984	1,835
1985	2,250
1986	2,290
1987	2,345
1988	2,600

The earlier figures requested are not available.

Embassies (Rating)

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library a table showing the number of diplomatic domestic properties, total domestic rateable value, the amount of rates paid by Her Majesty's Treasury and the amounts paid to Her Majesty's Treasury by embassies as the beneficial portion for 1988-89 and provide a breakdown of the figures for each rating authority.

Mr. Major: I have arranged for a table showing the information requested to be placed in the Library.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cultural Agreements

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which articles, agreed in the cultural agreement between Her Majesty's Government and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on 31 March 1987, have been implemented; and at what cost to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Eggar: The memorandum of understanding signed on 31 March 1987 is designed to facilitate and encourage bilateral exchanges in the fields of information, culture and education. It contains a number of specific commitments on all of which good progress has been made: two annual Anglo-Soviet public lectures have now taken place; a successful Soviet Week was held in Birmingham in October and arrangements are in hand for a British Week in Kiev in 1990; Protocols on school exchanges and on co-operation in the field of television and radio broadcasting have recently been signed.

The memorandum is, however, essentially designed to facilitate rather than fund initiatives, many of which are private. Contacts have developed rapidly in the last two years with encouragement from both Governments. We are devoting an additional £250,000 per annum promoting Anglo-Soviet activities in the fields covered by the MOU and other related areas.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will publish a table showing (a) the cultural agreements and conventions concluded with other countries since 1979 and (b) the amount of Her Majesty's Government's expenditure on each agreement or convention.

Mr. Eggar: We have concluded the following agreements since 1979. Expenditure for 1988-89 by the British Council, which acts as our agent under the agreements, is shown in brackets. This is not necessarily all directly incurred because of the agreements, although it is all relevant to their purpose.

Ecuador	291,000
Morocco	501,000
Algeria	873,000
Korea	766,000
Venezuela	461,000
Hungary	882,000
Cameroon	259,000
Tunisia	304,000

Slava Uspensky

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise the case of Slava Uspensky of Moscow, who has been refused an exit visa until 1996.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have raised the case of the Uspensky family, including Slava Uspensky, at every suitable opportunity. We will continue to press the Soviet authorities—including during Mr. Gorbachev's forthcoming visit—until exit visas are issued to the whole family.

Thailand

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British people imprisoned in Thailand have submitted requests for King's pardons over the last three years; how many such requests he has supported; and if he will in future make it his policy to support all such applications on behalf of prisoners who are HIV positive.

Mr. Eggar: Over the period from 1985 to date, four British prisoners have applied for King's pardons. Two have been successful, and two have petitions in progress. All are diagnosed HIV positive.

It is not our policy to support applications for royal pardons where the due process of law has been observed. (We do, however, undertake to deliver their applications.) Exceptions to that policy are made on humanitarian grounds and in cases where the death penalty has been imposed. Should a prisoner who is already diagnosed HIV positive develop symptoms of AIDS and a reduction of life expectancy becomes manifest, a case would clearly exist also on humanitarian grounds for seeking the prisoner's early release. In this, policy is no different than had the reduction in life expectancy resulted from some other disease, or had other overriding humanitarian considerations arisen.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many people from the United Kingdom are currently imprisoned in Thailand; how many are held in chains; how many have been so held during the last three years; and what representations he has made to the Thai Government that this practice should cease.

Mr. Eggar: Currently, there are 13 British nationals imprisoned in Thailand. None is held permanently in chains. The wearing of chains is ordered on initial detention, for court appearances and transfers between prisons. They are also imposed for specific periods as punishment for bad behaviour. When British prisoners were held in chains for no apparent reason, consular representations were made to the Thai authorities and the chains were removed. The chains themselves are lightweight aluminium shackles fastened around the legs.

No representations have been made to the Thai Government on the general question, as the system is applied equally to all prisoners whatever their nationality. We have no grounds to seek treatment better than that afforded to Thai nationals.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how often he expects consular staff to visit British people held in prisons abroad; and what has been the frequency of such visits to British prisoners in Thailand during the last year.

Mr. Eggar: Consular staff aim at quarterly visits to British nationals imprisoned in non-European countries. In European countries, where there are only a few prisoners serving long sentences, the aim is to visit every six months and in any event at least once a year.

In Thailand, consular staff try to visit prisoners every four to six weeks, but staff shortages and an expanding work load because of the increasing number of British tourists to that country have combined to extend the period between visits. More staff have recently been dedicated to prison visiting, and the embassy expects the period between visits will soon be on or near its aim.

From November 1987 to September 1988, five consular visits were made to prisoners in Bangkok. Prisons in other parts of Thailand have been visited three times in the same period.

Human Rights (Russia)

Mr. Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will convey to Mr. Gorbachev the widespread concern in Britain over violations of human rights in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Eggar: Yes.

United States President-elect

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will meet the President-elect of the United States of America.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will be taking an early opportunity to visit the United States of America to meet the new Administration.

Fiji

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implications of the new constitution of Fiji for United Kingdom-Fiji relations.

Mr. Eggar: The traditionally friendly relations between the United Kingdom and Fiji continue to exist, and we hope that Fiji will soon be able to return to parliamentary democracy under a constitution acceptable to a majority of all the people there.

Human Rights (China)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last discussed human rights with a representative of the Government of China.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend discussed human rights with the then Chinese Foreign Minister, Wu Xueqian, when he visited the United Kingdom in March 1988.

Middle-East Peace Conference

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest prospects for an international middle east peace conference.

Mr. Waldegrave: We shall continue our efforts to remove the barriers to an international conference on the Arab/Israel dispute. We are encouraged that the Palestine National Council, has accepted Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 as the basis for such a conference.

Odile Harrington

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, during the recent visit to Zimbabwe by the Minister of State, there was any discussion about the human rights implications of the decision of the Chief Justice of Zimbabwe to reduce from 25 to 12 years the sentence passed upon Odile Harrington; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: No. The Zimbabwean Supreme Court's decision to reduce the sentence of Miss Odile Harrington, who is not a British citizen, was taken after I returned from Africa.

Exit Visas (Soviet Union)

Mr. Bendall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make it his policy to encourage the Soviet Union to honour pledges made in international treaties and grant exit visas to those who have been refused them.

Mr. Waldegrave: We already take every opportunity to press the Soviet Government, both bilaterally and multilaterally, to implement in full their international commitments (particularly those contained in the Helsinki Final Act) and to issue exit visas to all those who wish to leave the Soviet Union. Mr. Gorbachev's visit to the United Kingdom from 12-14 December will be a further opportunity to do so.

Nerve Gas (Somalia)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what evidence he has received of the shipments of nerve gas to Somalia; and what representation he has made or will make to the Government of Somalia and to the United Nations in order to achieve international pressure to prevent the use of such materials.

Mrs. Chalker: We are not aware of any evidence to support claims that nerve gas has been supplied to Somalia. In these circumstances it would not be appropriate to make representations to the Government of Somalia or in the United Nations.

Dr. Emilio Alvarez Montalban

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether his Department arranged the programme for Dr. Emilio Alvarez Montalban on his recent visit to Britain on 13 to 18 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The Central Office of Information arranged a programme for Dr. Alvarez at the request of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on whose invitation Dr. Emilio Alvarez Montalban visited Britain between 13 and 18 November.

Mr. Eggar: Dr. Alvarez visited the United Kingdom at the invitation of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total cost to public funds of the recent visit of Dr. Emilio Alvarez Montalban to Britain; and on what budget it was borne.

Mr. Eggar: The estimated total cost to public funds of Dr. Alvarez' recent visit was £1,200. Like any other visit undertaken as part of the sponsored visits programme, it will be charged to the budget of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's information department.

EMPLOYMENT

Tourism Review

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those representations he has received on the tourism review, by organisations and by individuals.

Mr. Lee: The review team has consulted and received representations from a wide range of those involved with the tourism industry, including representative associations, firms in the various sectors of the industry, public sector bodies and individuals. Consultation has been on an individual and confidential basis and it would not be appropriate to publish a detailed list.

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the progress and purpose of the tourism review.

Mr. Lee [holding answer 25 November 1988]: My right hon. Friend announced the tourism review on 18 July. It is due to report to him at the end of the year. Its purpose is to ensure that Government support for the tourism industry continues to be effective and appropriate.

English Tourist Board

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what terms of reference have been given to the consultants employed on the review of the work of the English Tourist Board; and if he will make them known to that board.

Mr. Lee: The terms of reference for the review are:

to consider the role of Government in relation to the industry;

to consider the level and distribution of funding provided by the Department of Employment; to consider the mechanisms by which these funds are applied; and their cost-effectiveness in relation to the Government's objectives;

to consider the implications for the BTA and the ETB of any changes that might be recommended.

These are closely reflected in the announcement my right hon. Friend made on 18 July and are known to both the English Tourist Board and the British Tourist Authority.

Training

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many participants in employment training are over 50 years of age; and what percentage that is of the total.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is not yet all available and will not be available in the precise form requested. However, early indications suggest that 5 per cent. of those starting training are aged 51 and over.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many managing agencies which ran community programme schemes are now operating employment training schemes; and what percentage this is of the total.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is not available. However, at 9 September there were 1,126 training managers and 169 training agents involved in employment training. The majority of former community programe providers are included in these totals or operating as subcontractors to other training managers.

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what backlog exists in interviewing applicants for employment training.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 25 November 1988]: Applicants to employment training awaiting individual assessment with a training agent are waiting on average two weeks from the time they are referred to the programme. The aim is to reduce the waiting period to five days by the second half of December.

Correspondence

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne may expect a detailed reply to correspondence forwarded on 4 May, on behalf of Mrs. J. R. Tummon, of 7 New Lane, Mount Ambrose, Redruth, Cornwall, concerning the resettlement of a disabled person.

Mr. Lee: I have now written to my hon. Friend.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to how many man hours of work were lost in each of the last five years as a result of absence resulting from schizophrenia psychoses.

Mr. Lee: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested.

Bradford Resource Centre

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many staff from unemployment benefit offices and jobcentres in the Bradford travel-to-work area have undertaken training courses organised by Bradford resource centre since 1979.

Mr. Lee: Training for staff employed in unemployment benefit offices and jobcentres in the Bradford district is covered by courses provided internally by the employment service.

The Bradford resource centre is an external body funded by Bradford council which provides courses free of charge. Records of attendance on external courses are kept only if there is a cost to the employment service. It is therefore not possible to estimate the number of staff from unemployment benefit offices and jobcentres who may have attended courses at the centre.

Careers Services

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what action he is taking to encourage local careers services to contact school leavers who are believed not to have obtained a YTS place or a job since leaving school to contact the careers service for advice; and what action he is taking to make known to the public, including school leavers, the availability of hardship payments.

Mr. Cope: Local education authorities are under a statutory duty to observe the Secretary of State's guidance which advises them to take all reasonable steps to help young people find suitable employment or training. Local arrangements to implement this guidance are the responsibility of each local education authority.

One million copies of a temporary supplement to the Department of Social Security's leaflet "Young persons guide to Social Security" were distributed in May and contained advice about the severe hardship provision. The main leaflet, reprinted in October, contains the same information. Additionally, each young person who was likely to cease to be entitled to income support from 12 September was sent a copy of the supplement with the letter telling them that they would no longer be entitled in the normal way. A Department of Social Security press release giving full details was issued on 30 September.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest total of unemployed in Bradford, West; how many (a) men, (b) women and (c) people under 18 years are unemployed, according to the latest figures; and what were the comparable figures for this time in 1987.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the number of unemployed claimants by sex and the number of unemployed claimants aged under 18 years in Bradford, West constituency for October 1987 and October 1988. The figures are affected by September's change in benefit regulations for under 18-year-olds.

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report (a) the actual and (b) the percentage fall in unemployment from August 1983 to August 1988 for each parliamentary constituency in Lancashire and Cumbria.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the actual and percentage change in unemployment from August 1983 to August 1988 for each parliamentary constituency in Lancashire and Cumbria, together with the corresponding levels of unemployment. The figures are affected by the change in the compilation of the count in March 1986 to reduce over-recording.

School Leavers (Bradford)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people under 18 years who left school during 1988 in Bradford have (a) obtained a YTS place; (b) are believed to have obtained employment or (c) obtained a YTS bridging allowance.

Mr. Cope: Further to my reply to the hon. Member on Thursday 3 November 1988, Official Report, column 655, I am now in a position to give revised estimates for Bradford:

(a) By 26 November it is estimated that approximately 2,300 school leavers had obtained a YTS place.
(b) Some 2,000 school leavers had obtained employment by the same date.

Between 11 September and 10 November 938 young people had received bridging allowance.

Job Vacancies

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he proposes to write to the hon. Member for Oldham, West regarding publication of the findings of the research carried out by IFF into job vacancies mentioned in his February White Paper on training, referred to in his answer to the hon. Member for Oldham, West of 15 November, Official Report, column 610.

Mr. Fowler: I have now written to the hon. Member.

Training (Placements)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the number and proportion of trainees who are expected to gain work placements by the end of the first year of employment training.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 25 October 1988]: Plans are for up to 60,000 trainees to join employment training (ET) in the first full year of the programme. All trainees should be offered a mix of directed training and practical training either on a project or on a placement with an employer as required by their individual action plans. The aim is for all ET trainees to benefit from training in a normal working environment.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest data on the number of people on employment training who have started work placement.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 25 November 1988]: Information on the number of people on employment training who have started on placements with employers is not available at present but should be available in January.

Labour Statistics (North-West Norfolk)

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest unemployment figure for north-west Norfolk.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The following information is in the Library. On 13 October 1988 the number of unemployed claimants in the Norfolk, North-West parliamentary constituency was 2,461.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide figures for each year since 1979 for Scotland, Wales and each of the standard regions for (a) the total number of applications to industrial tribunals, (b) the total number of the above cases in which the applicant was successful and (c) the total cost of operating industrial tribunals.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The available information on the number of registered applications and the total cost of operating the tribunals for the calendar years 1979-85 is as follows:

	Applications Registered		Annual Cost England and Wales and Scotland
	England and Wales	Scotland	£
1979-80	34,225	4,768	5,998,000

SCOTLAND

Mental Illness

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new mental illness hospital beds were opened and how many mental illness hospital beds closed in Scotland in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Details of all new hospital developments are not held centrally as minor capital projects are delegated to health boards. One major project, providing 120 new mental illness beds, was opened in 1988 at Parkhead psychiatric hospital.

Details are only held centrally on closures of complete hospitals; no mental illness hospitals were closed in 1988 but some health boards have reduced mental illness bed numbers as transfers to care in the community have taken place.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what funds have been specifically earmarked for the care of the mentally ill following the closure of mental hospitals in Scotland in the last year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No mental illness hospital has been closed in Scotland in the last year.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what figure has been indicated to health boards for 1989-90 as payments under National Health Service Circular 1988 (Gen 18) towards the cost of projects making it possible for the mentally ill to return to or remain in the community; how the funds will be applied; and how many people will benefit.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Decisions have not yet been announced about expenditure levels in the National Health Service for 1989-90.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many residential places in the community will be provided in (a) the current and (b) the next year for those discharged from mental hospitals in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information is not available in the form requested. Data on the provision of residential places are included in annual statistical returns from local authorities on a retrospective basis but such returns do not extend to planned provision.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the mental illness hospitals scheduled to (a) open and (b) close in (i) the current and (ii) the next year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Parkhead psychiatric hospital phase II opened in November 1988. There are no plans to close any mental illness hospitals in the current and next year. Many health boards have plans to reduce the size of mental illness hospitals as places in the community become available.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what research projects his Department is funding in the current year to test the effectiveness of community care for people suffering from schizophrenia psychoses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend is aware of research being undertaken into aspects of schizophrenia, but he is not funding any projects related to the effectiveness of community care for sufferers.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to how many of those convicted of crimes in Scotland in each of the last two years had previously been admitted to hospital with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received in the last year on the provision of community care for patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses discharged from National Health Service mental hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend receives representations from time to time on different aspects of community care, some of which make reference to the discharge of patients from mentel illness hospitals. The Government have consistently made it clear that we are committed to promoting a policy of care in the community for such groups as the mentally ill where such care is appropriate. Since 1979, we have increased substantially, in real terms, the money available to health boards and social work departments. On 1 June 1988 the social work services group issued detailed guidance to these authorities on arrangements for the discharge of people from mental illness and mental handicap hospitals.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how much was spent by his Department last year on the care and treatment of patients suffering from schizophrenia; and what percentage each figure was of total expenditure on (a) mental and (b) all health services;

(2) how much was spent in Scotland in the last year on the care and treatment of patients suffering from schizophrenia; and what percentage that figure represented of total expenditure on (a) mental and (b) all health services;

(3) what is the current annual cost per patient to the National Health Service in Scotland of the care and treatment of patients with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to how many people discharged from mental illness hospitals in Scotland in the last year after a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses having been proved vulnerable homeless subsequently became voluntary homeless.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to how many people discharged from hospital following a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses and subsequently taken by the police under the Mental Health Act to hospital have been refused admission in Scotland in the last year for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many of those convicted of crimes in Scotland in 1987 have ever been admitted to National Health Service mental illness hospitals and units with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy have been found in Scotland for each year since 1979; and what are the principal areas in which it has been found.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The first case of bovine spongiform encephalopathy in the British Isles was identified in November 1986. The disease was made notifiable on 21 June 1988. there have been 35 confirmed cases in Scotland (all in 1988). With the exception of Fife these have occurred throughout all mainland regions, and in Shetland, the highest incidence being in Dumfries and Galloway where the disease has been identified on eight farms.

Nurses

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each health board the number of sisters/charge nurses employed in wards with a two charge nurse system.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally.

Reprocessing Plant, Dounreay

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he proposes to announce his decision on the outcome of the local public inquiry into the proposed European demonstration reprocessing plant at Dounreay.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend is still considering the report of the public local inquiry into the proposed development and he is not yet in a position to predict a date for the announcement of his decision.

Nurses

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will clarify the entitlement of enrolled nurses in respect of (a) taking charge of a ward and (b) the administration of controlled drugs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 25 November 1988]: Enrolled nurses may take charge of wards at management's discretion. Normally this will be on an ad hoc rather than a continuous basis and in situations where more highly qualified staff will be available to assist or take over at short notice. In determining new clinical grades for enrolled nurses, periods spent in charge of wards will have been taken into account by health boards. The administration of controlled drugs is controlled by the Misuse of Drugs Regulations 1985 (SI 1985 No 2066). Two staff are required to participate in order that all aspects of administration can be checked. It is permissible for employers to assign such work to enrolled nurses although they are recommended not to do so unless they have provided appropriate additional instruction and assessed the individual's knowledge and competence to perform the task. Such work is not, however, a factor in determining clinical grading.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Chief Constable

Mr. Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will call for a report from the Police Authority of Northern Ireland as to what is the total cost of advertising the future vacancy of the post of Chief Constable.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Advertising the post of Chief Constable is a matter for the Police Authority for Northern Ireland. I understand, however, that the estimated cost is approximately £9,500.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list (a) the discharges and (b) the deaths by length of stay, including percentage change in numbers and percentage distribution, of patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses in Northern Ireland in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is as set out:

Patients with diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses—discharges and deaths in 1987 by length of stay

Length of stay	Discharges		Deaths		Total
	Number	Per cent. Distribution	Number	Per cent. Distribution	Number	Per cent. Distribution
Under 1 month	430	46	4	10	434	45
1 and less than 3 months	334	36	3	7	337	34
3 and less than 6 months	84	9	1	2	85	9
6 and less than 12 months	42	4	—	—	42	4
12 months or over	45	5	33	81	78	8
Total	935	100	41	100	976	100

The number of discharges and deaths was 0·5 per cent. lower in 1987 than 1986.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many current occupants of National Health Service hospital and unit beds in Northern Ireland have a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses; and what those figures are as a percentage of (a) mental and (b) all beds in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: Information on current occupancy is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost from each of the psychiatric units in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the admissions by diagnosis and orders of admissions, including percentage changes in numbers and rates per 100,000 population, of patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses in Northern Ireland in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is as follows:

Admissions of patients diagnosed as suffering from schizophrenia psychoses during 1987

Number	Percentage change since 1986	Rate per 100,000 population
First admission
133	+23·2	8
Total admissions
968	+5·6	62

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many patients with a primary diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in Northern Ireland in the last year; and how many were admitted for a hospital stay more than once during the year.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
Discharges during 1987	935
Patients admitted to psychiatric hospitals more than once during 1987	159

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to how many people discharged from hospital following a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses and subsequently taken by the police under the Mental Health Act to hospital have been refused admission in Northern Ireland in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Needham: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost from each of the psychiatric units in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what research projects his Department is funding in the current year to test the effectiveness of community care for people suffering from schizophrenia psychoses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: None.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years; and how many of them were taken into local authority residential care.

Mr. Needham: Information requested on discharges is as set out:

Year	Number of discharges
1987	935
1986	981
1985	1,120
1984	1,096
1983	1,037

Information on the number of discharged patients taken into statutory residential care is not available centrally.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to how many of those convicted of crimes in Northern Ireland in each of the last two years had previously been admitted to National Health Service mental hospitals with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information sought is not available in the form requested. However, in Northern Ireland the number of offenders who were made subject to restriction orders under article 47 of the Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986 and were thereby detained in hospital for treatment for schizophrenia pychoses in each of the last two years was as follows:

	Number
1986	3
1987	1

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how much was spent in Northern Ireland in the last year on the care and treatment of patients suffering from schizophrenia; and what percentage that figure represented of total expenditure on (a) mental and (b) all health services;

(2) what is the current annual cost per patient to the National Health Service in Northern Ireland of the care and treatment of patients with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses;

(3) what information he has as to how many people discharged from mental illness hospitals in Northern Ireland in the last year after a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses having been proved vulnerable homeless subsequently became voluntary homeless.

Mr. Needham: The information is not available.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received in the last year on the provision of community care for patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses discharged from National Health Service mental hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The director of the National Schizophrenia Fellowship has written to me seeking my support for early-day motions concerning hospital closures and the provision of appropriate community services for sufferers from schizophrenia who have been discharged from hospital. I replied explaining that no hospital closures were planned in Northern Ireland and that additional community services were being developed to support the needs of discharged patients. I stressed the importance of active co-operation between the statutory and voluntary sectors in creating the necessary community services.

Mental Illness

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new mental illness hospital beds were opened and how many closed in Northern Ireland in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Needham: This information is not available in the form requested. The net figure for beds available in mental illness hospitals (that is adjusted to take account of beds opened and closed) for 1987 was 4,163.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what funds have been specifically earmarked for the care of the mentally ill following the closure of mental hospitals in Northern Ireland in the last year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: No psychiatric hospitals have been closed in Northern Ireland during the last year.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many residential places in the community will be provided in (a) the current and (b) the next year for those discharged from mental hospitals in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: This information is not held centrally. Local provision of living accommodation available for those discharged from mental hospitals comprises a wide range of residential types including hostels, group homes, residential and nursing homes and private accommodation run by individual carers. This range of accommodation is operated by the statutory, private and voluntary sectors and is not necessarily solely for those discharged from mental hospitals.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the mental illness hospitals scheduled to (a) open and (b) close in (i) the current and (ii) the next year in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: There are no plans either to open or close any mental hospitals in Northern Ireland in 1988 or 1989.

Security

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the security statistics for the first half of 1988 are now available, together with the details of persons charged with terrorist-type offences and convictions for scheduled offences for the year.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Security statistics for the first half of 1988 are now available and are as follows. Statistics for earlier years are contained in the answer by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) on 8 March 1988, at columns 67-74.

Statistics on Security (Part III)

Convictions and Sentences for Scheduled Offences

January-June 1988

Notes on the tables

1. The offence classifications are based on those used by the Crown and peace office in their annual return.

2. The tables relate to persons convicted at the Belfast Crown court. This covers all scheduled offences tried on indictment.

3. Some jury trials are included in cases where the Attorney-General certified out of the scheduled mode of trial, ie non-terrorist serious offences.

4. Where a person had been convicted of more than one offence only the most serious or that which received the longest sentence is recorded in the statistics.

ENERGY

Research and Development

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what funds his Department has allocated in 1988-89 and 1989-90 for research on (a) nuclear energy, (b) hydro-electric power, (c) wave power and (d) wind power;

(2) what is the total budget in 1988-89 and 1989-90 for research on alternative forms of electricity generation to nuclear and coal.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Estimated expenditure by my Department in 1988-89 on the named research and development programmes will be as follows:

	£ million
Nuclear Energy	144·57
of which:
Fast reactor	76·61
Fusion	22·46
Nuclear Safety	22·57
Radioactive Waste and Nuclear Materials Management	6·38
Other Nuclear Research	16·55
Hydro-electric Power	0·15
Wave Power	0·15
Wind Power	4·30

Estimated expenditure in 1988-89 on research and development on alternative forms of electricity generation is £5·65 million, covering programmes of work on hydroelectricity, tidal, wave, and wind. In addition, expenditure of £4·75 million is expected on programmes (biomass, geothermal) for energy sources which could be used either to provide heat or to generate electricity.

Expenditure forecasts for 1989-90 will be published in the 1989 public expenditure White Paper early in the new year.

Greenhouse Effect

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what research has been commissioned, or is planned, on the role of nuclear power, energy conservation and renewable energy sources in reducing carbon dioxide emissions and the greenhouse effect; if he will list any such studies which have been published; if he will place copies in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My Department has been discussing with the energy technology support unit a study to assess the impact of energy efficiency on emission of CO_2 and other pollutants. This will involve identification of the differing roles of nuclear power, renewables and conventional sources in emissions of CO_2 and other pollutants. It is the intention that this work will begin before the end of the year. This work will build on a preliminary analysis of those technologies which could have importance in reducing CO_2 emissions, published in 1986 in energy paper 54 (Energy Technologies for the UK 1986 Appraisal of Research, Development and Demonstration), a copy of which is in the Library.

Dounreay (New Plant)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has regarding the total combined cost to British Nuclear Fuels plc and the Atomic Energy Authority in respect of the local public inquiry into their application to build the European demonstration reprocessing plant at Dounreay.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have asked the chairman of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority to write on behalf of both the authority and BNFL to the hon. Member concerning the costs of the local public inquiry.

ENVIRONMENT

Unleaded Petrol

86. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further steps he proposes to promote the use of unleaded petrol.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Measures to promote the use of unleaded petrol are co-ordinated by the unleaded petrol group, which I chair. The steps being taken by the Government include the distribution of a leaflet on unleaded petrol with vehicle licence reminders.

House of Commons (Lighting)

87. Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to improve the lighting in the House of Commons Chamber.

Mr. Chope: There has been no request from the House to improve the lighting in the Chamber. I am aware, however, that the Select Committee on televising the House has been considering the levels of lighting and, like the hon. Member, I saw the presentation in the Chamber on 21 November.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the lighting under the House of Commons Galleries is to be renewed.

Mr. Chope: There are no plans to renew the lighting under the Galleries in the foreseeable future as part of my Department's programme of maintenance work.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to restore the chandeliers which were used to light the House before 1941.

Mr. Chope: I do not have information as to whether the chandeliers previously in the Chamber survived the bombing in 1941.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the level of lighting in the House.

Mr. Chope: At present there are no plans to do so.

Shareholdings (Councillors)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to tighten the current regulations regarding the declaration of shareholdings by local authority councillors; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The White Paper on "Conduct of Local Authority Business" (Cm. 433) sets out the Government's plans for strengthening the statutory controls on councillors' pecuniary interests, such as shareholdings. These involve legislating to require local authorities to set up a register of pecuniary interests. Failure to declare information for the register or provision of incorrect information would be a criminal offence.

The register will serve to reinforce, but not replace, the current legislation which requires that a councillor must disclose any pecuniary interest in a matter coming before the council. The current disabilities on speaking and voting will remain as the main safeguard, with the Secretary of State retaining the power to grant dispensations.

We have set up a working group with the local authority associations to consider the scope of the register, but it is envisaged that company interests such as shareholdings would be covered.

Sewage Works

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each water authority in England the number of sewage works in breach of numerical discharge consents in the 12 months before and the 12 months after the introduction of relaxed methods of measurement notified to chief executives in a letter from his Department of 28 January 1985.

Mr. Ridley: Water authorities were required to supply detailed returns on non-compliant works only for the calendar year 1986. The necessary information to supply an answer to this question is therefore not available.

However, inquiries of water authorities in 1984 suggested that in England as a whole up to 60 per cent. of works were failing their consents in that year. A detailed breakdown of this figure was not given. The returns for 1987, which were placed in the Libraries of both Houses in June this year, show that this has been reduced to 20·7 per cent.

Radioactivity

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes writing to the hon. Member for Copeland about reports of abnormally high levels of atmospheric radioactivity in the Greater Manchester area on 28 October.

Mr. Ridley: I shall be writing shortly.

Water Authorities

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the dates of appointment of each board member of the 10 water authorities in England and Wales.

Mr. Ridley: The information requested for the nine regional water authorities in England is as follows:

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is responsible for appointments to the board of the Welsh water authority.

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will adjust the external financing limits of water authorities in the current financial year to enable them to buy shares in statutory water companies.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so.

Public Housing

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on what steps he proposes to take in the light of the proposals by Ealing, Brent, Hounslow, Hammersmith and Fulham councils to use ratepayers' revenue for public housing on a rotation basis to avoid proposed capital controls on council expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Under the Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Consolidation and Amendment) Regulations 1987, as subsequently amended, local authorities will usually not incur prescribed expenditure when acquiring leasehold interests in residential property for periods not exceeding three years. The Government have no plans to change this. A new capital finance system is, however, to be introduced, subject to the approval of Parliament, with effect from 1990-91. We are considering the appropriate treatment for forward commitments entered into by local authorities between the publication of our proposals on 7 July and the commencement of the new system.

Football Matches (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on how many matches took place at Nottingham Forest and Notts County in 1987-88; how many individuals were arrested; and what is the average in the respective leagues.

Mr. Moynihan: The following information relates to Football League matches played in the 1987-88 season:

	Nottingham Forest	Notts County
Matches	20	23
Arrests	130	56
Average arrests per match	6·5	2·4
Average arrests per match by Division	5·3 (Division 1)	1·5 (Division 3)

Council House Sales

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals under the right-to-buy scheme have been made by Nottingham council tenants in each year since the scheme began; and in how many cases the valuation was reduced on appeal.

Mr. Trippier: The table gives, for each year since 1980, the number of tenants of Nottingham city council who applied for determination of the value of their homes by the district valuer under what is now section 128 of the Housing Act 1985 and the number of these cases in which the valuation was reduced:

Year	Number of applications for determination	Number of valuations reduced
1980	14	8
1981	12	5
1982	6	4
1984	9	3
1985	19	n/a
1986	22	7
1987	6	3
1988[1]	13	2

Carbon Monoxide (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many times carbon monoxide levels in Nottingham's air have exceeded World Health Organisation guidelines (a) since records were kept and (b) in the last three years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I am not aware of any consistent series of carbon monoxide measurements having been made in Nottingham. The Department's programme of urban monitoring includes a site in central London. Concentrations of carbon monoxide at that site just reached the guidelines values of the World Health Organisation during the month of November due to the cold, anti-cyclonic weather conditions. Analysis of results for the whole of the previous year show that at no other time were the WHO guideline levels approached. Traffic is the dominant source of urban carbon monoxide. It is unlikely that conditions in Nottingham approach those in London.

Water Purity (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the level of (a) polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons, (b) nitrates, (c) aluminium and (d) other substances in Nottingham's drinking water.

Mr. Moynihan: I am advised that a recent survey of the city of Nottingham water supply has revealed no significant level of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons. Further monitoring is in hand.

None of Nottingham's water supplies regularly exceeds the limit for nitrate, aluminium or other substances set in the EC drinking water directive.

Eels (Dieldrin)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the current level of dieldren in eels in the Severn-Trent water authority.

Mr. Moynihan: There was considerable concern about the relatively high concentrations of dieldrin in eels from the river Avon in 1985, following deaths of herons living around the river. However, eels taken from rivers in the area in 1988 had lower concentrations of dieldrin in their muscle than the eels taken in previous years. This is consistent with the results of river water monitoring, which shows a continuing trend downwards to extremely low levels. Present levels of dieldrin in river waters are normally below 5 nanogrammes per litre.

Water Privatisation

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will lay before Parliament information regarding (a) the state of the sewage system, (b) the state of the drinking water system, (c) the levels of contamination of water used for drinking purposes or for irrigation, (d) the main sources of water pollution and (e) the commercial value of land owned by the water authorities in the United Kingdom prior to the debate on the legislation on the privatisation of the water industry.

Mr. Moynihan: On 20 July my right hon. Friend laid before Parliament the annual report and accounts of the nine regional water authorities in which these matters are properly dealt with and he expects to present the 1988-89 reports and accounts in the same way during the summer.

Richmond House

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, when the Richmond house building was planned, it was intended to accommodate all Department of Health and Social Security staff; how much office space is currently unoccupied in the Richmond house building; and what is the total estimate cost of building, furnishing and equipping the Richmond house building.

Mr. Chope: A Government office building on the Richmond yard site has been planned for many years. Plans for a completely new building were rejected by a public inquiry in the realy 1970s. Successive Governments have since accepted the principle recommended by the inquiry that the facade and some rooms of Richmond terrace should be preserved with a modern office building constructed behind.

The decision to proceed was taken in 1978 and preliminary contracts were commissioned in 1979 and later years. The main management contract was placed in 1983. The building was designed to be suitable for use by any Government Department. It was allocated to the Department of Health and Social Security in April 1987 to accommodate the Department's Ministers and those staff who are needed in frequent and immediate support of Minist[illegible]. Richmond house is fully occupied.

The final cost of the building will depend on settlement of the final account, including claims still being negotiated.

Further work to meet the particular requirements of the occupying departments, together with the furnishing and equipping of the building, is their own responsibility.

Community Trusts

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek to make it illegal for local authorities to allocate to voluntary organisations funds made available by central Government under section 11 and the urban programme to community trusts.

Mr. Trippier: My Department's urban programme grants are used to reimburse local authorities for expenditure which they incur under the Local Government Grants (Social Need) Act 1969 and the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978. My Department approves projects for urban programme support only if they meet the ministerial guidelines for the urban programme issued in May 1985, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The administration of section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many community trusts are operating in the United Kingdom at present; what is their composition; what are their main functions; who is responsible for authorising their constitutions and operation; what annual report and accounts are community trusts required to publish; and where local authorities fund a community trust, what rights they have to recommend funding be granted or refused.

Mr. Trippier: Community trusts are voluntary organisations about which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department can advise. A local authority has a wide range of powers which it can use to fund voluntary organisations.

General Development Order

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the criteria that he uses in exercising power under article 10 of the town and country planning General Development Order 1977.

Mr. Chope: The power of direction under article 10(1) of the GDO is used sparingly, and normally only when more time is needed for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to decide whether or not to call in a particular planning application for his own decision. The criteria for directions under article 10(2) (as inserted by the Town and Country Planning General Development (Amendment) Order 1988) are set out in DOE Circular 15/88.

National Rivers Authority

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many members of the board of the National Rivers Authority will be required to be (a) experts or scientists with experience of research on water systems, drinking water, irrigation, sewage, transport, and so on, (b) members of environmental organisations and (c) representatives of consumers associations in his legislation proposals for water privatisation.

Mr. Moynihan: The intention is that the board of the National Rivers Authority should comprise a range of people with experience or knowledge relevant to the work of the authority, but there will be no requirement for specified numbers of people with any particular expertise or backgrounds, or representing particular interests.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what specific powers his proposals for water privatisation will give to the National Rivers Authority to (a) prosecute polluters of drinking water and irrigation systems, (b) compensate the victims of damage suffered through polluted waters, (c) control the prices charged by water companies to users, whether domestic or industrial, and (d) effectively ensure the purity and quality of water.

Mr. Moynihan: The Water Bill gives the National Rivers Authority powers to maintain and enhance the quality of inland, coastal and underground waters (clauses 96-116). The authority and the Secretary of State will have a duty under clause 99 to take all practicable steps to achieve water quality objectives set by the Secretary of State (clause 98). The functions of the National Rivers Authority do not extend to securing drinking water quality. The authority will regulate polluting discharges to water through a consent system (clause 101 and schedule 11) and it will be an offence (clause 100) to discharge effluent in breach of a prohibition. There are powers for water protection zones in clause 104 and for byelaws to prevent the pollution of controlled waters in clause 106.

The Bill's provisions do not affect the common law rights of riparian owners or other affected parties to take action against any person polluting water in respect of which they have rights.

The Secretary of State has powers to define in regulations standards of wholesomeness for drinking water (clause 62). Under clause 19 he may take enforcement action against water undertakers who fail to comply with the duty imposed on them to supply only wholesome water for domestic purposes (clause 49). In addition clause 51 makes it an offence for water undertakers to supply to any premises by means of pipes water which is unfit for human consumption.

The obligation to comply with a final or provisional enforcement order under clause 19 is a duty owed to any person who may be affected by a contravention of the order, and loss or damage would be actionable at the suit of that person (clause 21(4) and (5)). This is in addition to their rights under consumer legislation and other enactments.

Clause 6 places a duty on the Secretary of State and the Director-General of Water Services to ensure that the interests of both domestic and industrial customers are protected as respects, among other things, charges for the services provided by water undertakers. Clause 13 will enable price controls to be imposed on water undertakers as one of the conditions of their appointment.

These provisions apply in England and Wales.

Water Byelaws

Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the new water byelaws will come into operation.

Mr. Howard: Following careful consideration of representations made about certain aspects of the new water byelaws they have been confirmed with some minor modifications. They will come into operation on 1 January 1989.

River Quality Objectives

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by what date he intends that river quality objectives should become statutory; and when he intends to initiate a comprehensive review of the current non-statutory water authority river quality objectives as a precursor to such statutory objectives being set.

Mr. Moynihan: Once it is established the National Rivers Authority will begin the task of reviewing the existing river quality objectives set by the water authorities, in the light of perceived national priorities for improving river and estuary quality and planned investment by water utilities and industrial dischargers. At the same time, it will need to consider how far the existing river classification scheme needs to be modified in order to improve the measurement of water quality. In the light of this review, and following public consultation, the Secretary of State expects to set revised objectives on a statutory basis during 1992.

Special Scientific Interest Sites

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the name and the county of the 51 sites of special scientific interest that were damaged by agricultural activities between 1 April 1987 and 31 March 1988; if he will detail what the damaging activity was for each site; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I shall write to the hon. Member shortly.

Pollution Inspectorate

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the letter from Rod Perryman giving the reasons for his resignation from his post as head of his Department's pollution inspectorate.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 25 November 1988]: No. It is not customary to disclose documents concerned with personnel matters.

Water Pollution

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take action to ensure that all breaches of European Commission directives by the Yorkshire water authority in respect of mercury and cadmium in river sediment are required to be reported to that authority's water quality advisory group.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 25 November 1988]: It is for Yorkshire water authority to decide what information it supplies to its water quality advisory group.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking in respect of the breaches by the Yorkshire water authority of European Commission directives concerning mercury and cadmium in river sediment and pollution by the pesticide Lindane.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 25 November 1988]: On the basis of the periodic returns supplied by Yorkshire water authority, the Department does not consider that the requirements of the relevant European Community directives governing discharges of these substances have been breached.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the discharges of significant quantities of restricted chemicals into the river system by Hickson and Welch Ltd., Castleford, Staveley Chemicals, Chesterfield, Coalite Ltd., Bolsover and Thomas Bolton and Johnson Ltd., Wakefield.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 25 November 1988]: None recently, but I am aware of the concern over some industrial effluents being discharged into Yorkshire rivers. Representations about particular effluents would generally be made to the Yorkshire water authority which is responsible for controlling industrial discharges to rivers in its area. I understand that the water authority is investigating these and other industrial discharges with a view to securing improvements.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research is currently being conducted by his Department into the illegal contamination of water by pesticides.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The following research is currently being conducted by the Department into the contamination of water by pesticides.

1. Effects of disinfection on organics in drinking water. Contractor-Water Research Centre (WRC). End date March 1989. Contract amount £343,000.
2. Pesticides in drinking water; sources and supplies. Contractor-WRC. End date December 1989. Contract amount £168,000.
3. Groundwater pollution by organic solvents. Contractor-NERC/British Geological Survey. End date March 1989. Contract amount £128,000.
4. Analysis of potentially dangerous substances in United Kingdom waters. Contractor-SAC Scientific. End date March 1989. Contract amount £27,000.
5. Sources and fates of synthetic organics. Contractor-WRC. End date March 1990. Contract amount £181,000.
6. Standards for dangerous substances in surface waters. Contractor-WRC. End date March 1989. Contract amount £197,000.
7. Total impact assessment of pollutants in river basins. Contractor-NERC/Institute of Hydrology. End date June 1989. Contract amount £163,000.
8. Organic contaminants in rivers. Contractor-WRC. End date March 1990. Contract amount £276,000.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence his Department has concerning the illegal contamination of water supplies by pesticides.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 25 November 1988]: Routine monitoring by water undertakers has revealed minute traces of pesticides in some drinking water supplies. Government medical advisers are satisfied that the levels found do not constitute a health risk.

As far as I am aware the levels arise from the use of pesticides approved under the control of pesticides regulations. I have no evidence to suggest that contamination arises from the illegal use of pesticides.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the European Commission regarding the pesticide standard within the drinking water directive.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The Government consider that the pesticide parameter in the EC drinking water directive is not scientifically based, and is impracticable for a number of reasons. On several occasions since 1985 the Government have made representations to the Commission for a review.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will as a matter of urgency introduce legislation to provide for a prohibition power to enable water authorities to stop polluters from discharging effluent into water courses.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 25 November 1988]: It is a criminal offence under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 to discharge polluting effluent into a water course without a consent from a water authority or the Secretary of State.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will as a matter of urgency bring forward legislation to ensure that polluters are given a duty to notify all new pollutants in their effluent to the responsible water authority, to enable water authorities to revise the consent without financial penalty.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 25 November 1988]: No. Such legislation would be redundant. A discharger who adds to his discharge a new pollutant which materially adds to the noxious quality of the discharge, and which is not covered by the consent, will be guilty of an offence. Before adding such a pollutant he must therefore secure from the water authority a variation to the consent. The water authority will suffer no financial penalty if it varies or refuses to vary the consent.

Opencast Coalmining

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of opencast coalmining planning applications that have been made, approved and refused in 1987-88 and the four previous years for each region of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 25 November 1988]: This information is not held centrally. Statistics compiled by the County Planning Officers' Society, which are available from 1984-85 only, show the following:

	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88

War Dead (Disposal)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps will be taken in the event of war to prevent the pollution of water supplies arising from the disposal of the dead.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The staff of water undertakers and local authorities would implement planning arrangements designed to prevent pollution of water supplies arising from the disposal of the dead in wartime.

EC Directive

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what efforts have been made to meet the standards as set out in directive 80/778/EEC; what are the current difficulties encountered; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 25 November 1988]: Considerable efforts have been made, and will continue to be made, to meet the standards set out in the EC drinking water directive (Directive 80/778/EEC). Since the directive was agreed in 1980 water authorities and water companies have undertaken substantial programmes of improvement. In 1987-88 alone water authorities spent £400 million on their water supply functions. Programmes of improvements and investment will continue when the water industry is privatised. Current difficulties stem from the fact that some of the requirements relating to the parameters in the directive and their interpretation do not have a sound technical basis or take account of the practical circumstances of the water treatment and distribution systems.

Public water supplies in the United Kingdom are safe to drink. Good progress continues to be made towards full compliance with the directive. Most public water supplies for which derogations have been granted by the Department or sought from the European Commission are expected to comply over the next few years.

HEALTH

Contraceptives

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what advice he is giving to women who make inquiries to his Department on how they can obtain information on whether they were at any time fitted with a Dalkon shield intra uterine device;

(2) whether he has issued guidance to health authorities and family practitioner committees on assisting women who make inquiries to obtain information on whether they were at any time fitted with a Dalkon shield intra uterine device.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department will reconsider its position not to launch a public information campaign to inform women of any rights they may have in regard to any injuries caused by the Dalkon shield contraceptive device.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 25 November 1988]: We have no plans to initiate a public information campaign in relation to this matter of litigation in the United States courts. Publicity conducted in the United Kingdom by the Dalkon shield manufacturers has been approved by the courts concerned.

Our guidance to health authorities about the release of information in the context of civil legal proceedings is contained in HC(82)16, a copy of which is available in the Library. We have referred to that guidance in response to enquiries about the disclosure of records on the use of the Dalkon shield in individual cases.

In the case of family practitioner services, patients' medical records are held by general practitioners in the majority of cases. The General Medical Council issues guidance to doctors on the circumstances in which it is appropriate for confidential medical information to be released. We have received no inquiries about the provision of information by GPs to specific patients about their use of the Dalkon shield.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list (a) the discharges and (b) the deaths, by length of stay, including percentage change in numbers and percentage distribution, of patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses for the last year for which figures are available;

(2) how many current occupants of National Health Service hospital and unit beds have a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses in each health region; and what those figures are as a percentage of (a) mental and (b) all hospital beds in each region;

(3) if he will list the admissions by diagnosis and order of admissions, including percentage change in numbers and rates per 100,000 population, of patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses in each health region in the last year for which figures are available;

(4) how many patients with a primary diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in each health region last year; and how many were admitted for a hospital stay of more than once during the year;

(5) how many people with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in England in each of the last five years; and how many of them were taken into local authority residential care in the same year.

Mrs. Currie: The latest available information on people with schizophrenia in National Health Service mental illness hospitals and units is contained in the Department's statistical bulletin 1/86 "Mental illness hospitals and units in England: Schizophrenia Statistics 1981-84" and statistical note 2/88 "Mental illness hospitals and units in England: Schizophrenia Statistics 1984-86"; copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, what research projects his Department is funding in the current year to test the effectiveness of community care for people suffering from schizophrenia psychoses; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The Department of Health's directly commissioned health and personal social services research programme includes the following current projects:

Title	Researcher(s) and Location
(i) Assessment of needs of chronic schizophrenics living in the health district of Harrow;	Dr. E. Johnson and Dr. H. I. Hershon, Northwick Park Hospital
(ii) A comparison of day and in patient treatment	Dr. F. Creed, Manchester Royal Infirmary
(iii) Compulsory treatment of psychiatric patients in the community	Professor S. R. Hirsch and Dr. T. E. Sensky, Department of Psychiatry, Charing Cross Hospital
(iv) Research on management of schizophrenics in the community;	Dr. G. Wilkinson and Dr. I. Falloon, Institute of Psychiatry, Denmark Hill, London
(v) A controlled evaluation of community psychiatric care;	Dr. T. Burns, Department of Psychiatry, St. George's Hospital Medical School
(vi) Evaluating the transition from psychiatric hospitals to District based services. (Part funding from Department of Health)	Professor J. P. Leff, MRC Social Psychiatry Unit.
(vii) Controlled trial of a daily living programme versus standard psychiatric care;	Professor I. Marks, Institute of Psychiatry
(viii) Interface between primary care and hospital based mental illness services;	Professor D. Goldberg, Department of Psychiatry, University of Manchester
(ix) Early brief versus sustained neuroleptic treatment in the maintenance phase of schizophrenia	Professor S. R. Hirsch, Department of Psychiatry, Charing Cross and Westminster Medical School

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how much was spent in England and Wales in the last year on the care and treatment of patients suffering from schizophrenia; and what percentage that figure represented of total expenditure on (a) mental and (b) all health services;

(2) what is the current annual cost per patient to the National Health Service of the care and treatment of patients with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses.

Mrs. Currie: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received in the last year on the provision of community care for patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses discharged from National Health Service mental hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We have received representation from a variety of sources, some of which reflect concern about the level of services available in some localities. Over the next year, the Government will be looking closely at local levels of provision.

Mental Illness Beds

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many new mental illness hospital beds have been opened and how many mental illness hospital beds closed in each health authority in England and Wales in the last year for which figures are available;

(2) what information he has as to how many people discharged from hospital following a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses and subsequently taken by the police under the Mental Health Act to hospital have been refused admission, in the last year for which figures are available;

(3) what information he has as to how many people discharged from mental illness hospitals in England in the last year after a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses having been proved vulnerable homeless subsequently became voluntary homeless.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that we do not hold centrally figures for the number of mental illness beds closed and the number of new beds opened each year, but the table shows the number of available staffed beds in National Health Service mental illness hospitals and units for 1985 and 1986, the latest years for which comparable information is available. The Health Service in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

We do not collect centrally the other information requested.

Handicapped People (Homes)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, by county, all local authority registered homes for the mentally and physically handicapped.

Mrs. Currie: The numbers of local authority homes for younger physically handicapped people in each local authority are published in "Residential Accommodation for the Elderly and Younger Physically Handicapped People: All Residents in Local Authority, Voluntary and Private Homes". The number of local authority-registered homes for mentally handicapped people in each local authority is published in "Homes and Hostels for Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped People". The latest available information relates to 1986. The "Directory of Independent Hospitals and Health Services" lists local authority-registered homes by name. Copies of all these publications are available in the Library.

Cancer Screening

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his best estimate for each health authority of the percentage of eligible women who have been screened for cervical cancer at the latest convenient date.

Mrs. Currie: This information is not currently available as statistics to date have concentrated on the number of smear tests performed rather than on the number of women screened. It will however become available during 1989 when we receive health authorities' returns from Körner form KC 53 ("Adult screening programmes—cervical cytology").

Mental Illness

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department has budgeted to be spent in 1987-88 and 1988-89 on continuing mental illness projects.

Mrs. Currie: Following proposals by all regional health authorities we announced allocations for mental illness development projects in February 1986 of £2 million in 1987-88 and £2·285 million in 1988-89. An innovative community-based family therapy service in Tower Hamlets health authority has also received direct funding of £33,000 in 1987-88 and £34,000 in 1988-89.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the voluntary organisations in the mental illness field which receive departmental grant aid, together with the amounts.

Mrs. Currie: The latest information is as follows:

1988-89 Amount

Organisation	£000s per annum
MIND (National Association for Mental Health)	415
Alzheimer's Disease Society	130
Samaritans[1]	125
CRUSE (Bereavement Care)	114
Richmond Fellowship	97
National Schizophrenia Fellowship	91
Good Practices in Mental Health	80
Mental After Care Association	50
Mental Health Film Council	35
Anorexic Family Aid	29
Mental Health Foundation	27
British Institute of Industrial Therapy	25
Rape Counselling and Research Project	25
North West Fellowship	20
Northern Schizophrenia Fellowship[1]	20
Widows' Advisory Trust	18
Phobic Action	5
Phobics Society	5
Nafsiyat (Inter-Cultural Therapy Centre)	5
Women's Therapy Centre	5

Grants are generally agreed for a three-year period and are renewable. Bodies marked with a "[1]" have grants which fall to be renewed from 1988-89, but new rates have not yet been agreed.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what joint finance monies and project funding are being provided to district health authorities and local authority social services by his Department in the current year to improve the range and quality of day care and other facilities for the mentally ill.

Mrs. Currie: We have allocated £112·8 million to joint finance in 1988-89 to support the development of jointly planned services by health and local authorities for all types of patient. Decisions about the allocation of funding are made at local level on the recommendations of each joint consultative committee. We do not yet have centrally information on expenditure on services for mentally ill people for the current financial year.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department spent on directly commissioned mental illness research in 1987-88; how much has been budgeted for 1988-89; and what each figure represents as a proportion of expenditure on the Health Service research programme.

Mrs. Currie: In 1987-88 the Department spent £1,267,000 on directly commissioned research relevant to mental illness. In 1988-89 a total of £1,307,900 has been made available for such research. Expressed as a percentage of the Department's total health, personal social services and social security research budget, the figures are 9·3 per cent. and 8·2 per cent., respectively.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what funds have been specifically earmarked for the care of the mentally ill following the closure of mental hospitals in each health region in the last year; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list by regional health authority the amounts provided for (a) the last, (b) the current and (c) the next year for bridging funds for local care of patients discharged or excluded from mental hospitals; and how much in each case is provided for long-term patients still to be discharged from hospitals and how much for those already discharged from hospital.

Mrs. Currie: In the main the Department does not identify funds for specific purposes such as the provision of mental illness services within its overall allocations to regions or in its planned provision for local authority social services expenditure. The allocation of resources to district health authorities is a matter for regions, and it is for regions and districts to determine, within a national framework of health care priorities, and in the light of local needs and circumstances, how all their resources can best be used. So far as local authorities are concerned, it is for them to determine the level and balance of their expenditure on the provision of social services.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many residential places in the community will be provided in each health region in (a) the current and (b) the next year for those discharged from mental hospitals.

Mrs. Currie: The information requested is not available. The number of places in homes and hostels for the mentally ill in each local authority in England is published in "Homes and Hostels for Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped People"; a copy of which is in the library.

Mentally Disordered Offenders

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what response he has received from each regional health authority in England and Wales to his advice to them following the report by the director of prison medical services on mentally disordered offenders in England and Wales to develop a comprehensive network of provision to meet mental heath care needs in their regions; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Copies of the report were sent to regional health authorities in December 1987. No specific response was requested. We will be monitoring progress through the established review procedures.

Adelphi House

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when agreements to rent office space to accommodate his senior staff at the Adelphi building in the Strand were approved and signed by him; what rental per square foot was agreed; and what option he has secured to rent further office space at Adelphi house.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Property Services Agency negotiated the acquisition of the Adelphi on behalf of the Department of Health and Social Security on a strictly commercial and therefore in confidence basis. The lease was signed by the Property Services Agency on 26 August 1988, after negotiations with the landlord over a number of months. There is an option to acquire additional space if required on the seventh floor of the building.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated total cost of equipping and furnishing office space rented by his Department at Adelphi house; what information he has as to who is the freeholder of Adelphi house; from whom his Department has leased office space; who advised his Department in the negotiations which led to a lease agreement being signed to rent space at Adelphi house; and what commissions have been paid in connection with this lease being agreed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The requirements of staff due to move to the Adelphi building are being considered and I am not able to provide this costing information at present. The office space was leased from the then owner of Adelphi, Manufacturers Hanover. The building has since been sold on to Gefica Industries. Negotiations were conducted by the Property Services Agency on our behalf without specific charge to my Department.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff were located at his Department's Elephant and Castle offices in each of the last five years; how many of these staff have been transferred to the Richmond building, to date; how many are to be transferred; how many are to be located at Adelphi house; when refurbishment of the Elephant and Castle building is to start; and what is the total estimated cost of this work.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In each of the five years up to the end of 1987, about 2,100 staff were based at the Elephant and Castle. Of those, 340 have now moved to Richmond house, together with 140 from other headquarters buildings in London. A further 580 staff are expected to move from Alexander Fleming house to the Adelphi.

Final decisions about the refurbishment of Alexander Fleming house have yet to be taken by the owner who is also responsible for the costs. According to present plans, the work is likely to start in June 1989.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the availability of office space was a factor in the decision to split the Department of Health and Social Security into two departments; and if he will review the cost effectiveness of the Department of Health renting office space in the Adelphi building.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The availability of office space was not a factor in the decision to split the Department of Health and Social Security into two Departments. The planned occupation of key ministerial support staff in the Adelphi is an important improvement in my Department's efficient use of London HQ accommodation. At the moment we have some 4,700 staff in 12 buildings scattered across London. Our intention is that about 1,000 staff should be in or near to Whitehall (480 already in Richmond house and 580 to go to the Adelphi); at least 1,000 should be relocated out of London, with the remainder at the Elephant and Castle. This will allow my Deparment to vacate other central London buildings.

This will increase efficiency by concentrating staff in a few locations and improve cost effectiveness by having the minimum number of staff in a high rental area (in or near Whitehall) and the maximum number in the relatively cheap rental area at the Elephant and Castle or relocated away from London.

Helicopters

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to what extent helicopters and other air transport are used to facilitate the transport of seriously ill and injured patients and as to what extent financial considerations discourage such use.

Mrs. Currie: In the United Kingdom, RAF helicopters transport has been used occasionally by the NHS for many years, both in emergency rescue missions which are free and in secondary transport services which must be paid for. In Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly a helicopter has been operating in support of the ambulance services for the past year and in June the Daily Express announced that, with Government support, it will fund a helicopter based at the London Hospital to transport accident victims to hospital. Several other health authorities are known to be actively considering the feasibility of using helicopters in this way.

Cook/Chill Catering

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether Mr. Arthur Pinegar, principal microbiologist in the public health laboratory in Leeds, is also operating a private laboratory undertaking the evaluation and monitoring of cook/chill catering.

Mrs. Currie: Mr. Pinegar has advised the public health laboratory service board that the laboratory with which he is connected in a private capacity is not currently involved in work on cook/chill catering.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health why his Department's new guidelines on cook/chill catering, which were to have been published in August, are not yet ready for publication.

Mrs. Currie: Because we need more time. They will be published when they are ready.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the microbiological studies of food produced by the cook/chill process being undertaken by the public health laboratory service have included the assessment of listeria.

Mrs. Currie: Yes. Preliminary work on the growth and survival of listeria monocytogenes in foods prepared in cook/chill catering have been undertaken by the public health laboratory service (PHLS). Further studies are in progress in the PHLS which include examination of meals produced in NHS hospital cook/chill catering systems for the presence of this organism. Further work is planned.

Eggs

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to ensure the public do not contract poisioning through the consumption of eggs.

Mrs. Currie: The Department issued public advice on 26 August 1988 not to consume raw eggs or uncooked meals made from them. In view of later epidemiological evidence suggesting some risk of food poisoning from eating lightly cooked eggs, we issued further advice to the public on 21 November 1988. Chief environmental health officers of local authorities have been advised by the Department on 2 September. The Government's chief medical officer reinforced this advice on radio and television in the days following that. This must be seen in the context of a consumption of 30 million eggs a day in the United Kingdom. Therefore the risk to any individual from eating an individual egg is very small.

It is clearly always safest to cook any food thoroughly and eggs are no exception to this general rule.

Playgroups

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number and proportion of under-fives in playgroups for each year since 1958.

Mrs. Currie: Information is not available in exactly the form requested.

The number of places in playgroups, and the number per thousand population aged under five, are given in the table for the years 1982-87. We do not have comparable information for earlier years.

Places in playgroups England 1982-87

Nurses (Grading)

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nursing and midwifery staff from each of the old grades have been assimilated to each of the new grades in the clinical grading structure in England.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is given in the table:

The new clinical grading structure for nursing, midwifery and health visitor staff.

Committee on Safety of Medicines

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the size of the budgets available to the Committee on Safety of Medicines in each of the years 1978 to 1987 inclusive.

Mr. Mellor: The Committee on Safety of Medicines is supported by the Department through expenditure on staff, accommodation, office services, computing and other facilities as required: the costs cannot be separately identified. A separate budget covers expenditure on behalf of the committee on various activities including members' fees and expenses, mailing of 'Dear Doctor' letters and 'Current Problems' to doctors, dentists and pharmacists, and actions to promote adverse reaction reporting. The budgets for this area of expenditure from the 1980-81 financial year are set out in the table. Figures from earlier years cannot be identified separately without disproportionate expense.

1981-82	136,000
1982-83	177,000
1983-84	224,000
1984-85	315,000
1985-86	428,000
1986-87	445,000
1987-88	460,000

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases involving adverse reactions to medicines have been referred to the Committee on Safety of Medicines in each of the years 1978 to 1987 inclusive; and what percentage of these cases have arisen through the yellow card system in each of these years.

Mr. Mellor: Suspected adverse reactions to medicines are reported to the Committee on Safety of Medicines by doctors, dentists, coroners and pharmaceutical companies, for the most part on yellow cards provided by the committee (or standard forms for pharmaceutical companies) but sometimes in correspondence. Medical journals are also scanned for adverse reaction reports. The total number of reports received in each year since 1978 is given in the table: computer records do not distinguish the precise source of each report. The CSM also makes use of additional information from the World Health Organisation database of adverse reaction reports contributed by 26 countries, reports from pharmaceutical companies of serious reactions occurring overseas and published literature about adverse reactions.

Reports of suspected adverse reactions received by the CSM

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many persons are employed full-time by the Committee on Safety of Medicines; and if he will indicate the nature of their appointment in each case.

Mr. Mellor: The Committee on Safety of Medicines does not employ any staff directly. It is supported by medical, scientific, pharmaceutical, legal and administrative staff employed by the Department of Health, many of whom also work on other duties for the licensing authority or the Department.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the members of the Committee on Safety of Medicines indicating (a) their professional background, (b) whether their appointments are full-time or part-time and (c) their remuneration in each case.

Mr. Mellor: The present membership of the Committee on Safety of Medicines is given in the table, with the members' professional qualifications and current employment. Appointment to the committee is on the basis of fees for attendance at meetings, which are held 11 times a year for one or two days. The present fee for attendance is £61 (£76 for the chairman), with an additional £15 preparation fee (£18 for the chairman).

Day Nurseries

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number and proportion of under-fives in local authority day nurseries for each year since 1958.

Mrs. Currie: The information requested is given in the table for the years 1973 to 1987. We do not have readily available comparable information for earlier years.

Child-minders

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number and proportion of under-fives in the care of local authority registered child-minders for each year since 1958.

Mrs. Currie: We do not hold information in exactly the form requested.

The number of places with registered childminders, and the number per thousand population aged under five, are given in the table for the years 1973 to 1977 and 1982 to 1987. We do not have readily available comparable information for earlier years.

NHS Employees

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many (a) men and (b) women are general medical practitioners currently practising in the National Health Service;

(2) how many (a) men and (b) women currently work as hospital doctors in the National Health Service;

(3) how many (a) men and (b) women are currently employed as consultants in the National Health Service.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The information is set out in the table.

Doctors in NHS hospitals and general practice in England

Males and females Numbers

	Males	Females
Hospital doctors (all staff)[1]	32,835	11,078
Medical consultants[1]	12,021	1,941
General medical practitioners[2]	19,819	5,263

[1] Includes permanent paid and honorary staff as at 30 September 1987.

[2] Includes restricted and unrestricted principals as at 1 October 1987.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each region and the special health authorities the total number of available beds for each specialty for each year since 1979; and if he will give the national totals.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The information requested for the years 1979 to 1986 is contained in the booklets "Forms SH3, EDP4, 5 and 6—Regional and National Summaries", copies of which have been placed in the Library. From 1 April 1987, data on available beds is no longer being collected by specialty, but by ward classification instead.

Assessment Teams

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which of the designated training centres are currently running courses for staff wishing to work in specialist assessment teams; and if he will break that down into (a) the number of people on each course, (b) the number of radiologists being trained, (c) the number of radiographers being trained and (d) the duration of each course and its date of completion.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 25 November 1988]: We do not hold the information in the precise form requested. In 1987 the Guildford and Nottingham breast screening centres started holding regular training courses for radiologists and radiographers. The Camberwell (King's College hospital) and Manchester centres started general, introductory training this year and plan to start regular courses for radiologists and radiographers early next year. Core training is based on guidance from the Royal College of Radiologists and the College of Radiographers, but the duration of courses may vary to reflect the previous experience and requirements of the participants. Information is not held centrally on the duration of courses and number of participants. The training centres have also held workshops and seminars for other health professionals including surgeons, pathologists and nurses. The Royal Marsden hospital has participated in the national training initiative by running a seminar for specialist assessment teams and is also providing six-week courses for nurses. In addition, £110,000 is being allocated to regional health authorities in the current financial year to provide in-service training.

Cancer Screening

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those private health screening facilities which he is aware of, broken down into (a) mobile units and (b) static units.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 25 November 1988]: We do not collect this information centrally. However "Laing's Review of Private Healthcare 1987", a copy of which is in the Library, includes details of screening clinics.

Contractual Arrangements

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to be able to release the information on contractual arrangements with private hospitals or clinics, referred to in his answer of 22 July, Official Report, column 899.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 25 November 1988]: We are analysing the information on district health authorities contractual arrangements with private hospitals and clinics and it will be published as soon as possible. Further investigation is necessary before details relating to types of treatment can be provided.

Nurseries

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the child population under the age of three years is cared for in local authority day nurseries, for each local authority in England and Wales.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 25 November 1988]: We do not hold information in exactly the form requested. However, figures for numbers of children aged under five on registers of local authorities in England are published on an annual basis in "Children's Day Care Facilities at 31 March", copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

In 1987 there were 34,700 children on registers of local authority day nurseries in England, that is 1·2 per cent. of the population aged under five. Figures for Welsh authorities are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to publish hospital waiting list figures within three months of the date of collection; and if he will make it his policy to publish the national, regional and district totals simultaneously.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The publication of any summarised information is dependent on the speed with which health authorities submit accurate figures. Waiting list figures for March and September each year are published as soon as all necessary validation has been carried out. National and regional summaries are published in statistical bulletins, and the more detailed district figures are produced as soon as possible thereafter. These procedures will continue to be followed.

TRANSPORT

London Assessment Studies

7. Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many London boroughs, or their associations, have supported the proposals in the stage 2a reports of the London assessment studies.

Mr. Channon: The reports contain no firm proposals. They put forward the consultants' preliminary ideas for further development and assessment. They are still being discussed with representatives of the boroughs and their associations.

59. Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the cost to date of the London assessment studies; and what is their expected final cost.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The total cost of stage 1 of the studies was about £3 million. It is estimated that stage 2, which began last December, will cost £4 million to complete.

In comparison, personal injury accidents on roads in the east London assessment study area alone cost in the region of £50 million each year.

65. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what contribution he expects the west London assessment study to play in deciding the future transport network in west London.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The west London assessment study was set up to address the serious transport problems along the western end of the South Circular road and the Earls Court one-way system. The consultants' report is due next summer. It is too early to say how the transport network of west London will be developed in the light of the study.

Road Building

12. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much the Government will spend on new road building over the next three years.

Mr. Channon: Approximately £3 billion.

Road Traffic Speed (London)

19. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest estimate of the average speed of road traffic in inner London (a) during the morning and evening rush hours and (b) between the morning and evening rush hours.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Estimates for 1983-84 are 12·6 mph in the morning peak 14·0 mph in the interpeak period, and 12·2 mph in the evening peak period.

Rail Electrification

20. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has recently discussed with the British Railways Board the further electrification of the St. Pancras to Sheffield line.

Mr. Portillo: No but it would be for British Rail to propose such a scheme if it thought it justified.

23. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he plans to electrify the east coast railway line north of Edinburgh.

Mr. Portillo: It is for the British Railways Board, not the Government, to plan investment in the railways. I understand that it does not propose electrifying the line north of Edinburgh.

38. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of British Rail lines are electrified; and what are the equivalent figures for other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Portillo: At present, 26 per cent. of British Rail's total route miles are electrified. This will increase to around 30 per cent. by the end of the decade.

Ports (Congestion)

21. Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to ease congestion at the ports.

Mr. Paul Channon: I am not aware that our ports in general are congested. If there is any particular problem, it is for the port authority concerned to resolve.

Roads (Maintenance)

22. Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to review the maintenance of unclassified roads by district councils under the terms of the Highways Acts.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: These arrangements have been reviewed by the Audit Commission. We are following up its recommendations for improvements with the local authority associations.

Channel Tunnel

24. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received regarding regional access to the Channel tunnel by road and rail.

Mr. Portillo: I have had a number of representations but those regarding rail services are best directed to BR which has established working groups in each region of the United Kingdom.

28. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss progress made to date to link the north-east of England with the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Portillo: I shall be discussing with the chairman British Rail's plans for Channel tunnel services when BR has completed the consultations required by the Channel Tunnel Act.

45. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends to accelerate rail and road improvement programmes for east-west access to the Channel tunnel to meet increased traffic in 1992 and thereafter.

Mr. Portillo: Rail access is the responsibility of British Rail. It is required by section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act to publish a plan by the end of 1989 setting out its proposals for international passenger and freight services. BR is currently consulting interested parties in all regions of the United Kingdom, including the south-east. The Department is pressing ahead with a number of motorway and trunk road schemes which take account of the requirements of traffic to and from the Channel tunnel.

48. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has held with local authorities in the north-west of England regarding the impact of the Channel tunnel on the north-west's transport infrastructure.

Mr. Portillo: My predecessor addressed the "Transport 2000" conference in Manchester in February at which most of the region's country and district councils were represented.

The Department is involved in meetings between British Rail and regional interests, including local authorities, as part of British Rail's obligation to prepare by the end of 1989 a plan for passenger and freight services to the regions.

50. Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what impact he expects the proposed routes for the Channel tunnel railway links to have on the residents and the environment of Dulwich; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: It is too soon to say. I understand that some of the proposed route options would affect parts of Dulwich. British Rail is at present consulting local authorities and other interested parties about its proposals.

56. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will hold a public inquiry into the location of a second rail terminal for Channel tunnel services in London.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail will need to seek statutory authorisation for the works associated with a second London terminal. The normal procedure for authorisation of new railway works is by means of a private Bill, which allows objectors to state their case to both Houses of Parliament.

61. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has received for direct rail links between Glasgow, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Cardiff, Exeter and the Channel tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail is required by section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act to publish a plan by the end of 1989 setting out its proposals for passenger and freight services via the tunnel and any infrastructure developments they consider necessary to support those services. British Rail is currently consulting interested parties in all regions of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will publish all terms of the agreement made between British Rail and SNCF in connection with Channel tunnel traffic; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo The Government were not party to the agreement between BR and SNCF and have no power to direct that it should be published. I understand that both the parties regard the details of the agreement as commercially confidential.

Speed Limits (Motorways)

25. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the Institute of Advanced Motorists and others to review the speed limit on British motorways.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have received no recent formal representations from the Institute of Advanced Motorists or others to review motorway speed limits. We keep in close touch with the Institute of Advanced Motorists and value its contributions to road safety.

The 70 mph national speed limit strikes the right balance between the need for safety and movement.

Road Accident Statistics

26. Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people were killed or injured on United Kingdom roads in 1987 and in 1986.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The total number of casualties in the United Kingdom in 1986 was 331,000 of whom 5,600 were killed. In 1987, the corresponding figures were 321,000 casualties in total, of whom 5,300 were killed. The total number of casualties was down 3 per cent. on the previous year and the fatalities were down by 5 per cent.

A fuller breakdown of the Northern Irish component of these figures is given in the Royal Ulster Constabulary's publication entitled "Road Traffic Accident Statistics Annual Report".

The Great Britain component of these figures is broken down in more detail in "Road Accidents Great Britain". The 1986 figures have been published and are available in the Library: the 1987 figures will be published shortly.

The total number of casualties in Great Britain in 1987 was 311,500, of whom 5,100 were killed, and 64,300 were seriously injured. The corresponding figures for 1986 were 321,500 casualties, 5,400 of whom were killed and 68,800 were seriously injured. The total number of casualties in 1987 was 3 per cent. below the number in 1986; fatalities were down by nearly 5 per cent.

The Secretary of State has set a target of reducing casualties by one third by the year 2000.

British Rail Engineering Ltd.

27. Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assurances will be required from any purchasers of British Rail Engineering Ltd. with regard to the pension and other rights of existing employees.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail intends that employees of BREL will transfer to new owners with their existing terms and conditions of service. They will be able to preserve their accrued pension benefits in the BR scheme, or to transfer those benefits to a scheme set up by the owners.

Sugar Beet (Carriage)

29. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of lorries carrying sugar beet are netted (a) nationally and (b) in north Yorkshire; and if he will make a statemet.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is not available. Drivers of lorries are required to secure loads properly.

Drinking and Driving

30. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made in the campaign against drinking and driving.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Although the campaign is going well, there must be no let-up.

Last year there were 1,400 alcohol-related road deaths: a quarter of all road deaths. Twenty-three per cent. of drivers and riders killed in 1987 were over the legal limit compared with 33 per cent. in 1978.

Surveys suggest that for the first time there are fewer than one million drink/drive occasions a week. This is about half the estimate for 1987.

Recent major campaign successes include:

promotion of low and non-alcoholic beers by the brewers. These beers are now the fastest growing sector of the drinks industry.

the public endorsement of our campaigns by the Licensed Victuallers Association and the not-for-profit clubs.

the active participation of major football clubs in getting the message across to fans.

the media now treat drinking and driving as a major news topic, and one worthy of serious current affairs coverage.

We shall be launching this year's Christmas campaign on 5 December.

The problem exists all the year round. It needs constant publicity.

Heavy Lorries

31. Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many new maximum weight heavy goods vehicles have been registered since 1982.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number of new 38 tonne goods vehicles registered between May 1983, when this permitted maximum limit was introduced, and the end of September 1988, was 38,800. Between January 1982 and April 1983, 13,200 new vehicles were registered at the previous 32½ tonne limit.

Railways and Roads

32. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by what percentage spending on national railways and roads has increased in the last five years.

Mr. Portillo: British Railways board's total infrastructure investment and maintenance rose by 53 per cent. between 1982 and 1986-87. Total expenditure on roads in Great Britain rose 24·2 per cent. between 1982-83 and 1986-87. The figures are not directly comparable for a number of reasons.

M1 (Congestion)

33. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how he intends in the short term to reduce congestion on the southern end of the M1 other than through the construction of the M40.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have no plans for works which would be completed in advance of the M40.

A number of schemes for the M1 and alternative roads are planned for completion in the early 1990s.

Traffic Congestion (South-East)

34. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on how his Department proposes to relieve traffic congestion in the south-east.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: By carrying out the road improvements detailed in the White Paper "Policy for Roads in England: 1987" as quickly as possible, by supporting local highway authorities with transport supplementary grant, through traffic management measures, and by approving appropriate investment proposals by British Rail and London Regional Transport.

Bus Services (Deregulation)

35. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will introduce legislation to deregulate bus services in Greater London.

Mr. Portillo: It remains our intention to extend bus deregulation to London. The Transport Act 1985 provides for the abolition of London bus service licensing; we are considering whether any further measures might be necessary.

Bypasses

36. Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many bypasses will be started in 1989.

Mr. Bottomley: Our current intention is to start construction of some 20 bypasses in 1989.

Motorways and Trunk Roads (West Midlands)

37. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what level of capital expenditure for motorways and trunk roads within the west midlands is allocated for the current financial year and for the next year; and what was the figure for 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Exact comparisons with earlier years cannot be made because of recent changes in the Department's regional structure. Planned expenditure for 1988-89 of some £145 million in the west midlands region compares favourably with a best estimate for 1979-80 of £25 million. In real terms this represents more than a three-fold increase. Allocations for next year have still to be determined.

London Underground

39. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has met the chairman of London Underground Ltd. to discuss problems of capacity on the network.

44. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will publish the findings of the central London rail study.

63. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the Chairman of London Underground to discuss overcrowding in stations.

Mr. Portillo: The progress of the central London rail study was discussed at a meeting of the London passenger transport group on 21 November at which the Chairman of London Underground was present.

We hope to announce the main findings around the turn of the year.

71. Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on what further steps are being taken to tighten safety regulations on the London Underground.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are pursuing with London Regional Transport its progress in adopting recommendations in the Fennell report.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will shortly be bringing forward regulations under section 12 of the Fire Precautions Act 1971, to require specific fire safety measures at underground stations; these regulations will be enforceable by fire authorities. The chief inspecting officer of railways is organising a special investigation of London Underground, with support from the Health and Safety Executive and the London fire brigade; and extra staff are being recruited for the railway inspectorate, for enforcement of safety legislation.

British Rail

46. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of British Rail; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State last met the chairman of BR on 23 November when they discussed a variety of railway matters.

53. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will next meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss rail services.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will next meet the chairman of BR on 15 December to discuss a variety of rail matters.

67. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much capital investment in British Rail rose between 1988 and 1978.

Mr. Portillo: In 1978 BR's railway investment was £194 million, equivalent to £421 million in 1988-89 prices. Budgeted investment for 1988-89 is £560 million—one third more in real terms. Figures of investment since 1970 were published on 4 November in the Official Report at column 800, in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King).

42. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by how much British Rail plans to increase its investment in 1989 over 1988.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail's planned corporate investment expenditure for 1988-89 and 1989-90 is as follows:

	Cash (£ million)	1988-89 Prices (£ million)
1988-89	624	624
1989-90	846	806

This represents an increase in real terms of almost 30 per cent.

Deer

41. Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures the Government are taking to prevent deer from straying on to roads.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Anti-deer fencing is erected on motorways where deer are known to be present and where they could constitute a hazard to motorists. Other measures include special roadside reflectors. Advice is taken from wildlife experts when roads are planned. Warning signs for motorists to read are erected where deer are a known hazard.

London Regional Transport

43. Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will next meet the acting chairman of London Regional Transport to discuss the implementation of the recommendations of the Fennel report.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend met Sir Neil Shields on 16 November when the Fennel report was discussed among other matters. I shall be meeting board members of London Regional Transport and London Underground on 5 December to discuss implementation of the report.

Vehicle Emissions

47. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he intends to take to encourage a reduction in carbon monoxide, nitrogen oxide and hydrocarbon emissions from vehicles in both private and public ownership.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On 5 August, in press notice No. 418 we announced that we would be consulting in the next few months on draft regulations to bring into effect in Britain the new tighter limits on these emissions from cars and commercial vehicles agreed by the European Community in directives 88/76 EEC and 88/77/EEC. These new limits will apply to new vehicles. Our proposed timetable is as follows:

Vehicle type	New type approvals	All new registrations
Large cars (over 2,000 cc)	1 October 1991	1 October 1992
Medium cars (1,400-2,000 cc)	1 October 1991	1 October 1993
Small cars (under 1,400 cc) (stage 1)	1 October 1990	1 October 1991
Vans (under 2 tonnes gvw) etc	1 October 1990	1 October 1991
Vans (over 2 tonnes gvw) etc	1 October 1992	1 October 1993

Specific dates for imposing limits on gaseous emissions from all diesel-engined vehicles—mainly lorries, buses and coaches—are currently under discussion with the motor industry.

Road and Vehicle Safety

49. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to launch a publicity campaign to make drivers more aware of road and vehicle safety.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Yes. The next phase of the increasingly effective campaigns against drinking and driving will be launched on 5 December. Surveys show that these campaigns have led to fewer than 1 million drink/drive occasions a week.

With the support of road safety officers and the police. We have also run campaigns on child pedestrians, child seat-restraints, motorway safety and winter weather conditions, this year. Further comparisons are planned on a variety of road safety topics.

Railway Inspectorate

51. Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will meet the chief inspecting officer for railways to discuss the 1987 annual report of the railway inspectorate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State meets the chief inspecting officer of railways frequently and railway safety is discussed.

Civil Aviation

52. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the conclusions reached at the conference which he convened on civil aviation at Lancaster house on Monday 7 November.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The purpose of the conference (which was held in private) was to analyse the air traffic control congestion problems of the summer, and to discuss ways of improving matters for 1989 and beyond. The Civil Aviation Authority explained its strategy for the provision of air traffic control services in the short, medium and long term, and the conference heard of the initiatives which the United Kingdom and others have been taking to improve co-ordination between air traffic services in Europe. Ways of alleviating the effects of delays on passengers were outlined by representatives of the airlines, airports and tour operators. The conference produced a number of new ideas which are being followed up.

Wandsworth

54. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to meet hon. Members for the London borough of Wandsworth to discuss road development plans for the borough; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The west London assessment study consultants are considering a wide range of options, which include road improvements. I shall be glad to discuss the progress of the studies with the hon. Members concerned.

Sir Keith Bright and Dr. Tony Ridley

55. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he is now in a position to announce the severance terms agreed with Sir Keith Bright and Dr. Tony Ridley.

Mr. Portillo: No.

Rail Travel

57. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures the Government take to encourage the use of rail rather than road.

Mr. Portillo: The Government believe that in general users should decide which mode of transport to use, taking account of relative convenience, quality and cost. They therefore seek to ensure that different means of transport can compete fairly on equal terms. Where there are special reasons for encouraging one type of transport rather than another—that is, to relieve road congestion—and it is cost-effective to do so, the Government pay grants.

The Government also recognise that in some circumstances transferring freight from road to rail can have substantial environmental benefits and make grants under section 8 of the Railways Act 1974 towards the capital cost of freight facilities.

The Government's policies on the financing of railways are set out in more detail in their response to the third report of the Transport Select Committee, session 1986-87.

M25/M1 (Traffic Congestion)

58. Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what further measures he is considering to ease traffic congestion on the M25 and M1 in the south-east; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The whole motorway and trunk road network is kept under review and schemes for improvement are brought forward for consideration wherever they can be justified.

Specific schemes already under construction are the widening of the M25 between junctions 11 and 13 and the new four-lane Dartford river crossing bridge. Schemes being prepared are the provision of crawler lanes in both directions on the M1 at junction 9 and improvements to junction 1 of the M1.

Completion of the extension of the M40 to Birmingham, will attract traffic away from the M1, as will improvements planned for the A5 in Bedfordshire and Buckinghamshire.

Consultants are currently undertaking a review of the whole of the M25. This will identify existing and potential problem areas on the M25 and adjacent areas of radial road and suggest solutions. The results of the review are expected in the new year. We have recently received and are considering the results of a more specific study of the problems of traffic congestion around junctions 15 and 16 of the M25.

Air Routes (Liberalisation)

60. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he is making on the liberalisation of European air routes.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: As a result of liberalising measures adopted last December by the Council of Ministers, United Kingdom airlines have introduced a number of new services and lower fares on European routes. We are now preparing for the second stage of EC liberalisation, to be implemented by June 1990.

We have also been actively pressing for even more liberal bilateral agreements with other European states and have recently reached a liberal bilateral agreement with Ireland and have entered into new arrangements with Austria which remove barriers to market entry.

Motor Cycle Casualties

62. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the trend in motor cycle casualties.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is given in the table:

Motorcycle casualties and casualty rates: by severity: Great Britain: 1977 to 1987

Number/rate per 100 million vehicle kilometres

	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987
Killed	1,182	1,163	1,160	1,163	1,131	1,090	963	967	796	762	723
Rate	25	25	24	20	17	16	15	15	14	14	14
Killed or seriously injured	21,504	21,502	21,277	22,697	22,329	22,687	20,317	20,009	18,172	16,466	13,896
Rate	452	453	433	384	334	328	322	318	321	305	272

Rate	1,507	1,470	1,366	1,197	1,034	1,041	1,023	1,014	999	968	896

Motorcycles include all two wheeled motor vehicles.

Speed Restrictions

64. Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will amend the rules for imposing 30 mph speed restrictions within villages in rural areas.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Wrong limits may lead to a false sense of security and increased danger for residents.

We give guidance, in circulars (roads) 1/80 and 4/83, to highway authorities about the criteria for speed limits. That guidance is advisory. Highway authorities have discretion over speed limits on all local roads. For principal and trunk roads, our aim is to maintain a balance between safety and mobility. Introduction of 30 mph speed limits needs to be matched by enforcement and engineering measures to ensure compliance.

Road Accident Statistics

66. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the record of accidents involving death or serious injury on the A1 in Northumberland.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Personal injury traffic accidents on A1 trunk road in Northumberland are all reported by the police to the northern regional office. These statistics are also recorded nationally.

Assessments on individual sections of the A1 are made wherever a problem area can be identified.

The current accident rate for all personal injury accidents on the A1 in Northumberland, based on reports for the last three years, is 0·22 per million vehicle kilometres. This is less than the regional and national rates for non-built-up trunk roads.

New Roads (Environmental Damage)

68. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to minimise the environmental damage of new roads.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We minimise the impact of new roads on the environment by careful design. We fit schemes into the landscape, plant trees and screen traffic. We take special measures to protect wildlife. The Department's publication "Transport and the Environment" gives examples of the measures that we employ.

Road Accidents (Cost)

69. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest available figure for the annual cost of road accidents to the National Health Service.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is estimated that the cost of road accidents to the National Health Service due to hospital treatment in 1987 was £146 million.

Fatalities have a low medical cost but an incalculable family cost.

Common Shipping Policy

70. Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made in the Council of Ministers of the European Community in determining and then implementing a common shipping policy.

Mr. Portillo: In December 1986, under United Kingdom Presidency, four regulations were adopted which set the foundations for a common European shipping policy. The United Kingdom is continuing to press hard for progress towards liberalising the cabotage trades of six member states. We also await details of the EC Commission's proposals for positive measures to tackle the decline of the European fleets and to improve their competitiveness in world shipping markets.

Road Traffic Speed (London)

72. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to speed up London traffic; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are improving trunk roads to help orbital traffic and to replace bottlenecks. We are supporting similar borough schemes with grants. We have given traffic management guidance to the boroughs. We are using new technology to improve traffic signalling. We support autoguide. We are encouraging effective parking controls. We are promoting attractive public transport systems.

A31 (Stoney Cross)

73. Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to announce his final decision regarding the Stoney Cross intersections of the A31 in Hampshire.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We hope to publish a revised compulsory purchase order shortly. Our final decision will depend upon whether it is opposed and whether a further inquiry is necessary.

Railways (Overcrowding)

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has received to relieve overcrowding on the railways.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received and approved several investment proposals to relieve overcrowding on Network SouthEast and London Underground. British Rail has also put on additional trains to meet increased demand on other parts of the rail system.

M40

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to be able to announce his decision on the Waterstock to Wandlebury section of the M40.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are giving urgent consideration to the complex issues in the inspector's report. We hope to be able to make an announcement early next year.

Ports (Roads Financing)

Mr. Stern: To as the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any proposals to change the method of financing roads to or around ports.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. We will however consider seriously any well-based proposals for involvement of private funds in this or any other part of the road network.

Cars (Computerised Guidance System)

Mr John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when and where the first pilot scheme on a computerised guidance system for cars is expected to be in operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We hope shortly to invite private sector proposals for a London autoguide pilot scheme. The area of operation and timing of implementation will depend on the proposals submitted and on parliamentary approval of the necessary legislation.

Yachts (Light Dues)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates he has made of the likely revenue if yachts are required to pay light dues.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made no such estimates. He has, however, invited the British Ports Federation to undertake a study of the feasibility of charging light dues on pleasure craft. It is too early to say what conclusions might emerge.

New Roads

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many miles of new road have been built since 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Over 850 miles of new and improved trunk road have been built since 1979.

M25 (Traffic Flow)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the need to improve traffic flow on the M25.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have received a number of representations about traffic problems on the M25. A review of the whole motorway is in hand which will identify the problems and suggest solutions. The results of the review are expected in the new year. The Freight Transport Association survey shows that 97 per cent. of operators valued the M25.

Southend—London

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what informaton he has received from transport undertakings and other bodies about the increase in the numbers of persons travelling from Southend to London and back daily over the past five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is not available within the Department.

Traffic Congestion

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for alleviating traffic congestion; what are his investment priorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We seek to alleviate congestion through road improvements, investment in rail facilities and traffic management measures. Investment priorities for roads are set out in the White Paper "Policy for Roads in England 1987" and for public transport in British Rail's corporate plan 1988 and the London Regional Transport annual business plan 1987-88.

Settle-Carlisle Railway

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the future of the Settle to Carlisle railway.

Mr. Portillo: Not yet. We are waiting for advice from the Transport Users' Consultative Committees and representations from the local authorities.

Severn Bridge

17. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects work to start on a second Severn bridge; and when he estimates it will be completed.

Mr. Channon: We are on course to provide the bridge by the mid-1990s, if traffic justifies that. The private sector will be given the opportunity to fund the bridge. Promoters will be asked to indicate possible completion dates and the toll levels associated with them.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many objections he has received to his proposal to increase tolls on the Severn bridge from (a) Gwent, (b) Wales and (c) England.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have received 86 objections from persons living in Gwent, 15 from other parts of Wales, 26 from England and four from national organisations.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport why he chose Bristol as the location of the inquiry into the proposed increase of tolls on the Severn bridge in preference to a location in Wales.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Experience with previous inquiries has shown that the Bristol area is a convenient location.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many objections he received to his previous proposal to increase tolls on the Severn bridge from (a) Gwent, (b) Wales and (c) England; and how many from each area gave (i) oral and (ii) written evidence to the previous inquiry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Of the objections received to the previous proposals to increase tolls at the Severn bridge, 36 were from Gwent, seven from other areas in Wales, and 37 from England. A further seven were from national organisations.

The number of persons from each area who gave evidence to the 1984 inquiry was as follows:

	Gwent	Other areas in Wales	England	National Organisation
(i) Oral	10	7	6	10
(ii) Written	3	4	5	9

Six members of the Department of Transport also gave evidence.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the latest traffic counts for all transport modes crossing the Severn bridge and the percentage of the journeys that originate from: (a) Bristol, (b) west of England, (c) Gwent and (d) Wales.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The annual average daily flow of traffic over the Severn crossing for the 12 months ending 31 October 1988 was 46,912. Heavy goods vehicles accounted for about 17 per cent., light goods 7 per cent. and buses and coaches 1 per cent. The approximate percentage of westbound journeys originating in Bristol and Avon is 53 per cent. and from the rest of south-west England 10 per cent. The approximate percentage of eastbound journeys orginating in Gwent is 30 per cent. and from the rest of Wales 62 per cent.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Chat-line Telephone Services

Ms. Walley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) if he proposes to introduce legislation to control the chat-line telephone services and the advertising of such services;

(2) whether he proposes to take action to ban the advertising of chat-line telephone services in magazines and newspapers targeting young people.

Mr. Atkins: The Director General of Telecommunications has already proposed some controls on these services, and these proposals are being considered by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, which will report its conclusions shortly. The advertising of chat-line services is subject to the British code of advertising practice administered by the Advertising Standards Authority. The independent committee for the supervision of standards of telephone information services also takes a particular interest in advertisements of such services and considers complaints.

Patent Office

Mr. Cran: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress is being made in the planned relocation of the Patent Office to Newport, south Wales; how many civil servants will be involved in the transfer; and when he expects the relocation to be complete.

Mr. Forth: Plans for the relocation of the Patent Office to Newport are on schedule for completion by September 1991. The trade marks branch has already begun to move and will be fully established in refurbished existing accommodation at the Duffryn site by May 1989. Construction of a new building on the same site for the remainder of the office will begin early next year. In the meantime, other posts are being transferred to temporary accommodation in the area. The move involves some 850 posts of which over 500 are expected to be filled by staff recruited locally in Wales.

Three-wheeled All-terrain Vehicles

Mr. Cran: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many of the three-wheeled all-terrain vehicles recently withdrawn from the American market have now been imported into the United Kingdom; and how many are estimated to be in private hands.

Mr. Forth: My Department has responsibility for off-the-road vehicles that are for leisure use. We understand that between 2,000 and 3,000 of the three-wheeled racing ATV model TRI-Z-250 have been imported into this country from the United States of America. They are being sold through motor auctions, and we believe that about half of the above number is in private hands.

Mr. Cran: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will instigate an inquiry into the safety aspects of the off-road usage of three-wheeled all-terrain vehicles.

Mr. Forth: My Department has a considerable volume of evidence from the United States Consumer Product Safety Commission, whose report led to the withdrawal of three-wheeled all terrain vehicles from the North American market, and we have also had discussions with the manufacturers and suppliers in Britain. I am considering what action may be required.

German Cars (Sales)

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has as to how many cars the German motor industry sells in the Federal Republic and how many it sells in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Atkins: In the first nine months of this year there were 1,467,271 new German manufactured cars sold in the Federal Republic of Germany. In the same period, there were 306,295 new German-made cars sold in the United Kingdom.

Off-course Bookmaking

Mr. Watts: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will request the Director General of Fair Trading to consider the increasing concentration of off-course bookmaking in the hands of four major companies and whether a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission would be appropriate.

Mr. Maude: The Director General of Fair Trading announced on 7 January that, following detailed inquiries by his officials into the off-course bookmaking industry, he had decided not to refer the four major bookmakers—Coral, Ladbroke, Mecca and William Hill—to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The Office of Fair Trading is continuing to monitor developments. If my hon. Friend has any new information to offer about concentration in the off-course bookmaking industry he should bring it to the attention of the Director General of Fair Trading.

British Steel

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will advise the British Steel Corporation to consider further the allocation of shares to those employees who were appointed to their post by the corporation and where the corporation continues to issue all or a significant proportion of the business where their employment continues.

Mr. Atkins: No. The preferential employee share arrangements which were agreed between the Government and the company and announced on 17 May 1988 are restricted to eligible employees of British Steel plc and its wholly owned subsidiaries. To have extended the coverage of these arrangements to include employees of the numerous other companies in which British Steel has a shareholding would have presented unacceptably complicated logistical and administrative difficulties.

Hearing Aids

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many complaints have been raised in the last year regarding the supply of private hearing aids; and what has been the least common cause of complaint.

Mr. Forth: My Department has received one complaint about the supply of hearing aids in the last year. I understand that the Hearing Aid Council has received 79 representations in the same period. The most common cause of complaint was dissatisfaction with the quality of after-sales service.

European Community (State Aids)

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on European Community arrangements for monitoring the repayment of state aids granted by European Community Governments, which the European Commission and the European Court of Justice find to have been awarded in breach of the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is the responsibility of the European Commission to secure repayment of any aid which it or the European Court of Justice decide is incompatible with the treaty of Rome. In such a case, the Commission will ask the member state how it intends writing a specified timetable, to comply with the decision. The Commission then reviews progress regularly and may enter into further discussion with a member state which is slow or has difficulty in reclaiming the aid, in order to ensure compliance with the decision.

National Engineering Laboratory

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made in selecting a purchaser for the national engineering laboratory at East Kilbride; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 28 November 1988]: Following the withdrawal of YARD Ltd. from negotiations to acquire NEL, my right hon. and noble Friend has concluded that some restructuring is likely to be necessary over the next two years in order to achieve successful privatisation as soon as practicable. To this end Touche Ross management consultants have been commissioned to undertake a detailed study of the laboratory (to be completed by 15 April 1989), to plan the restructuring and the way forward towards privatisation. The study will examine those of NEL's activities which will continue to be needed to support Government functions as well as identifying any scope for involvement of higher education institutions for example by creating a technology centre. It will look at the scope for future development of the NEL site in order to reduce overheads and attract additional employment. Finally the study will advise whether there are programmes within NEL for which there is no current or future Government need and which receive inadequate industrial support. The terms of reference of the study have been placed in the Library of the House.

To assist the restructuring study and its implementation, I intend to appoint a supervisory board including some members drawn from industry and commerce. The board's role will be non-statutory and advisory and it is expected that it will be appointed for 18 months with a possibility of subsequent extension.

The names of those to be appointed to the supervisory board will be announced shortly.

The study is likely to contain commercially sensitive information and it is unlikely that it will be published.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Department Houses

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officers' houses have been sold at each London prison.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In the period from 1 April 1982 to 31 October 1988, the numbers sold were:

	Number
Brixton	56
Holloway	2
Pentonville	22
Wandsworth	32
Wormwood Scrubs	12

Information in respect of the period before 1 April 1982 is not readily available.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officers' houses are allocated to prison officers at each London prison.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On 31 October 1988, the numbers allocated, including flats, were:

	Number
Brixton	323
Holloway	166
Pentonville	195
Wandsworth	207
Wormwood Scrubs	336

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, as at 31 October, how many prison officers' houses had been sold in England and Wales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In the period from 1 April 1982 to 31 October 1988, 4,020 prison officers' houses were sold in England and Wales. Information in respect of the period before 1 April 1982 is not readily available.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the money from the sale of prison officers' housing is spent by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Income from the sale of prison officers' quarters is treated as an appropriation-in-aid, and thereby forms part of the total net provision for the prison service in England and Wales: as such it cannot be separately identified.

Prison Visits

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the prison rules on visits between husband and wives who are both serving prison sentences; how often such visits are allowed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The rules in question are contained in prison standing order 5A 19, a copy of which is in the Library.

Prisoners (Transfers)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the procedures followed by his Department regarding prison inmates who are being recommended for transfer to Broadmoor hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The following are the present procedures.

If a prison medical officer considers that an inmate is suffering from a form of mental disorder of such nature or degree that he should be removed to hospital for treatment under the provisions of the Mental Health Act 1983, arrangements are made for the inmate to be examined by a second medical officer. In cases where the prison medical officer considers that treatment would be required in conditions of maximum security, the second medical officer would be a consultant psychiatrist at one of the four special hospitals. If both doctors agree as to the nature or degree of mental disorder reports would be submitted to the Department of Health's admissions panel. If admission is agreed the panel would consider which of the four special hospitals, including Broadmoor, would be appropriate. On being satisfied that the statutory criteria have been met, my right hon. Friend can then sign a warrant directing the inmate's transfer.

Women's Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how often women inmates at Holloway prison are allowed to bath or shower; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: All the women inmates at Holloway prison are allowed a bath or shower as often as staffing permits, which is usually daily.

Passports

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the increase in passport applications since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The increase in demand, in terms of the number of standard passports issued, is as follows:

Year	Standard passports issued
1979	1,809,091
1987	2,041,220
1988 (January-October)	[1]2,171,858

[1] Provisional total.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of extra permanent and temporary staff recruited by passport offices since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The information, covering the six United Kingdom passport offices, is as follows:

Year	Highest number of staff in post in any month[1]
	Permanent staff	Casual staff
1979	901	182
1988	956	285

[1] Includes headquarters staff.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of hours of overtime worked in each passport office in 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The information is shown in the table below.

Hours of overtime worked during 1987

Passport office	Hours
London	38,213
Liverpool	43,591
Peterborough	13,083
Newport	28,345
Glasgow	16,269
Belfast	Nil
Total	139,501

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the cost to public funds of payments for overtime made to passport office staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The cost of running the passport service, including salaries, is reflected in the level of passport fees, and does not represent a net charge to public funds.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department has made any forecasts of passport application levels to 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The latest estimate of demand for standard passports to the end of 1990 is as follows:

	Million
1988	2·4
1989	2·75
1990	3·0

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the passport issuing computer system to become fully operational; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The system is already fully operational in Glasgow. It should have been extended to all other passport offices in the United Kingdom by the end of 1989.

Police

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report fom the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the action taken by mounted and other police on the Victoria embankment on the west side of Westminster bridge between 3.15 pm and 3.45 pm on Thursday 24 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the National Union of Students organised the marches which took place last Thursday in protest against the Government's proposals for student loans. The NUS had agreed the routes with the police beforehand.

The main march was due to follow a route from Malet street to Geraldine Mary Harmsworth park via Waterloo bridge. On the day, up to 17,000 people took part in this march. On crossing Waterloo bridge at about 1.20 pm a group of approximately 1,000 demonstrators, who were outside the control of NUS stewards, broke through a police cordon and proceeded along York road. This was not part of the agreed route.

The action of those marchers, who are believed in the main to have comprised members of the Socialist Workers party, encouraged several thousand others to follow suit. This body of demonstrators went to the south side of Westminster bridge, where their way was barred by police so that the Sessional Order of the House, which requires the Commissioner to keep the streets leading to the Palace of Westminster free for Members, was not breached.

For about two and half hours the police on the south side of Westminster Bridge came under intense pressure from large numbers of demonstrators who tried to break through. Missiles, including placard poles, cans, bottles and coins, were thrown at the police. A number of officers were injured by the missiles and by the efforts of the demonstrators to break through the police line. NUS stewards and the police made loudhailer requests to the demonstrators to return to the march and rally, but with no effect.

Just before 4 pm, after warnings had been given, mounted officers were deployed to disperse the crowd. I understand that this was a controlled action in which foot officers were also involved and that it was not a charge. I further understand that truncheons were neither drawn nor used. Throughout the afternoon police also had to deal with significant numbers of demonstrators at other locations; for example, at about 3.25 pm a group of demonstrators was dispersed along Victoria embankment towards Richmond terrace.

During the afternoon there were some 72 injuries to officers and five to horses. The police are aware that seven demonstrators were injured; 69 people were arrested and 50 charges have been brought, mainly for public order offences; 1,500 officers and over 70 vehicles were employed in the operations. The additional cost of policing was £27,462. I understand that a few complaints about the action of individual officers have been made. These are being investigated in accordance with the statutory procedures.

The NUS co-operated with the police both before and during the marches and the police made what arrangements they could to enable demonstrators to lobby Parliament in a way which did not breach the Sessional Order. I understand that some numbers did so. If the breakaway group had not left the march and had followed the prescribed route the disruption to traffic would not have been so great. Interruption to traffic flow is one of the factors which the police take into account when discussing with organisers the proposed route of a march. Where necessary the police can use powers in the Public Order Act 1986 formally to impose conditions on unco-operative organisers if they reasonably believe that the march would otherwise result in serious public disorder, serious damage to property or serious disruption to the life of the community. It was not considered to be necessary in this case because the NUS were believed to be co-operative and responsible. It was the determined violent action of a group which they were unable to control which led to the confrontation and disruption.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Criminal Proceedings (Jurors)

Mr. Cash To ask the Attorney-General what steps he is taking to ensure that the right of the Crown to stand by jurors in criminal proceedings is limited to exceptional circumstances following the abolition of peremptory challenge.

The Attorney-General: The enactment by Parliament of legislation abolishing the right of defendants in England and Wales to remove jurors by means of peremptory challenge makes it appropriate that the Crown in England and Wales should assert its own right to stand by only on the basis of clearly defined and restrictive criteria. During the Third Reading of the Criminal Justice Bill my noble Friend, the Earl of Caithness, undertook on my behalf at column 980 of the Official Report for 1 December 1987 that in future stand by would be exercised in only two situations. These are, first, to remove a manifestly unsuitable juror, but only if the defence agrees; secondly, to remove a juror in a terrorist or security case in which the Attorney-General has authorised a check of the jury list, but only on the personal authority of the Attorney-General.

Accordingly, I have today had placed in the Libraries of both Houses copies of guidelines on the excercise by the Crown of its right to stand by. The guidelines are to have effect from 5 January 1989 to coincide with the implementation of section 118 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, which abolishes the right of peremptory challenge.

I am also taking this opportunity to re-issue, and have placed in the Libraries of both Houses, copies of my guidelines on jury checks. These incorporate amendments made in 1986, together with a new amendment to paragraph 9 whereby the Attorney-General's personal authority is required before the right to stand by can be exercised on the basis of information obtained as a result of an authorised check.

Family Law Reform Act 1987

Miss Lestor: To ask the Attorney-General whether the Government will bring the outstanding parts of the Family Law Reform Act 1987 into force within the next year; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The Government hope to bring those parts of the Act relating to parental rights and duties, custody and financial provision for children, and registration of birth where the parents are unmarried, into force on 1 April 1989.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Students (Statistics)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of home students entered university undergraduate courses in Great Britain and Council for National Academic Awards first degree courses in England did not have two or more A level passes or Scottish highers in each year since 1979.

Mr. Jackson: The available information is given in the table below:

Proportion of entrants to university in undergraduate courses and all public sector first degree courses[1] who do not have two or more A-level passes or Scottish Highers

	University (Great Britain) United Kingdom domiciled	Public Sector (England) All students
1980	9·2	..
1981	8·6	..
1982	8·8	..
1983	..	..
1984	8·6	30·4
1985	14·7[2]	33·9
1986	15·9	33·3
1987	17·2	35·2

.. Not available.

[1] Includes entrants to CNAA and university validated degree courses.

[2] From 1985 onwards the basis of the university figures changed. The figures for 1985 to 1987 include students aged 21 and over who have A-level or Scottish Higher qualifications, as well as all entrants with other qualifications.

Vivisection

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made in reducing the number of primates for purposes of vivisection in the establishments for which he is responsible.

Mr. Jackson: All proposals which involve the use of animals in scientific experiments must be licensed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. Such proposals are subject to very careful scrutiny—including the scope for using alternative experimental approaches not involving live animals. The establishments for which my right hon. Friend is responsible, and which use animals in experimental or other scientific procedures, are subject to the Act's provisions.

Superannuation Schemes

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science why the universities superannuation scheme is no longer transferable to the National Health Service superannuation scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: I understand that accrued pension benefits in the universities superannuation scheme are transferred to the National Health Service superannuation scheme on a regular and substantial basis.

PRIME MINISTER

Birmingham

Q19. Mr. Rooker: To ask the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Birmingham.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

European Council

Q29. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list the topics she expects to be placed on the agenda at the meeting of the European Council at Rhodes on 2 and 3 December next.

The Prime Minister: The Rhodes European Council is expected to be devoted to discussion on the Commission's article 8(b) progress report on completion of the single market, the EC's role in the wider world, and the environment.

Ministers (Exchanges of Letters)

Q40. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions she has in the exchange of letters with departing Ministers expressed the hope that the departing Minister would return to high office soon and resume his ministerial career.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave him on 15 November 1988 at column 543.

Crown Immunity

Q59. Mr. Ashley: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy that Ministers do not seek Crown immunity from prosecution for their Departments when the anticipated regulations on emissions into the atmosphere come into force.

The Prime Minister: The Government's policy on Crown immunity is that it should not lead to lower standards being accepted on Crown premises. It is reviewed in individual cases only where there appears to be evidence of cause for concern.

Engagements

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 November.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 November.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 November.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 November.

Mr. Calum Macdonald: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 November.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 November.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 November.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 November.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Kampuchea

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there have been any developments in the move to offer aid and to recognise Kampuchea on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Chris Patten: We have no dealings with the illegal and unrepresentative regime in Phnom Penh. We are, however, contributing £100,000 to the Food and Agriculture Organisation/World Food Programme appeal for Cambodia, and last month I announced an additional allocation of £500,000 to support projects, including humanitarian projects in Cambodia, proposed by British voluntary agencies for assistance under the joint funding scheme.

WALES

Health Authorities (Pharmaceutical Staff)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those area health authorities in Wales which have reported a shortage of qualified pharmaceutical staff.

Mr. Grist: There have been reports of difficulties in the recruitment of qualified hospital pharmaceutical staff in a number of health authorities in Wales. The latest information held by the Department on the level of vacancies in health authorities in Wales relates to the position as at 31 December 1987 and is as follows:

District Health Authority	Whole time equivalent vacancies for qualified pharmacists[1]
Clwyd	6·5
East Dyfed	2·0
Gwent	7·0
Gwynedd	0·3
Mid Glamorgan	5·0
Pembrokeshire	0·0
Powys	0·0
South Glamorgan	8·0
West Glamorgan	5·0

[1] Difference between funded establishment and staff in post. Includes pre-registration graduates.

Hospital pharmacy manpower has been the subject of a recent joint review by the manpower steering group established by the Department and the Welsh pharmaceutical committee. The report of that review has made a number of recommendations for action to mitigate the effects of recruitment difficulties and shortages among hospital pharmacy staff and to improve pharmacy services within the NHS in Wales. The report will shortly be issued with a view to early implementation of its recommendations as appropriate and I shall place a copy in the Library of the House.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of (a) the impact of the Severn bridge on the economy of Cardiff and South Glamorgan and (b) the impact of bridge closures and queues on the business promotion of south Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There can be no doubt that the Severn bridge and the M4 are vital to the economy of Cardiff, south Glamorgan and the whole of south Wales in providing good, speedy communications to southern England and Europe.

I am aware of no evidence that the occasional traffic delays at the bridge or the very infrequent temporary closures have deterred business promotions in south Wales. Inward investment, the creation of new businesses, the fall in unemployment, and the clearance of derelict land have all been at remarkably high levels.

Elderly People

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of (a) 65 to 70-year-olds, (b) 70 to 75-year-olds, (c) 75 to 80-year-olds, (d) 80 to 85-year-olds, and (e) people over 85 years old receiving private sector care.

Mr. Grist: The total number of residents aged 65 or over in private homes in Wales registered with local authorities under part 1 of the Registered Homes Act 1984 as at 31 March 1987 was 4,907. Disaggregation by age-band is not available. Neither is information available centrally for the number of patients receiving care in private hospitals, nursing homes and clinics (section 23 of the Registered Homes Act 1984).

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of (a) 65 to 70-year-olds, (b) 70 to 75-year-olds, (c) 75 to 80-year olds, (d) 80 to 85-year-olds, and (e) people over 85 years old receiving National Health Service care.

Mr. Grist: The latest available information, for 1987, is given in the table:

Number of Discharges (including deaths) from NHS hospitals in Wales

Age (years)	Number
65-69	33,823
70-74	34,950
75-79	34,244
80-84	26,456
85 and over	18,657

The figures include all patients treated in NHS hospitals, including full paying patients.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of people (a) between 65 and 75 years old and (b) over 75 years old who have been identified as needing or having (i) hip replacements, (ii) cataracts, (iii) chest complaints, (iv) heart disease, (v) strokes, (vi) Parkinson's disease, (vii) Alzheimer's disease and (viii) osteo/rheumatoid arthritis.

Mr. Grist: Information in the form requested is not available centrally. The number of discharges (including deaths) from NHS hospitals in Wales in 1987 by each diagnosis is as follows:

Number of discharges (including deaths) from NHS hospitals in Wales, by age (years)

Diagnosis (ICD9 code)	65-74	75+
Cataracts (366)	1,472	2,357
Ischaemic heart disease (410-414)	3,822	3,526
Other heart disease (393-398, 401-405, 415, 416, 420-429)	3,171	4,383
Parkinson's Disease (332)	270	640
Rheumatoid arthritis (7140)	497	279
Alzheimer's Disease (3310)	25	53
Cerebrovascular disease (430-438	2,455	4,090
—of which cerebrovascular accident—4369)	(1,599	2,831)
Chest complaints:
i. acute respiratory infection (460-466)	124	246
ii. other diseases of upper respiratory tract (470-478)	402	117
iii. pneumonia and influenza (480-487)	610	1,809
iv. bronchitis and emphysema (490-493)	1,067	825
v. other diseases of respiratory system (494-519)	2,539	3,345
Hip replacement (OPCS operation code 810, 811)	750	800

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list (a) the financial resources allocated to the National Health Service for the care of the elderly and (b) the number of units and staff specifically allocated within the National Health Service for the care of the elderly.

Mr. Grist: The major part of resources for the care of the elderly in the National Health Service is included in the discretionary allocations which health authorities distribute according to their own priorities. In 1988-89 the Welsh Office allocated an additional £1·4 million of central funds to Welsh health authorities aimed at providing care for the elderly, including the elderly mentally infirm and psychogeriatrics, and a further £0·34 million was allocated under the elderly initiative for approved schemes sponsored by Welsh health authorities.

Information on the number of units specifically allocated to the care of the elderly within the National Health Service is not held centrally. However, the number of beds allocated to the specialties of geriatrics, elderly mentally infirm and psychogeriatrics at 31 March 1988 in Wales was 4,603. The number of medical staff in the speciality of geriatrics at 30 September 1986 in Wales was 153 whole-time equivalents and the number of nursing staff working with geriatric patients at 31 October 1988 was 3,925 whole-time equivalents.

It should be noted that beds and staff recorded against other specialist areas may also be involved in the care of the elderly.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Security Offices

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any proposals to close, or review the future, of social security offices in Nottingham.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No.

Pensions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many retirement pensions are paid out nationally.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As at 31 March 1988 approximately 9·8 million people were in receipt of basic state retirement pension.

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the cost of abolishing the pensioner earnings rule.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The annual cost of abolition of the earnings rule would be about £250 million gross, before taking account of tax effects.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in the following age ranges currently receive a full basic state pension: 60 to 65 years, 65 to 70 years, 70 to 75 years, 75 to 80 years, 80 to 85 years, 85 to 90 years and 90 years and over, identifying whether they are married or single.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is as follows:

Numbers in receipt of full basic state pension at 31 March 1988

Aged	Numbers
60-64	[1]719,840
65-69	2,241,140
70-74	2,003,720
75-79	1,706,150
80-84	1,087,660
85-89	509,990
90 and over	204,330

[1] Women only.

Information relating to marital status is not available.

Elderly Persons (Residential Homes)

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the current cost of social security payments for elderly persons entering nursing and residential homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 25 November at column 44.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many elderly people are receiving social security payments in residential homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I regret that information is not available in the precise form requested. However, the total number of income support recipients in independent residential care homes was estimated to be 103,000 in May 1988. At the same time there were estimated to be 44,000 such claimants in independent nursing homes.

Disabled People

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the Social Security Advisory Committee's report on benefits for disabled people will be published.

Mr. Scott: I understand that the SSAC's report "Benefits for Disabled People: a strategy for change" was published today. Copies of the report are available in the Vote Office.

SCOTLAND

NHS Consumer Survey

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to publish the results of the NHS consumer survey done by Research Surveys of Great Britain.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend will consider what form of publication is appropriate when he receives the report of the consumer survey of the NHS from Research Surveys of Great Britain.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the cost of the consumer survey on the NHS in Scotland done by Research Surveys of Great Britain.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The cost is £105,000+VAT.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to receive the reports from Research Surveys of Great Britain on the NHS in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Early in the new year.

Higher Education

Mr. Robert Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will establish a central council for the funding of institutions in Scottish higher education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Education Reform Act 1988 provides for the funding of universities through the Universities Funding Council, and for that council to have a Scottish committee. The committee will discharge the functions outlined by my right hon. and learned Friend to the House on 1 April 1987. This will facilitate better planning of the university and grant-aided college sectors of higher education, funded respectively through the Universities Funding Council and the Scottish Education Department.

European Parliamentary Constituencies

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the Boundary Commission for Scotland intends to conduct any supplementary review of European parliamentary constituencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: The commission has informed me that it intends to consider the making of a supplementary report on the following six European parliamentary constituencies in Scotland:

Mid Scotland and Fife
Lothians
South of Scotland
Strathclyde East
Strathclyde West
Glasgow

In each case, I understand that the review has been occasioned by alterations to parliamentary constituency boundaries which those of the European parliamentary constituencies concerned no longer follow exactly.

National Engineering Laboratory, East Kilbride

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on the proposed privatisation of the National Engineering Laboratory at East Kilbride; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 28 November 1988]: My right hon. and learned Friend has received representations from Ken Collins MEP and from the general secretary of the Scottish Trades Union Congress expressing concern about the proposed privatisation. He also received letters from two parties with an interest in the possible purchase of NEL. The Department of Trade and Industry is currently examining the future of NEL in consultation with the Scottish Office, and my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will make an announcement in due course.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Palestine

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on the proposed establishment of a Palestinian state.

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to recognise a state of Palestine; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The decisions taken by the Palestine National Council represent a modest but potentially important step towards a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, although we believe that the declaration of a Palestinian state does not help carry matters forward.

Baltic Republics

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to make representations to the Soviet Government on the subject of the Baltic Republics.

Mr. Waldegrave: Our policy remains that we do not recognise de jure the forcible incorporation of the former Baltic States into the Soviet Union. We regularly make this clear to the Soviet authorities. We are encouraged by recent signs that the Baltic peoples are increasingly able to express their views about their own future. We hope this process will continue.

Caribbean

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current state of relations between the United Kingdom and states in the Caribbean.

Mr. Eggar: Britain has diplomatic relations with all the independent countries in the Caribbean, but relations with members of the Commonwealth in the region are particularly close and friendly.

Human Rights (USSR)

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he is currently undertaking with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on human rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Human rights are an established and important element of our bilateral dialogue, with individual cases raised as and when necessary. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State raises both such cases and the need for more fundamental changes whenever he meets Mr. Shevardnadze and these issues will of course be high on the agenda during the visit of Mr. Gorbachev on 12 to 14 December.

In addition we have bilateral official-level consultations on human rights; the next round is scheduled for early next year.

Multi-sensor Platforms

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Government's investigations into the export to South Africa via West Germany of multi-sensor platforms containing components supplied by British Aerospace have been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Inquiries are continuing.

Rights of the Child Convention

Mr. Dickens: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he proposes to monitor the forthcoming United Nations convention on the rights of the child.

Mr. Eggar: We have, since 1980, played an active part in the working group set up to draft the United Nations convention on the rights of the child. We shall continue to do so.

Norris v. Ireland

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, in the light of the recent judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Norris v. Ireland, re-affirming that the complete illegality of consensual homosexual acts between males violates article 8 of the European convention on human rights, what steps Her Majesty's Government proposes to take to ensure that the law outlawing consensual homosexual acts between males in Gibraltar is brought into line with the court's ruling.

Mrs. Chalker: We have brought the Norris judgment to the attention of the Gibraltar authorities, who are considering the matter.

Vietnamese Refugees

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures he is taking to persuade other countries to accept more Vietnamese refugees who are at present in Hong Kong.

Mr. Eggar: Following our decision in May 1987 to resettle in this country a further 468 Vietnamese refugees from Hong Kong, we have taken every opportunity to urge other Governments to follow our example by expanding their resettlement programmes. We are continuing to press the case for increased resettlement from Hong Kong, in our bilateral contacts, in the appropriate multilateral fora and through UNHCR.

Mr. Douglas Celecia

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why and on what terms compensation was paid to Mr. Douglas Celecia, a witness to the Gibraltar shootings; and how much compensation was paid.

Mr. Eggar: On 1 July the Gibraltar Attorney-General agreed with Mr. Douglas Celecia to pay £10,000 in full and final settlement of an action commenced against the Gibraltar Commissioner of Police in the Supreme Court of Gibraltar claiming damages for the removal of 15 exposures of film taken possession of by the Gibraltar police. The 15 exposures identified members of the security forces involved in the shooting of the IRA terrorists. The Crown in Gibraltar retained copyright in the 15 exposures until the end of the inquest.

UNESCO

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to be in a position to consider rejoining UNESCO.

Mr. Eggar: Before we can even contemplate reconsidering our position on membership of UNESCO, we will need to be convinced that fundamental reforms in both the administration and the programme policies of UNESCO are being implemented, not just considered. The very earliest opportunity we will have to assess the future programmes and management of the organisation will be after the conclusion of the general conference in late 1989. For us to consider a possible reassessment of the situation before then would be premature and unrealistic.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures on table 11 of annex 4 of Cmnd. 9756 and those applicable under his revised scheme at current rates of income tax; and if he will provide separate figures for (a) higher rate taxpayers and (b) those who have opted for the wife's earnings election where neither spouse is currently subject to higher rate tax;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures in table 10 of annex 4 of Cmnd. 9756, showing those applicable under his revised scheme at current rates of income tax;

(3) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures in paragraph 19 and table 8 of annex 4 of Cmnd. 9756 and those applicable under his revised scheme at current rates of income tax;

(4) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures in paragraph 20 and table 9 of annex 4 of Cmnd. 9756 and those applicable under his revised scheme at current rates of income tax;

(5) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the figures in chart 6.1 Cmnd. 9756 against the current position and that proposed for 1990-91 at present rates.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The detailed comparisons requested between the effects of the system of transferable allowances in Cmnd. 9756 and the change to independent taxation from April 1990 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the information he has about capital gains tax rates in France, West Germany, Japan and the United States of America and giving the comparable rates in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest information available is contained in the table.

Nominal rate(s) of tax on gains of individuals

Country	Per cent.
France[3]	16
West Germany[1 2]	22-56
Japan[1 4]	10·5-60
United States of America[1]	15 and 28
United Kingdom[1]	25 and 40

Notes

[1] Rate(s) determined by adding gains to income.

[2] Tax charge generally confined to short-term gains and substantial shareholding in companies. Proposals are under more comprehensive taxation of gains.

[3] Gains on portfolio investments generally exempt if less than in specified annual limit: special provisions for long-term gains.

[4] Gains on portfolio investments at present generally exempt, but there are proposals for taxing such gains. Special provisions for long-term gains.

THE ARTS

Museum Year

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many museums are participating in Museum Year; and if he will make a statement as to the current level of public interest in museums in Britain.

Mr. Luce: The information provided by the Museums Association, which is organising Museums Year, is that well over 1,000 museums are expected to participate in the Museums Year celebrations.

The level of public interest in museums is very encouraging. The number of visitors to museums and galleries rose from 68 million in 1985 to 73 million in 1986. The Museums Association estimates that visitor numbers could top 100 million during Museums Year 1989.

HEALTH

Home Chiropody Service (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will call for a report on the ending of the home chiropody service in the Nottingham district health authority area.

Mrs. Currie: The criteria for domiciliary (home) chiropody services in Nottingham health authority are being reviewed. Approximately 25 per cent. of chiropody service contacts have previously been in the domiciliary setting. The most effective way of delivering chiropody treatment is by concentrating on—

(1) a service in health centres and clinics;

(2) in conjunction with attendance at out patient clinics and day centres;

(3) a home service for those who are housebound by disability and/or have no means of transport to clinics.

The review is intended to deploy the available resources more effectively and ensure that more treatments are carried out overall and that the domiciliary service is concentrated on those patients who are truly in need of treatment at home.

All patients on the domiciliary list have been visited and given a letter by a chiropodist explaining that the domiciliary service as previously deployed is being suspended and all patients on the list reviewed. Where patients can attend a local clinic session or the treatment can be combined with day centre attendance this is being arranged. If patients are in need of continuing home treatment this will carry on as before. There will be written confirmation to patients who will be remaining on the home treatment list and this will reach them once the backlog of letters due to the industrial action by the postal services in Nottingham is cleared. In these circumstances I consider that the further action called for is not necessary.

Consultants and Community Physicians

Mr. Raison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) consultants and (b) community physicians have been suspended from their duties in each year since 1980; and for what reasons.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Greenhouse Effect

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that hospital energy programmes and transportation facilities do not add to the greenhouse effect.

Mrs. Currie: There is a highly successful energy efficiency programme in the National Health Service which since 1978-79 has achieved aggregate savings of over £300 million. Fossil fuel consumption is currently reducing at a rate of 2 per cent. per annum. We are reviewing our policies on transport in the National Health Service to see if the environmental impact can be reduced.

Contraceptives

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total annual cost of providing contraceptive services in England and Wales, including pharmaceutical costs and the overhead charge involved in providing such services.

Mrs. Currie: The available information relates to expenditure on family planning provided through health authority community health services, including overheads, the contraceptive fees paid to GPs and the estimated net ingredient cost of contraceptive drugs and appliances prescribed by general practitioners and dispensed by pharmacists. These give an estimated expenditure in 1986-87 of £86 million for England and Wales.

NHS (Laundry)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which sections of laundry within the National Health Service are (a) exempt and (b) not exempt from inventory control.

Mr. Mellor: Health authorities are responsible for providing efficient and cost-effective laundry services. Procedures for inventory control are determined locally but health authorities must report discrepancies if the total in one financial year is in excess of £5,000.

National Health Service

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the improvements that the regions are planning for the National Health Service as a result of the substantial additional moneys recently announced.

Mr. Mellor: Whilst details of regional health authorities' plans for 1989-90 will not be available to the Department until early next year, recent discussions with regions about their intentions for that year showed that, even before the Chancellor's Autumn Statement, all had identified significant areas for proposed service improvement. These include continued increases in numbers of patients treated in the acute sector and substantial projects to develop and improve community care.

Population Statistics

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people there are in the United Kingdom in the following age ranges: 60 to 65 years, 65 to 70 years, 70 to 75 years, 75 to 80 years, 80 to 85 years, 85 to 90 years and 90 years and over.

Mrs. Currie: The information requested is as follows:

United Kingdom estimated resident population for ages 60 and over

Age groups	Mid-1987 population (thousands)
60-64	2,982·5
65-69	2,749·5
70-74	2,288·5
75-79	1,849·3
80-84	1,167·0
85-89	540·6
90 and over	219·2

Registered Voters

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the numbers of registered voters for the years 1973, 1978, 1983 and 1988 in the cities of Birmingham, Bradford, Bristol, Cardiff, Coventry, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, Newcastle and Sheffield.

Mrs. Currie: The information requested is as follows:

Local authority	Registered local government electors
	1973[1]	1978	1983	1988
Birmingham	767,093	759,290	760,402	749,033

Sheffield	420,292	419,686	424,841	421,084

[1] Figures for 1973 have been adjusted to relate to districts constituted after the 1974 local government reorganisations.

Community Psychiatric Nurses

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many community psychiatric nurses there have been in each health region in each of the last two years.

Mr. Mellor: Information in the exact form requested is not available. However, the number of nursing staff employed in the community psychiatric service in each regional health authority at 30 September 1986 and 1987 is shown in the table.

Community Psychiatric Nursing Staff[1]: England 30 September

Health Authorities (Emission Controls)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether health authorities will be liable to prosecution if they do not conform with new controls on emission expected to come into force next year.

Mrs. Currie: Yes.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will name the seven health authorities which, in the last 12 months, did not comply with statutory standards on emission to the atmosphere and the operation and maintenance of hospital incinerators and because the matter could not be resolved locally were referred to the regional health authorities; what action was taken by his Department to find out whether or not the health authorities did eventually comply with the statutory requirement; and how many such references were made to the regional health authorities in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Currie: Referrals were made about incinerators operated by the Bloomsbury, Cambridge, Leicester, Liverpool, North West Hertfordshire, Parkside and Sheffield district health authorities. The Department is monitoring the outcome of the regional health authorities' intervention; in some cases remedies are still under consideration. Full details of past referrals are not readily available, but we estimate they have averaged three or four per annum over the last five years.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he intends to permit the prosecution of health authorities which do not meet the requirements of the Clean Air Act 1956; and if there are any plans to repeal section 22 of this Act.

Mrs. Currie: No, because all referrals to the Department under section 22 of the Clean air Act are thoroughly investigated and, if health authorities are not Crown immune from the planned new controls on emissions, they will become liable to enforcement of these controls.

Hospital Incinerators

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how long the transitional period allowed for the replacement of existing hospital incinerators which do not meet the new proposed controls on emission will be; what is the normal life of a hospital incinerator; and what evidence he has concerning whether the private sector can dispose of clinical waste more efficiently or cheaply than health authorities.

Mrs. Currie: No decision has yet been taken on the length of the transitional period, but it is intended to provide for the replacement of incinerators which are incapable of operating within the more stringent controls. Pending replacement health authorities will be required to upgrade the performance of their plant as near to the new standard as is practicable. I am advised that the average life of a hospital incinerator is 15 years.

Health authorities' decisions on how to dispose of clinical waste are made by local option appraisal. Since outcomes vary depending upon local circumstances it is not possible to generalise about the relative cost of in-house and private sector disposal.

Community Health Councils (Emission Controls)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will encourage community health councils to inquire into whether their local hospitals are keeping to statutory levels regarding the emission of carcinogens, pathogens, and other toxic chemicals; and if he will ensure that they receive the basic information that will enable them to make informed inquiries.

Mrs. Currie: Community health councils were established to represent the views of patients in their districts. They are independent of the Department and it would not be appropriate for the Department to encourage them to perform particular functions, especially those for which they have no special expertise.

Air Pollution

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he received a copy of the report from the National Society for Clean Air entitled "Air Pollution from Crown Property"; what response he made to the society; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Yes; we have asked regional health authorities to investigate the operation of those hospital incinerators cited in the report of which we had no previous knowledge. We have also informed the society of our intentions regarding the application of planned new emission controls to the National Health Service.

Pharmaceutical Staff

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those district health authorities in England which have reported a shortage of qualified pharmaceutical staff.

Mr. Mellor: We are aware of some reports of vacancies in some districts for qualified pharmaceutical staff, but we do not collect this information centrally.

Opren

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to the extent to which patients suffered photosensitivity after taking Opren could be vulnerable to acute radiation skin reaction; and, if appropriate, if he will advise consultants to identify such patients before recommending radiation treatment.

Mr. Mellor: I am aware of a case in the Lancet of 15 October 1988 describing an acute radiation-induced cutaneous reaction in a patient with persistent photosensitivity who had been treated previously with Opren. It is normal medical practice for radiotherapists to check patients' medical history before treatment in order to identify possible factors such as a history of photosensitivity which might cause a skin reaction to radiotherapy. Such possible risks have to be weighed against the benefits of radiotherapy and risks and benefits of other possible treatments.

Hospital Visits

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the hospitals he has visited since his appointment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Since I was appointed I have visited on official ministerial visits:

Cannock community hospital
Bristol royal infirmary
Southend hospital
Royal Victoria infirmary, Newcastle
Freeman hospital, Newcastle

I have also met many health service medical, nursing and other professional staff and also managers and chairmen.

Nurses (Regrading)

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to accept any offer by unions representing the nursing profession to submit the current dispute over interpretation of the new grading agreement to binding arbitration, or to refer the dispute to ACAS.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke No.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his Department has issued any guidance to health authorities about dealing with inquiries from the press during the current dispute about the grading of nurses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No guidance has been issued.

NHS Spending

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was Government spending on the National Health Service per household as a proportion of the average household income in 1987-88.

Mr. Mellor: Gross NHS expenditure per household in the United Kingdom represented 6·8 per cent. of average household income in 1987, as against 6·3 per cent. in 1978.

Ambulances (Greater Manchester)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated overspend on the north-west regional health authority's ambulance budget by the end of the current financial year; whether he proposes to take any action in regard to the closure of ambulance stations in greater Manchester due to the lack of crews; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what information he has as to how many ambulance stations have been closed in greater Manchester in the last 12 months; for what length of time and for what reasons; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what information he has as to the number of occasions in the last 12 months in which ambulances have been turned away from the first accident and emergency department they called at in greater Manchester, and as to the reasons for such refusal; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We do not hold information centrally on these matters. The hon. Members may wish to address their inquiries to Mr. Bruce Martin, QC, chairman of north-west regional health authority who has responsibility for the management of ambulance services in greater Manchester, and the allocation of resources for ambulance services, as a whole, throughout the north-western region.

Hearing Aids

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his best estimate of the number of people who would benefit from wearing a hearing aid.

Mrs. Currie: The Institute of Hearing Research claims that there are 3·2 million adults over 18 years of age in England and Wales who have a hearing loss of at least 35 decibels in the better ear and who might therefore benefit from having a hearing aid fitted.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hearing aid centres there are in the United Kindom and what is the average wait for an appointment.

Mrs. Currie: There are 179 hearing aid centres in England and Wales. According to a survey carried out in 1986 by the British Association of Audiology Technicians, the average waiting time in the United Kingdom is 7·2 weeks.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hearing aids were fitted in the last year for which figures are available; how many were for (a) children and (b) pensioners; and what proportion were private aids supplied by the National Health Service.

Mrs. Currie: Around 150,000 hearing aids were fitted to new patients in England and Wales in the Financial year 1987-88. We cannot say how many were for children and pensioners but around 4 per cent. would be private aids supplied by the National Health Service.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has about the number and percentage of people who do not wear their National Health Service hearing aid after it has been provided.

Mrs. Currie: The best information we have is from the Institute of Hearing Research, which estimates that nearly a quarter of people who have a hearing aid do not use it.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many National Health Service hearing aids are currently being used by deaf and hard of hearing people; how many batteries are supplied annually; and from how many centres they are available.

Mrs. Currie: The vast majority of National Health Service hearing aids are behind-the-ear models and around 3·5 million have been issued since 1974. Over 20 million batteries are issued annually from 372 centres in England and Wales.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hearing aid centres operate an accelerated referral procedure; what proportion this is of the total; what monitoring there has been of accelerated referral; and what is his Department's policy on this procedure.

Mrs. Currie: The British Association of Audiology Technicians carried out a survey of just over 200 audiology departments and hearing aid centres in 1986. Of the 148 who replied, 91 had a system of accelerated referral. The organisation of audiology departments and hearing aid centres is the responsibility of district health authorities.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how may hearing aid centres have domiciliary visiting provision; to what extent it is used; and how many people are visited;

(2) what information he has regarding the number of people requiring hearing aids who would benefit from a domiciliary visit;

(3) what is the average length of time spent by National Health Service audiology technician fitting a hearing aid and advising on its use; and how many follow-up appointments are generally required.

Mrs. Currie: We do not hold this information centrally.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the types of hearing aids currently supplied by the National Health Service.

Mrs. Currie: The types of hearing aid in the National Health Service standard range are:

Code number	Description
BE11	Head-worn hearing aid, with induction coil and tone control, suitable for the moderately hard of hearing.
BE11	BE11 hearing aid in brown case.
BE12	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil suitable for the moderately hard of hearing.
BE13	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil and forward-facing microphone suitable for the moderately hard of hearing.
BE14	Head-worn aid with induction coil and tone control suitable for the moderately hard of hearing.
BE15	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil and tone control suitable for the moderately hard of hearing.
BE16	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, tone control and forward facing microphone for the moderately hard of hearing.
BE17	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, low cut tone control and forward facing microphone for the moderately hard of hearing.
B1702	BE17 hearing aid in brown case.
BE18	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, low cut tone, 3-position peak clipping presets and forward facing microphone for the moderately hard of hearing.
BE19	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, low cut tone control and forward facing microphone for the moderately hard of hearing.
BE31	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, tone control and peak clipping for the moderately to severely hard of hearing.
BE31	BE31 Hearing aid in brown case.
BE32	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, tone control, peak clipping and forward facing microphone for the moderately to severely hard of hearing.
BE33	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, low cut tone control, peak clipping and forward facing microphone for the moderately to severely hard of hearing.
BE34	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, tone control and peak clipping forward facing microphone for the moderately to severely hard of hearing.
BE35	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, tone control and peak clipping, forward facing microphone for the moderately severely hard of hearing.
BE51	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, low-high cut tone, peak clipping, combined MT presets and forward facing microphone for the severely hard of hearing.
BE52	BE52 Hearing aid in brown case.
BE53	Head-worn hearing aid with induction coil, independent low and high cut tone, peak clipping, combined MT presets and forward facing microphone for the severely hard of hearing.
BW61	Body-worn high power air and bone conduction hearing aid with induction coil, combined MT, low cut tone controls, low and high cut tone, adjustable peak clipping, adjustable maximum gain presets for the very severely hard of hearing.
BW81	Body-worn extra powerful air and bone conduction hearing aid with induction coil combined MT control low-high cut tone, adjustable peak clipping, adjustable maximum gain presets for the profoundly hard of hearing.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to provide a National Health Service in-the-ear hearing aid.

Mrs. Currie: In-the-ear aids are not included in the standard range of National Health Service hearing aids, but district health authorities have power to provide them if they are considered to be essential.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will seek evidence from consumer groups and those concerned with the welfare of the elderly regarding the level of satisfaction or dissatisfaction with National Health Service and the private supply of hearing aids.

Mrs. Currie: We are in touch with various voluntary and other organisations about hearing aid provision.

Ear, Nose and Throat

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many ear, nose and throat consultant posts are currently vacant; what percentage of National Health Service established posts is vacant; and what are the percentage figures for the last five years;

(2) what steps he is taking to reduce the number of vacant ear, nose and throat consultant posts.

Mr. Mellor: Information about the percentage of posts vacant is set out in the table. It is for health authorities to decide what action is appropriate to fill particular vacant posts. The Department's role is to ensure that there are sufficient fully trained surgeons to take up the posts available. On the advice of the joint planning advisory committee an additional 11 whole time equivalent senior registrar posts were agreed earlier this year to meet authorities' plans for additional consultant posts over the next 10 years.

Percentage of consultant posts without a permanent holder[1]
at 30 September: England
Ear, Nose and Throat Surgery (Otolaryngology)

	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987
Number of vacant posts	29	28	26	16	14
Percentage[2]	7·8	7·5	7·0	4·4	3·8

Notes:

1. From 30 September 1986 the definition of a post without a permanent holder was amended to exclude posts for which a central manpower approval had been given which authorities had not the steps to establish. Central control over the establishment of new consultant posts in ENT was discontinued in 1984.
2. Posts without a permanent holder as a percentage of the sum of such posts and consultant staff in post in permanent paid posts.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average waiting time for an out-patient appointment to see an ear, nose and throat consultant; what has been the average time for each of the last five years; and how many districts currently have waiting times twice as long as the average or longer.

Mr. Mellor: We do not collect information on out-patient waiting times centrally.

Audiological Technicians

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many audiological technicians posts are currently vacant; what percentage this is of the National Health Service establishment; and what have been the percentage figures of vacant posts in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: We do not collect information on vacant posts centrally.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to increase the supply of audiology technicians for the National Health Service.

Mr. Mellor: Any action needed is a matter for individual health authorities to decide.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the different types of specialist staff involved with audiological work giving the nature of their responsibilities, and their training.

Mr. Mellor: The main types of specialist staff involved with audiological work are ear, nose and throat surgeons, audiological physicians, audiological scientists, audiological technicians and hearing therapists. Their responsibilities cover a wide spectrum of work in respect of diagnosis, treatment and management of people whose hearing is impaired. Each group is trained in accordance with requirements specified by the responsible professional body or the appropriate employing authority.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how long the training of audiology technicians lasts; and what proportion of this time is spent on work directly relevant to testing hearing for the provision of a hearing aid.

Mr. Mellor: The initial training of audiology technicians, leading to employment in the basic grade, takes two years. Of this time, a half to two-thirds is spent on work directly relevant to the testing of hearing prior to the selection and provision of hearing aids and in learning how to select and fit such aids. Further training of the technicians takes place in the basic and higher grades in the fitting of more complex and high-powered aids and in instructing patients in their use in a variety of home and work environments.

Waiting Lists

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if any estimate has been made of the potential savings to the National Health Service of treating patients at the earliest opportunity in relation to the cost of treating them when waiting lists allow; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The savings are likely to be very small in relation to the overall costs of treatment. Most patients on the waiting list have relatively stable conditions and will cost no more to treat after waiting. However, it is obviously desirable for patients to be treated as soon as possible. This is why we have made an extra £55 million available so far through the waiting list fund, to help tackle excessive waiting times.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has made an allocation of additional funds available to health authorities to help reduce waiting lists.

Mr. Mellor: In 1987-88 £25 million was made available to health authorities from the waiting list fund to help reduce waiting lists and waiting times. In 1988-89 a further £30 million was allocated. I will shortly be making an announcement about allocations for 1989-90.

Elderly Persons

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he has any plans to establish primary care authorities to manage the funding of elderly persons entering nursing and residential homes; and if he will make a statement.

(2) if he has any plans to establish community care authorities to manage the funding of elderly persons entering nursing and residential homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We are considering the funding and management of public support for people entering nursing and residential care in the light of Sir Roy Griffiths' recommendations and will bring forward proposals in due course.

Mercury (Fish)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to the acceptable level of mercury in fish beyond which they become unfit for human consumption.

Mrs. Currie: There are no specific limits set for levels of mercury in fish for human consumption. However, the Food and Agriculture Organisations and World Health Organisation have jointly set a figure for the provisional tolerable weekly intake of 0·3 mg per kg per week, of which not more than 0·2 mg per kg should be organic mercury. This figure is for total intake from all sources, including fish, and incorporates a very large safety margin.

Planning Appeals (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning appeals relating to Nottingham were made to his Department between May 1987 and November 1988; by whom they were made; and how many were approved.

Mr. Chope: Between 1 May 1987 and 20 November 1988, 41 planning appeals relating to Nottingham were made to my Department. Of these 12 were withdrawn before determination; and of the 18 decided so far, four have been allowed. Listed below are the appellants, and the outcome of their appeals.

Hotel Project (Birmingham)

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations were held before granting a substantial sum to a hotel project in Birmingham; and what are the terms and conditions of repayment of the said grant.

Mr. Ridley: Two hotel projects in Birmingham have received urban development grant. In both cases, consultations were held with the developer and the developer's advisors, with Birmingham City Council which made the applications for grant, with the English Tourist Board and with other Government Departments. The specific terms and conditions attached to offers of urban development grant are matters of commercial confidentiality and are not disclosed.

Management and Maintenance

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assumptions were made about the increase in weekly council house rents for 1989-90 and the percentage increase in management and maintenance expenditure in 1989-90 compared with 1988-89 in the calculation of grant-related expenditure indicator E7, rate fund contributions to the housing revenue account, included in the exemplifications presented to members of the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance as paper CCLGF (88) 15.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The E7 factor for 1989-90 included in the exemplifications produced for CCLGF assumed a rent increase of £1·65 per week and a 9 per cent. increase in management and maintenance expenditure. The rent increase was subsequently revised to £1·75 per week for the exemplifications in the consultation paper on the 1989-90 RSG settlement issued on 11 November.

Council of Ministers

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Environment Council on 24 November.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My noble Friend the Minister for Housing, the Environment and Countryside represented the United Kingdom at this meeting.

The Council transmitted a draft declaration on the environment to the European Council in Rhodes on 2-3 December for endorsement by Heads of Government.

I am pleased to report that the Council confirmed the provisional agreement reached in June this year for a second stage limit for small car emissions at 8 grams per test of hydrocarbons plus oxides of nitrogen (HC+NOX).

Ministers also reached agreement on proposals to harmonise national programmes for reducing pollution from the titanium dioxide industry. The provisions of the directive will lead to reductions in the amounts of pollutants discharged into North sea estuaries and will provide this important industry with a clear basis for planning its future investment. Council unanimously overruled the Commission recommendation for a legal base of article 100A of the Single European Act, in favour of article 130S.

The Council had a useful exchange of views on the draft directive on the contained use of genetically modified micro-organisms. The progress made was noted and it was recommended that further work be addressed as a matter of priority.

While almost all member states were prepared to contemplate Community action to help protect our natural heritage, the Commission's approach to a directive was unanimously rejected. There was general support for the United Kingdom's view that the Community could most usefully assist member states, where appropriate, to implement fully the Bern, Bonn and Ramsar conventions.

Progress was made in discussions on a draft directive on the prevention of air pollution from new municipal waste incineration plants.

The Council had an exchange of views on measures to protect the ozone layer. Most delegations supported the United Kingdom's proposal that the Community should call for the Montreal protocol to be strengthened by requiring an 85 per cent. reduction of world-wide emissions of chlorofluorocarbons by the turn of the century.

Interest was shown in a Danish proposal for a workshop in September 1989 on following up the recommendations of the Brundtland report.

Further consideration was given to a proposal for Community-wide programme of projects demonstrating how actions taken in the environmental field might contribute to employment creation.

The Council agreed a resolution on exports of hazardous waste to third countries, supporting wider international agreements on transfrontier shipments of waste. The United Kingdom presented its own proposals which were received sympathetically and will now be further considered in detail with the Commission and other member states.

Emissions

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his best estimate of the cost to the private sector of meeting the anticipated new controls on emissions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The proposed new controls over industrial air pollution will continue to be based on the principle that operators must use best practicable means to prevent emissions of harmful and offensive substances and to minimise the effects of any that cannot be prevented. Financial considerations are a factor in determining the best practicable means.

The Department produced a preliminary compliance cost assessment in November 1986, which rated the costs to industry of the proposed new controls as "tolerable".

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to permit a transitional period when the anticipated controls on emissions come into force to allow for the replacement of existing installations that do not conform to the higher standard.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We propose that plants undergoing substantial alteration would be required to meet the new standards immediately. Other existing plant would be allowed a transitional period during which they would be expected to be upgraded or replaced, as appropriate.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in recent negotiations towards a treaty to govern international trade in hazardous industrial waste in respect of (a) notification procedures in advance of shipments and (b) whether tacit or explicit acceptance is likely to be adopted; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Notification procedures under the global convention on the transboundary movement of hazardous waste currently being negotiated under the auspices of UNEP are likely to require prior notification by the exporter and explicit acceptance by the importing country before the shipment commences. We regard this as an essential element of effective control and is in line with the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in recent negotiations towards a treaty to govern international trade in hazardous industrial waste with respect to controls on exporters; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There is broad agreement in the negotiations that exports of hazardous waste should be prohibited unless there is prior notification by exporters and authorisation by the importing country.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in recent negotiations towards a treaty to govern international trade in hazardous industrial waste with respect to the definitions of (a) hazardous waste, (b) ecotoxic, (c) concentration strengths and (d) substance conditions; if such definitions are likely to be recognised internationally rather than depend on existing national definitions; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: These matters are still under discussion. Steady progress has been made towards internationally accepted common definitions.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in recent negotiations towards a treaty to govern international trade in hazardous industrial waste in respect of the passage of waste through territory other than the importing state in transit; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It has been generally accepted in the negotiations that the convention should require prior notification of any state through whose land area hazardous wastes are to be moved.

Draft Flora, Fauna and Habitat Directive

Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the outcome of the Council of Environment Ministers to discuss the draft flora, fauna and habitat directive on 24 November in Brussels; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) today.

Housing Corporation

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the resources available to the Housing Corporation in 1988-89.

Mr. Trippier: The Housing Corporation's approved development programme for 1988-89 made provision for gross expenditure of £737 million after taking into account forecast receipts of £82 million. The Housing Corporation now estimates that receipts will reach a total of £122 million. This increase is mainly due to higher than expected receipts from the sale of housing under the corporation's low cost home ownership programme and from the recovery of housing association grant following sales of properties. I have decided that the corporation may use the excess receipts arising in the current financial year to supplement its development programme, thus enabling more housing to be provided for homeless families and others in housing need.

"The Way Forward"

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received a copy of the University of East Anglia's report on the responses to Nirex's discussion document, "The Way Forward."

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Yes. The report was published yesterday and copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Warrington and Runcorn Development Corporation

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the date on which the Warrington and Runcorn development corporation is to be wound up.

Mr. Trippier: On 22 July 1987 my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) announced that 30 September 1989 had been set as the target wind-up date for the corporation. Consultations under section 41 of the New Towns Act 1981 with Cheshire county, Halton borough, and Warrington borough councils have been undertaken, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have considered the responses received. Having taken these into account, my right hon. Friend confirms his intention to wind up Warrington and Runcorn development corporation on 30 September 1989. The necessary order will be made next year.

Acid Rain (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has of the effects of acid rain in the Nottingham area.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 28 November 1988]: The Department is funding three research projects in the Nottingham area. One at Loughborough university of technology is looking at the impact of acid deposition on the vegetation and freshwater biota of three catchments on Beacon hill in the Charnwood forest. A second project at the university of Nottingham school of agriculture is looking at the effects of air pollution, including acid deposition, on agricultural crops. Finally the Department's building research establishment is currently investigating the effects of acid deposition in the stone work of Bolsover castle. Results from these projects have been and will continue to be published in scientific and technical journals.

RIMNET Monitoring Stations

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether RIMNET monitoring stations are manned 24 hours per day.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Forty-two of the 46 radiation monitors currently installed in the national radiation incident monitoring network (RIMNET) are at permanently manned meteorological stations. Periodic readings are taken at the other four sites.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment where is the nearest RIMNET station to Southport.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 28 November 1988]: Manchester.

Burial Sites

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the areas of open land in Greater London identified for possible use as mass burial sites in the event of war; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The location of graves would be a matter for local decision at the time having regard to a number of factors which are set out in the emergency planning guidance to local authorities issued by the Home Office.

Under the Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations, county councils and the London fire and civil defence authority are responsible for preparing plans for certain civil defence emergencies including providing "facilities for the disposal of human remains". The Home Office monitors the preparation and content of the plans. The "Emergency Planning Guidance to Local Authorities" issued by the Home Office contains the following paragraph headed "Disposal of Dead". Depending upon the immediate effect of the attack in their area, one of the priority tasks for districts or boroughs could be the burial or cremation of those killed. The location of graves and the method of disposal would be a local decision at the time, having regard to the availability of peacetime facilities, the location of the bodies, the availability of suitable temporary sites and the importance of avoiding contamination of water supplies. Temporary sites used for cremation or interment could be closed as soon as other permanent burial facilities could be brought into use. Wherever possible the name, sex, approximate age, place found and place buried or cremated should be recorded and passed to the nearest information centre or the emergency centre.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Garlic Production

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the total figures for garlic production in the United Kingdom for the last five years.

Mr. Ryder: The information is as follows:

Garlic	Production (England and Wales)
	Area (ha)	Tonnage
1983	27	135
1984	50	250
1985	50	250
1986	50	300
1987	55	330

Animal Feed

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he will take to encourage the incorporation of surplus cereal crops into animal feed.

Mr. Ryder: The best way of encouraging greater use of cereals in animal feed is to reduce the price, and we continue to press for lower market prices for cereals. We also seek to manage the market in the United Kingdom in a way which will encourage the use of cereals by the feed industry, and this season we have obtained the release of 350,000 tonnes of feedwheat on to the domestic market.

Manufactured Food Products

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those categories of manufactured food products which will be required to be harmonised in order to comply with regulations drawn up for the internal market.

Mr. Ryder: The programme for harmonisation of food law in the European Community is covering the horizontal areas of food labelling, food safety and food hygiene which are relevant to all foodstuffs. There are no proposals to be developed in the area of compositional law for specific foodstuffs.

Pressure Stocks Licensing

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations he has received regarding the future of the pressure stocks licensing system.

Mr. Donald Thompson: In July fisheries departments issued a consultation paper on possible amendments to the United Kingdom's licensing system for fishing vessels. We received a total of 32 written responses to that paper.

Sea Defences

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what response he has had from coastal authorities to his recent announcement on expenditure on sea defences; and which areas will benefit most immediately from this announcement.

Mr. Ryder: Coastal authorities, like their counterparts inland, have welcomed the recent announcement of increased funding for a long-term programme of inland and sea defence works, which was the result of a comprehensive review of national flood defence needs. The additional funding of £25 million a year will allow much-needed improvement to the coastal and flood defence on the east coast and in other areas where schemes will provide protection to lives, buildings, and industry.

Beef and Sheep Premiums

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on the proposals to end the variable beef and variable sheep premiums; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I continue to receive a number of representations on the Commission's proposals for the reform of the beef and sheepmeat regimes. Discussions on them in the Council of Ministers are at an early stage.

Nuvan 500 EC

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reasons it was decided that the use of the insecticide Nuvan 500 EC should be controlled under the Medicines Act 1968; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: The use of NUVAN 500 EC for the treatment, control or prevention of disease or ectoparasitic infestation of fish is medicinal within the terms of the Medicines Act 1968.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Alton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, what plans he has for authorising the ocean incineration of hazardous waste in the Irish sea.

Mr. Donald Thompson: None. The only approved marine incineration site is in the North sea. The Government committed themselves last year to phase out this method of disposal by the end of 1994 and have undertaken not to transfer waste for incineration in other sea areas in the meantime.

Fisheries Council

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Fisheries Council in Brussels on 28 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I attended the Council of Fisheries Ministers with my colleague Lord Sanderson, Minister of State, Scottish Office, in Brussels on 28 November 1988.

The Council agreed the guide prices for 1989. We secured a significant change with the introduction, for 1989, of a seasonal adjustment in the guide price for herring. This together with the inclusion of herring in the carry-over premium scheme which we secured in October is a substantial improvement. It should enable our industry to take advantage of the EC market support mechanisms which they have been unable to do this year, so as to achieve more orderly marketing. For other products of interest to the United Kingdom the price adjustments, where made, are marginal.

The Council also had a preliminary exchange of views on the Commission's proposals for total allowable catches and quotas for 1989.

Land Development

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy towards the protection from development of (a) the best and most versatile agricultural land and (b) other agricultural land.

Mr. Chope: I have been asked to reply.

The Government's policy on development involving agricultural land is set out in my Department's Circular 16/87, issued in May 1987, and in planning policy guidance note 7 "Rural Enterprise and Development", issued in January 1988. Copies of both are in the Library. In summary, the best and most versatile agricultural land is a national resource which should in general be protected from irreversible development and should not be built on unless there is no other site available for the purpose. This does not mean that all other agricultural land is freed for development; in deciding any application for planning permission that affects it, the agricultural implications must be considered together with the environmental and economic aspects.

TRANSPORT

Cycles

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action his Department is taking to encourage greater use of cycles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Our primary concern is with encouraging safer cycling by reducing the scope for conflict with other road users. We have a continuous programme of research and application studies from which we are able to develop publicity, technical advice and engineering standards. We have a well-established series of technical publications, which are available in the Library. I shall arrange for a set to be sent to the hon. Member direct. We are just about to consult local authorities and other organisations on a further local transport note. This aims to draw together the results of much of our recent work.

Rail Electrification

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the recent representations he has received regarding the electrification of the midland main line and the Channel tunnel interchange to serve the east midlands.

Mr. Portillo: We have received 13 representations since the beginning of this year: four from members of the public (two of them from the same individual), five from Members of Parliament (including an early-day motion) and four from local authorities (including one letter on behalf of 17 councils).

Iwade Bypass

Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a progress report on the construction of the Iwade bypass; when he expects to announce the draft orders for this route; and what are the reasons for slippage in the programme.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The next step is publication of draft orders. Timing is dependent on finalising the arrangements for a junction with Kent county council's Staplehurst road link. This is taking a little longer than expected. We hope to publish draft orders by about the middle of next year.

A249

Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give a progress report on the plans for dualling the A249 from the Stockbury viaduct to Key street between the M2 junctions and the A2 junctions; when he expects to announce the draft orders; and what are the reasons for slippage.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: As I envisaged in replying to the debate on 11 May at column 445 we announced the preferred route last summer. We hope to publish draft orders about the end of 1989.

Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will investigate and report on the number of incidents in recent months which have caused major holdups on the A249 single carriageway route from Key street to Sheerness.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Delays are not necessarily reported. We are aware of five incidents involving delays of more than 10 minutes in the last three months.

Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the appraisal from Kent county council of the need for improvements to the A249 from Kingsferry bridge to Sheerness, including the adequacy of the existing crossing of the Swale.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Shortly.

Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the latest accident statistics for the A249 from Iwade to Sheerness.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Between July 1985 and June 1988 there were 81 personal injury accidents (four fatal, 24 serious, 53 slight) on this length of A249.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects the first time-tabled train to run through the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Portillo: 15 May 1993.

M20

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he expects the M20 link between Hollingbourne and Ashford, and the Maidstone bypass expansion to be completed;

(2) when he expects to place the contracts for the M20 link between Hollingbourne and Ashford and the Maidstone bypass expansion.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We expect to let two contracts for the completion of the M20 between Hollingbourne and Ashford before the end of this year and in the spring, for completion in 1991. Timing of the Maidstone bypass widening will depend on the outcome of the statutory procedures. We hope that it will be completed by the time the Channel tunnel opens.

West Bromwich Expressway

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received details of the incident involving the leakage of nitric acid from a road tanker on the A41 West Bromwich expressway on Monday 14 October.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Investigation of this unfortunate incident is initially a matter for the police. They will refer any matter of concern to the relevant authority.

A1-M1 Link

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the commencement date for work on the A1-M1 link where it joins the M1.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Preparatory work for the M1-M6 interchange with the link road is halted as a result of an appeal by the Society for the Preservation of the Field of the Battle of Naseby against a High Court decision earlier this year in favour of the Department's line for the adjacent Catthorpe to Rothwell section of the scheme. Construction of the interchange could start by the end of 1989 if statutory procedures are completed satisfactorily.

Port State Control

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many inspectors are available for port state control; what is their location; and what are the ports for which they are responsible.

Mr. Portillo: There are at present 124 marine surveyors and radio surveyors available for port state control inspections. Their locations and areas of responsibility are as follows:

	Number
West of Scotland and Northern Ireland district (from the Scottish border to Cape Wrath, including Northern Ireland)	19
East of Scotland district (from Cape Wrath to the Scottish border near Berwick on Tweed)	16
North-Eastern England district (from the Scottish border to Fosdyke inclusive)	29
London district (from Fosdyke exclusive to Bognor Regis inclusive)	18
South and South-West England district (from Bognor Regis exclusive to Bull Point)	20
Bristol Channel and South Wales district (from Bull Point to South of Fairbourne near Barmouth)	11
Liverpool district (from Fairbourne near Barmouth to the Scottish border)	11

London Underground

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many station staff were employed on each of the lines on the London Underground in 1960, 1970 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Member should request this information from London Underground Ltd.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to assessments of the impact of the Severn bridge on the economy of Cardiff and south Glamorgan in determining his policy in regard to (a) tolls and (b) the need for a second crossing.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend takes account of the effect of tolls at the Severn bridge on the economy south Wales before he proposes increases. The decision to construct any trunk road takes into account the benefits to users and therefore the importance to the local economy.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those aircraft which meet chapter 3 aircraft noise requirements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The proportion of chapter 3 jet aircraft in the world fleet is increasing and has grown from 11 per cent. on 1 January 1982 to 33 per cent. on 1 January 1988. Chapter 3 jet aircraft known to the Department are:

Chapter 3
	JT8D-219 JT8D-217A JT8D-217C

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport to what extent those aircraft meeting chapter 3 noise requirements and operating out of British airports have had their noise footprint measured; whether such extend beyond the areas of the airports from which they operate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Measurement of noise footprints is expensive so footprints are calculated by computer. The Department uses noise footprints mainly for assessing the night-time noise disturbance caused by particular aircraft types, and for this purpose it has standardised on the 95PNdb footprint. The areas of the 95NdB footprint are known for nearly all chapter 3 aircraft using British airports. Usually most of the footprint falls within an airport's boundaries. In any one case this depends upon the aircraft type and the relationship of the boundary to the runway. By contrast, footprints of the earlier non noise-certificated types spread very far beyond airport boundaries.

Vehicle Inspectorate

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the vehicle inspectorate annual report and accounts for 1987-88 are to be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The annual report and accounts are published today. They provide a useful overall picture of the general condition of Britain's road vehicles. They record the vehicle inspectorate's continuing progress towards a business-like basis for carrying out their essential duties of annual testing, and spot-checks of the vehicle fleet. The inspectorate has now become an executive agency.

Well-maintained road vehicles are essential to road safety. We welcome the slight improvement in the annual MOT test performance of cars and light goods vehicles. It cannot be regarded as acceptable that a third of the vehicles presented for test fail to meet basic safety requirements.

We continue to be concerned at the poor condition of many heavy goods vehicles and public service vehicles. The number of spot checks of lorries and buses was increased by a third and a tenth of the goods vehicles fleet examined. In the April special survey of public service vehicles carried out after the period covered by this report, there was a slight improvement compared with six months earlier. The vehicle inspectorate are targeting their efforts on operators with poor records and seeking to help promote good maintenance practice.

The Freight Transport Association, the Road Haulage Association and the Bus and Coach Council have been asked for their proposals to secure higher standards throughout their industries.

We shall also be exploring with operators and manufacturers the reasons for the unsatisfactory trend in trailer test failure rates and to identify any general issues this raises.

It will continue to be the Government's policy to take stringent enforcement action against operators who fail to maintain vehicles adequately.

DEFENCE

Publicly Owned Land

14. Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will reconsider the way his Department places a valuation on publicly owned land to be disposed of.

30. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will reconsider the way his Department places a valuation on publicly owned land to be disposed of.

38. Mr. Paul Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will reconsider the way his Department places a valuation on publicly owned land to be disposed of.

Mr. Sainsbury: Before disposing of surplus property we obtain professional advice from within MOD, from the district valuer or from commercial consultants. They prepare valuations of surplus property on the basis of full open market value taking account of existing or established uses and, when appropriate, development potential.

US Dual-Capable Aircraft

17. Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has received any representations from the United States Government seeking the basing in this country of further dual-capable aircraft.

84. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has received any representations from the United States Government seeking the basing in the United Kingdom of futher dual-capable aircraft.

114. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has received any representations from the United States Government seeking the basing in the United Kingdom of further dual-capable aircraft.

120. Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has received any representations from the United States Government seeking the basing in the United Kingdom of further dual-capable aircraft.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The deployment to Europe of additional longer-range dual-capable aircraft currently based in the United States is one of the options being considered by NATO as part of the current review of its theatre nuclear forces. Work on the various options is continuing.

Northern Ireland (Troop Deployment)

18. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the number of troops deployed in Northern Ireland from 1979 to the present time.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Stewart) on 16 June at columns 227-28. In addition, the figures for the number of troops deployed in Northern Ireland as at 30 June 1988 are as follows:

	Number
Regular forces	11,164
UDR	6,310

Low-Flying Aircraft

19. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what new measures the Government are taking to improve the safety margins for low-flying aircraft.

Mr. Freeman: Every aspect of the safety of low-flying is under continuous review and changes are made whenever necessary. As I announced in the House on 20 October, the most recent change concerned the introduction of the new procedures in the night low-flying system, aimed at separating rotary and fixed-wing flying as much as practicable, and improving deconfliction throughout the system.

56. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on low-flying sorties over the Hexham area.

Mr. Freeman: The Hexham area, like most non-urban parts of the United Kingdom, is used by military aircraft undertaking essential low-flying training. The Government will continue to do all within their power to minimise the disturbance caused by low-flying training and to spread this activity as widely and fairly as possible throughout the country.

Brigade of Gurkhas

20. Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what factors he is taking into consideration in deciding upon the future of the Brigade of Gurkhas.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We intend that there shall be a continuing role for the Gurkhas after 1997 within the British Army. The future of the Gurkhas is being addressed against the background of operational and resource factors likely to affect the British Army as a whole.

Other factors to be taken into account when considering the viability of a future Gurkhas force include provision of an appropriate career structure, a broad enough base to support the skills and trades required by an effective operational unit, the need to obtain a cost-effective return on investment in infrastructure in Nepal and the requirement for the force to be operationally viable in relation to its roles and deployments. No decisions have yet been taken on the long term future size, shape or role of the Gurkhas.

Portsmouth

21. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to visit Portsmouth in the near future.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend has no plans to visit Portsmouth in the near future.

Frigates

22. Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will announce the tender for the next order of frigates.

89. Mr. Ted Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will announce the tender for the next order of frigates.

Mr. Sainsbury: As I said in my statement to the House on 11 July at column 32, I expect tenders for the next batch of Type-23 frigates to be sought next year.

French Defence Minister

24. Mr. Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met the French Defence Minister; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend last met M. Chevenement at the meeting of WEU Defence and Foreign Ministers on 14 November, but their most recent bilateral meeting was on 7 July when a range of subjects of mutual interest were discussed.

Merchant Ships

25. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the numbers of merchant ships available to him in an emergency.

78. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimate of the number of merchant ships available to him in an emergency.

108. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the number of merchant ships available to him in an emergency.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Members to the answer that I gave today to the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall).

Territorial and Reserve Forces

23. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the consultation scheme designed to encourage companies to release employees for service in the territorial and reserve forces.

42. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the consultation scheme designed to encourage companies to release employees for service in the territorial and reserve forces.

87. Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the consultation scheme designed to encourage companies to release employees for service in the territorial and reserve forces.

124. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the consultation scheme designed to encourage companies to release employees for service in the territorial and reserve forces.

Mr. Freeman: I am pleased to report that there has been a most encouraging response to the campaign and, to date, over 350 major employers have pledged their support to employees joining the volunteer forces.

Gibraltar Shootings

26. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he was aware before the shooting of the three Irish Republican Army members in Gibraltar that there was no bomb in the suspected car.

128. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he was aware before the shooting of the three Irish Republican Army members in Gibraltar that there was no bomb in the suspected car.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. I refer the hon. Members to the answer that I gave to the hon Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) on 3 November at column 740.

NATO-Warsaw Pact (Force Levels)

27. Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has discussed with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation colleagues the possibility of parity in conventional forces between the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Warsaw pact; and if he will make a statement.

46. Mr. Terry Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has discussed with his NATO colleagues the possibility of parity in conventional forces between NATO and the Warsaw pact; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Alliance nations are co-operating closely at all levels in preparations for the proposed new arms control negotiations on conventional forces in Europe. A major aim is to remove capabilities for surprise attack and large-scale offensive action. This will require, amongst other measures, the elimination of the superiorities currently enjoyed by the Warsaw pact in key weapon systems such as tanks and artillery.

Fishing Vessels (Submarines)

28. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the danger to fishing vessels from the entanglement of submarines in their nets.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Submarine commanding officers are aware of the need to give adequate sea room to surface craft, particularly fishing vessels deploying their gear, and are well trained in avoidance techniques. I am satisfied that everything possible is being done to minimise the risk of submarines becoming entangled with fishing nets.

Aircraft Losses

29. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the replacement costs of all aircraft which have crashed in the United Kingdom in low-flying exercises over the last 10 years and the budget allocation to cover aircraft losses in future years.

Mr. Freeman: It is not now our practice to publish the unit production—and hence replacement—cost of individual aircraft. Neither is it our practice to disclose details of future budgetary allocations for them.

Nuclear Force Modernisation

31. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on plans for nuclear force modernisation.

64. Mr. Wall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on plans for nuclear modernisation.

105. Mr. Heffer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on plans for nuclear force modernisation.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Members to the reply which my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Defence, gave today to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock).

Procurement Policy

32. Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what new measures his Department is taking to achieve value for money in weapons and equipment procurement.

79. Mr. Beaumont-Dark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what new measures his Department is taking to achieve value for money in weapons and equipment procurement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Ministry of Defence is continually searching for ways to improve value for money in its purchase of defence equipment. We take every opportunity to introduce competition, and our fortnightly "Contracts Bulletin", and other publications, such as "Selling to the MOD", seek to encourage the widest possible range of companies to compete for our business. We continue to press for taut contracting, insisting wherever possible on firm or fixed prices, or on incentive contracts with a ceiling price. We are developing a fully professional approach to project management by instituting better training for project managers, and by integrating the contracts, finance and quality assurance staff into teams under the project manager.

Chemical Weapons

33. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on measures the Soviet Union is undertaking to maintain and increase its stock of chemical weapons.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In April 1987 the Soviet Union admitted to the possession of chemical weapons and announced that the production of these weapons had ceased. The Soviet Union has subsequently indicated that it will destroy its chemical weapons according to the provisions of a chemical weapons convention which is currently being negotiated at Geneva. However, the Soviets have not provided evidence that would allow us to substantiate their claim to have ceased chemical weapons production.

Defence Expenditure

34. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what total financial resources the Government have allocated to conventional defence since 1979.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is as follows:

£ million

Year	Total expenditure (a) (1)	of which nuclear strategic force (b) (2)
1979-80	9,177	126
1980-81	11,181	165
1981-82	12,607	269
1982-83	14,412	327
1983-84	15,486	382
1984-85	17,122	386
1985-86	17,936	509
1986-87	18,163	658
1987-88	18,849	852
Total	134,933	3,702

Total column (1) minus column (2): £131,231 million.

(a) Reflects the actual expenditure as recorded in the Appropriation Account without adjustment for definitional changes over the period.

(b) Reflects estimated costs.

British Aerospace (Explosives and Propellants)

35. Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with British Aerospace on collaborative production agreements with non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation countries in relation to explosives and propellants.

51. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with British Aerospace on collaborative production agreements with non-NATO countries in relation to explosives and propellants.

94. Dr. Moonie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with British Aerospace on collaborative production agreements with non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation countries in relation to explosives and propellants.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor).

NATO (Short-Range Nuclear Weapons)

36. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on discussions within the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation on short-range nuclear systems.

50. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on discussions within NATO on short-range nuclear systems.

54. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on discussions within NATO on short-range nuclear systems.

97. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on discussions within the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation on short-range nuclear systems.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Members to the answer that I gave today to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell).

NATO (Defensive Strategy)

37. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals there are to alter the role of nuclear weapons in Britain's contribution to the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's defensive strategy.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are no plans to change the roles of British nuclear forces.

NATO (Nuclear Planning Group)

39. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Scheveningen meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group.

58. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Scheveningen meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group.

60. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Scheveningen meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock).

Search and Rescue

40. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many representations he has received on the deployment of search and rescue helicopter services.

Mr. Freeman: During 1988 the Ministry of Defence has received some 2,200 representations on the deployment of search and rescue helicopters.

48. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the search and rescue flight at RAF Leuchars.

Mr. Freeman: I have nothing to add to my answer of 14 November to the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) at column 416.

Cruise Missiles

41. Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations he has had with the United States Administration about the removal of cruise missiles based on British soil; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Her Majesty's Government have been fully consulted on the timing of the removal of the cruise missiles from RAF Molesworth and RAF Greenham Common. The missiles have already been withdrawn from Molesworth and a declaration to this effect has been made by the United States to the Soviet Union. Current plans are for half the missiles based at Greenham Common to be withdrawn approximately midway through the three years drawdown period, which began on 1 June 1988, and for the remainder to be withdrawn towards the end of this period.

CND

43. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament since the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation summit in March.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Secretary of State for Defence has received five letters from the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament since the NATO summit in March this year.

Soviet Union (Military Capability)

44. Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any significant changes in the military capacity of the Soviet Union over the past two years.

127. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any significant changes in the military capacity of the Soviet Union over the past two years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friends to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) on 9 November at column 185.

NATO (Burden-Sharing)

45. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has made about the degree of burden-sharing between the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation allies.

49. Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has made about the degree of burden-sharing between the NATO allies.

88. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has made about the degree of burden-sharing as between the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation allies.

Mr. Younger: I regularly meet with colleagues in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and have frequently emphasised the importance of equitable sharing of roles, risks and responsibilities within the Alliance.

90. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures the Government are taking to implement burden-sharing within the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

Mr. Younger: At their meeting in May, NATO Defence Ministers commissioned a report on the sharing of roles, risks and responsibilities within the Alliance. The United Kingdom has participated fully in the preparation of this report, which is to be considered by the Defence Planning Committee this week.

Royal Ordnance (Explosives and Propellants)

47. Mr. Buchan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will reassess the extent to which the ability to produce sufficient supplies of explosives and propellants in the United Kingdom in time of crisis has been adversely affected by the sale of Royal Ordnance plc.

72. Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will reassess the extent to which the ability to produce sufficient supplies of explosives and propellants in the United Kingdom in time of crisis has been adversely affected by the sale of Royal Ordnance plc.

100. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will reassess the extent to which the ability to produce sufficient supplies of explosives and propellants in the United Kingdom in time of crisis has been affected by the sale of Royal Ordnance plc.

Mr. Sainsbury: The MOD reviews annually its future requirements for explosives, propellants and ammunition. Royal Ordnance has a five-year contract to supply a large portion of those requirements which runs until 1993. Any improvements in the efficiency of the factories involved will be of benefit in time of crisis as at other times.

Air Defence

52. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what resources the Government have allocated to the air defence of the United Kingdom since 1979.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Figures for the annual expenditure on the air defence of the United Kingdom are given in volume 2 of the annual statement on the Defence Estimates. These show that, since 1978-79, the Government have spent a total of some £5,488 million on air defence, with expenditure in each year as follows:

	£ million
1978-79	128
1979-80	145
1980-81	199
1981-82	287
1982-83	453
1983-84	579
1984-85	702
1985-86	730
1986-87	817
1987-88	717
1988-89	[1]731

[1] Estimate

Nuclear Weapons

53. Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there are any contingency plans for the disposal of obsolete British-owned nuclear warheads.

62. Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there are any contingency plans for the disposal of obsolete British-owned nuclear warheads.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government's policy is to dispose of obsolete nuclear warheads in a safe and secure manner.

Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington

55. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any intention to visit central ordnance depot, Donnington, to discuss with the trade unions future plans for the depot.

Mr. Freeman: Any plans which might affect civilian staff are subject to the Ministry of Defence's established consultative procedures which make provision for the trade unions to comment on the Department's proposals: I have no plans to visit Donnington solely to discuss any such proposals.

Nuclear Testing

57. Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has discussed with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation colleagues any new proposals to limit nuclear testing.

70. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has discussed with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation colleagues any proposals to limit nuclear testing.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United States and the Soviet Union are currently engaged in talks and joint verification experiments with the aim of ratifying the threshold test ban treaty and the peaceful nuclear explosions treaty. United Kingdom and NATO Ministers have been kept informed of the current state of negotiations.

Trident

59. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current position regarding SSBN 07, Trident 3; and when he expects to place the order.

Mr. Younger: The invitation to tender for SSBN 07 was issued to Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd. on 15 March this year. The firm's formal response to this has been delayed by the strike which took place between 8 June and 30 August. It is still planned to place the order for this submarine next year.

82. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the impact of the purchase of Trident on conventional defence spending.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the impact of the purchase of Trident on conventional defence spending.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Even at its peak we expect that Trident will absorb less than 6 per cent. of the defence budget. By far the greatest proportion of the defence budget will be available for investment in conventional forces.

123. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about progress on the Trident programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have nothing to add to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd).

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the implementation to date of the Trident programme.

Mr. Younger: The Trident programme continues to time and budget towards its planned in-service date of the mid-1990s. I hope to announce a revised estimate for the Trident programme early in the new year as well as providing a statement on its progress for the Defence Committee and Public Accounts Committee.

Dog Training

61. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress is being made with his review of dog training at the Royal Army Veterinary Corps, Melton Mowbray.

Mr. Freeman: The study conducted by Peat Marwick, management consultants, has been completed but the report has not yet been presented to the Ministry. I expect to receive it very soon.

Kuwaiti Defence Minister

63. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met the Kuwaiti Defence Minister; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence last met the Kuwaiti Defence Minister in a visit to Kuwait on 12 July. A wide range of subjects of mutual defence interest were discussed.

Royal Ordnance plc

65. Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what valuation was placed on the sale of intellectual property rights associated with the sale of Royal Ordnance plc; and what was the total number of such rights transferred.

69. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what valuation was placed on the sale of intellectual property rights associated with the sale of Royal Ordnance plc; and what was the total number of such rights transferred.

113. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what valuation was placed on the sale of intellectual property rights associated with the sale of Royal Ordnance plc; and what was the total number of such rights transferred.

118. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what valuation was placed on the sale of intellectual property rights associated with the sale of Royal Ordnance plc; and what was the total number of such rights transferred.

Mr. Sainsbury: There was no specific valuation placed on the intellectual property rights associated with the sale of Royal Ordnance plc. The sale was made on the basis of the price offered by the highest bidder for the whole enterprise, including the IPR. Such rights are not individually distinct and include sub items and overlapping rights and for that reason it is not possible to assign a meaningful number to the rights transferred.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the extent to which the ability to produce sufficient supplies of explosives and propellants in the United Kingdom in time of crisis has been affected by the sale of Royal Ordnance plc.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave today to the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan).

Bullying

66. Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the steps taken by the armed services, and in particular the Army, to identify bullying tendencies at an early stage and to prevent those exhibiting such tendencies from receiving promotion.

Mr. Freeman: I have made it clear in a number of statements to the House, and the message has been put across in the Army at all levels, that bullying in the armed forces will not be tolerated in any form and that appropriate action will be taken against those against whom charges have been substantiated.

In my reply of 7 June 1988 to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) I gave a progress report on the implementation of the measures designed to stamp out bullying and to ensure that potential bullies are not put in positions of responsibility over young recruits. Among these were improvements in instructor training and in man-management training for young officers and NCOs. An improved man management training package for instructors is being implemented. The guidance on man management for officer and NCO training courses has now been revised and the pamphlet will be printed before Christmas.

In addition, we have now established the extra 102 posts designed to relieve those involved in training and supervision of some administrative tasks and we are in the process of establishing and inviting applicants for the WRVS posts.

A129 Helicopter

67. Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the part to be played by Westland in the development with Agusta of a version of the A129 helicopter for the Argentine air force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Westland has informed the Ministry of Defence that it is not involved in the joint Italian/Argentine helicopter project.

Territorial Army (Recruitment)

68. Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the costs of the current Territorial Army publicity recruiting campaign.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 11 November 1988 at column 321.

NATO-Warsaw Pact (Forces)

71. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will detail the broad balance of (a) conventional and (b) nuclear forces between North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Warsaw pact; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Comparisons of the conventional and nuclear forces of NATO and the Warsaw pact are published annually in the statement on the Defence Estimates. In addition, NATO has recently published an assessment of the strengths of the conventional forces in Europe belonging to the countries of NATO and the Warsaw pact. A copy of the assessment, entitled "Conventional Forces in Europe: the Facts", will be placed in the Library of the House. Current assessments of force levels show that the Warsaw pact enjoys major superiorities in key conventional weapons in Europe. Although there is broad parity at the strategic level of nuclear forces, the Warsaw pact possesses significant advantages in the shorter range nuclear categories.

Racial Discrimination

73. Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what investigations he has carried out into whether there is any racial discrimination in the armed forces.

Mr. Freeman: The armed forces are subject to the Race Relations Act 1976 and no form of racial discrimination is tolerated. Complaints of racial discrimination brought by members of the armed forces are fully investigated under the redress of grievance procedures of the service discipline Acts.

European Programme Group

74. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will next be attending an independent European programme group meeting.

Mr. Sainsbury: European Defence Ministers agreed at their IEPG meeting in Luxembourg earlier this month that they should meet again in the middle of 1989.

NATO (Flexible Response)

75. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards proposals to replace the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's strategy of flexible response by one of non-provocative defence.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: NATO's strategy is non-provocative; Alliance forces will never be used except in response to an attack. We believe that flexible response provides the best means of maintaining deterrence and preserving peace.

Injured Personnel (Compensation)

76. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has to change the compensation system for injured or disabled ex-service men.

Mr. Freeman: Since May 1987, when the law was changed, service men have possessed the same rights as civilians in being able to sue the Crown for damages in the courts. Those service personnel injured or disabled before last May, and who cannot sue in the courts, have access to the comprehensive system of "no-fault" benefits available under the war pensions legislation. No changes are proposed to this system.

Western European Union

77. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there have been any changes in the Government's priorities as chairman of the Western European Union.

111. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there have been any changes in the Government's priorities as chairman of the Western European Union.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Her Majesty's Government established four main priorities at the outset of our Presidency of the Western European Union:

- —to elaborate on the commitments in the WEU platform on European security interests in order to make further practical contributions to the common defence;
- —to use the WEU as a forum for frank discussion of key European security issues;
- —to develop the WEU as a forum for co-ordinating European approaches to out of area issues;
- —to secure a satisfactory outcome to the enlargement negotiations with Spain and Portugal.

These objectives have not changed. The last of them was achieved with signature on 14 November of a protocol for the accession of Spain and Portugal to the modified Brussels treaty.

116. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on recent developments in the Western European Union.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friends the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence jointly hosted the ministerial council meeting of the WEU in London on 14 November. The major event of this occasion was signature of a protocol for the accession of Spain and Portugal to the modified Brussels treaty. This was one of the main priorities for our Presidency, and its early achievement is gratifying.

Other business included a report on the implementation of the platform on European security agreed at The Hague in October 1987, and a report on progress made in fulfilling the mandate on arms control and defence requirements, given by Ministers at their meeting in The Hague in April 1988. The meeting also noted with approval the success of the joint mine-sweeping operation in the Gulf as a concrete example of the work that the WEU is doing in the defence co-operation field.

Tanks

80. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning future orders for supply of tanks to Her Majesty's forces.

103. Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his plans for the replacement of the Chieftain tank.

107. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his plans for the replacement of the Chieftain tank.

109. Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the first prototype of the Challenger II to be completed; and if he will make a statement.

110. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the plans for the replacement of the Chieftain tank.

Mr. Sainsbury: I would refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave yesterday to the hon. Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson).

Army Trucks

81. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the tenders submitted by Leyland DAF and Bedford to supply a new generation of trucks for the Army.

Mr. Sainsbury: Evaluation trials of vehicles to meet the Department's future requirements for 4-tonne trucks were recently completed. Vehicles were provided by AWD Ltd.

(formerly Bedford Trucks), Leyland DAF and Volvo (GB) Ltd. Commercial proposals were received from the three companies in October and these together with the trials data are now subject to detailed examination and assessment. We expect to be in a position to announce the winner of the competition by mid-1989.

Widows (Pensions)

83. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the arrangements for awarding pensions to war widows and widows of service men.

Mr. Freeman: The arrangements for awarding pensions under the armed forces pension scheme are kept under periodic review. War widows' pensions are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Warsaw Pact (Forces)

85. Mr. Whitney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on recent measures the Warsaw pact has taken to modernise its nuclear and conventional forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The most recent and comprehensive account of the modernisation of the Warsaw pact's conventional and nuclear forces can be found in chapter six of this year's statement on the Defence Estimates (Cm. 344-I). As the statement makes clear, there has been no let-up in the Soviet Union's military modernisation programmes, despite improvements in East-West relations.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on measures the Warsaw pact is taking to modernise its nuclear and conventional forces.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to measures the Warsaw pact is taking to modernise its nuclear and conventional forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The most recent and comprehensive account of the modernisation of the Warsaw pact's conventional and nuclear forces can be found in chapter 6 of this year's "Statement on the Defence Estimates" (Cm. 344-I). As the statement makes clear, there has been no let up in the Soviet Union's military modernisation programmes, despite improvements in East-West relations.

United States Defence Secretary

86. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met the United States Secretary for Defence; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend last met the United States Secretary for Defence at the nuclear planning group on 26 and 27 October. They discussed a range of matters of mutual interest.

Saudi Arabian Defence Minister

91. Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met the Saudi Arabian Defence Minister; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence last met the Saudi Arabian Defence Minister earlier this month. A wide range of defence issues of mutual interest were discussed including project Al Yamamah which covers the supply of United Kingdom defence equipment to Saudi Arabia.

Defence Materials (Supply)

92. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the implications for the supply of defence materials of (a) the current and (b) planned regional distribution of production of defence materials by former Royal Ordnance plants; and if he will make a statement.

93. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the implications for the supply of defence materials of (a) the current and (b) planned regional distribution of production of defence materials by former Royal Ordnance plants; and if he will make a statement.

125. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the implications for the supply of defence materials of (a) the current and (b) planned regional distribution of production of defence materials by former Royal Ordnance plants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Members to the answer that I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham).

Military Hospitals

95. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what liaison arrangements exist in respect of military hospitals.

Mr. Freeman: Liaison is maintained at varying levels. First, between the local GPs and civilian and military hospitals, and between the military hospitals and area health authorities. Higher level liaison takes place between the Defence medical services and the regional health authorities and the Department of Health.

Defence Budget

96. Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on any changes he proposes in the defence budget.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As last year, substantial increases to previous plans for defence expenditure were announced in the autumn statement. These increases mean that the defence budget will now be growing by about a billion pounds a year for the next three years.

Reserve and Volunteer Forces

98. Mr. Conway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of whether the efficiency and effectiveness of the regular reserve and volunteer forces have improved since 1979.

Mr. Freeman: I can assure the hon. Member that both the regular reserve and volunteer forces are today at a considerably higher standard of efficiency and effectiveness than they were in 1979. Numbers of personnel, their equipment, training and administration have all shown a significant improvement.

Seaborne Nuclear Defence

99. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to review Britain's seaborne nuclear defence capability in light of the intermediate nuclear forces treaty.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None. The modernisation of the United Kingdom's strategic nuclear deterrent with Trident is proceeding on schedule. We are also continuing to study options for the updating of our sub-strategic deterrent forces in light of the fact that the weapons which currently provide this capability are likely to reach the end of their service life towards the end of the century.

Conventional Forces

101. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the balance of conventional forces in Europe.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on 25 November, at column 38, the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation has recently published an assessment of the strengths of the conventional armed forces in Europe belonging to the countries of NATO and the Warsaw pact. A copy of the assessment, entitled "Conventional Forces in Europe: the Facts", will be placed in the Library of the House. The data provided confirms the major superiorities enjoyed by the Warsaw pact in those weapon systems such as tanks and artillery which are relevant to an offensive capability; the elimination of these asymmetries, through reductions, will be a major Alliance aim in the forthcoming arms control negotiations on conventional forces in the Atlantic to Urals area. We hope that the publication of the assessment will encourage the Warsaw pact to be equally open about information on conventional force levels.

BAe 146

102. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on purchases of the BAe 146.

Mr. Sainsbury: Two BAe 146s were purchased for the Queen's Flight in 1986.

Nuclear Weapons (Upgrading)

104. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his policy of upgrading nuclear weapons includes increasing the number of warheads per missile.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to paragraphs 1 and 2 of Defence open Government document 87/01 "Trident and the Alternatives", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Surplus Land

106. Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will report progress on disposing of land surplus to his Department's requirements.

Mr. Freeman: The Ministry of Defence continues to keep its estate under review to identify and dispose of land which is surplus to Defence requirements. At present we are concentrating in particular on the disposal of high value land where this is conductive to efficiency and operational needs and we have a number of high value disposals underway in areas such as north-west London. Receipts from land and property sales in financial years 1987-88 totalled £77 million and the current estimate for receipts in 1988-89 is £148 million.

Nuclear Weapons (Production)

112. Ms. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to ensure that the production of material for nuclear weapons is being carried out safely; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Nuclear materials for defence purposes are procured commercially; and it is the responsibility of the individual contractor to meet the high standards of safety required by the relevant legislation and monitored by the appropriate regulatory bodies.

British Army of the Rhine

115. Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent measures have been taken to strengthen the air mobility capability of the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Following the successful conclusion of airmobility trials involving 6 Brigade in Germany, 24 Brigade converted to the airmobile role in April of this year. In addition to the Royal Air Force Puma and Chinook helicopters, which continue to be provided in support of airmobility, a new Army Air Corps Regiment, consisting of anti-tank and utility Lynx and Gazelle helicopters, will be formed as part of 24 Brigade. This represents a significant improvement in the airmobility capability of 1(BR) Corps.

Defence Computer Systems

117. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to strengthen the security of sensitive defence computer systems.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling).

Devonport Dockyard

119. Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to increase his Department's allocation of naval work to Her Majesty's dockyard, Devonport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The programme of MOD work allocated to Devonport Royal dockyard is kept under regular review and changes to future load are advised periodically to the commercial managers. In addition DML may bid for work in the unallocated programme.

Short-range Nuclear Weapons

121. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he anticipates next meeting the Defence Minister of the Federal Republic of Germany to discuss the deployment of short-range nuclear weapons within Europe.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Defence, next expects to meet his colleague, the Federal German Defence Minister, at the Eurogroup and Defence Planning Committee ministerial meetings which are due to take place in Brussels between 30 November and 2 December. The two Ministers are likely to discuss a wide range of defence and security matters of mutual interest.

Tanks and Helicopters

122. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the likely level of investment in (a) tanks and (b) Army helicopters over the next five years.

Mr. Sainsbury: It is not the practice of this or previous Administrations to provide details of future levels of investment in equipment. However, both the helicopter and the tank have an essential role on the modern and future battlefield, and expenditure on both will be substantial.

Gurkha Regiment

126. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about the future of the Gurkha regiment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No formal representations have been received, although a number of letters have been received from members of the public.

Plessey (Takeover)

129. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the implications for procurement in defence electronics of the proposed GEC takeover of Plessey.

Mr. Sainsbury: We are considering the defence implications of the GEC/Siemens bid for Plessey.

German Minister of Defence

130. Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met his counterpart in the Federal Republic of Germany; and what issues were discussed.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend last met Dr. Scholz at the meeting of the WEU Defence and Foreign Ministers on 14 November, but their most recent bilateral meeting was on 4 October when a range of subjects of mutual interest were discussed.

East-West Talks

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of East-West talks in respect of conventional forces in Europe.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Talks are continuing in Vienna on mandates for two sets of conventional arms control negotiations: one on conventional stability in Europe, the other on confidence and security-building measures, building from those agreed in the Stockholm document of 1986. It is hoped that both negotiations can begin in the near future. In the meantime, the existing mutual and balanced force reduction talks, concerning forces in Central Europe, are also continuing in Vienna.

Territorial Army (Recruiting)

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what he is doing to improve recruiting within the Territorial Army.

Mr. Freeman: We are conscious that the demographic trends show that the population in the age group from which we draw most recruits to the TA is decreasing. We have, therefore, in addition to our advertising, introduced a number of measures such as relaxation of age limits, reduction of commitment in particular problem specialisations and both pay and bounties have been increased. We are also hopeful that our current advertising campaign aimed at employers, although not aimed at recruiting, will have some useful benefits in this direction.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many new recruits have been enlisted in each of the services in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The information is shown below:

Service	83-84	84-85	85-86	86-87	87-88
RN/RM	5,232	5,536	5,369	6,569	6,172
Army	22,348	22,278	20,268	19,918	21,041
RAF	9,411	6,907	7,014	7,562	6,613

Mine-hunting Trials

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to resume hovercraft mine-hunting trials.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave the hon. Gentleman on 10 November at column 302.

HMS Endurance

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to be in a position to place an order for the replacement of HMS Endurance.

Mr. Sainsbury: There is no need to take a decision yet on the replacement of HMS Endurance. She underwent an extensive refit in 1986 which will give her an economic life extending into the mid-90s. Our plans beyond then will be kept under review in the light of developments in the Antarctic.

Westland Helicopters

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his discussions with Westland plc on the procurement of helicopters.

Mr. Sainsbury: As is the normal practice with all defence contractors, the Department maintains close contact with Westland on the MOD projects on which the company is working.

British-French Co-ordination

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement of his policy on British-French defence co-ordination.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We already enjoy an extensive defence relationship with France and, as reported in paragraph 117 of the 1988 "Statement on the Defence Estimates" (Cm. 344-I), we are discussing a number of ideas for even closer bilateral co-operation.

Maritime Defence

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the contribution of the Royal Navy to the maritime defence of the Atlantic Alliance.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to paragraph 302 of volume 1 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1988" (Cm. 344-I).

Nuclear Submarines

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the anticipated cost of the decommissioning of British nuclear submarines.

Mr. Sainsbury: No decision has yet been taken on the method of disposing of decommissioned nuclear submarines; therefore no costs have yet been assessed.

Defence Contracts (North-west)

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the progress of defence contracts currently being undertaken in the north-west.

Mr. Sainsbury: There are a large number of defence contractors based in the north-west, and a still greater number of projects being undertaken there. It is, therefore, not possible to provide the information requested without disproportionate effort. However, some 10 per cent. of defence expenditure is made in the region.

Teachers

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what percentage of teachers employed on British bases in Germany are locally entered teachers; and what have been the comparable figures each year since 1982;

(2) what percentage of teachers employed on British bases in Germany are locally entered teachers.

Mr. Sainsbury: Approximately 25 per cent. of teachers working in the service children's schools in Germany at present are locally entered teachers. In previous years, the annual percentages were as follows:

	Per cent.
1982	24
1983	25
1984	22
1985	21
1986	22
1987	25

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many locally entered teachers were scale 1 teachers, scale 2 teachers, scale 3 teachers and scale 4 teachers in 1982; and what have been the figures each year to the latest available date;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report a table setting out the pay of locally entered teachers and United Kingdom-based main scale for each year from 1982 to the latest available date.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information requested on all locally entered teachers around the world is not held centrally and can only be obtained at disproportionate costs.

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if locally entered teachers are entitled to paid leave for participation in trade union activities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: There are no formal union recognition arrangements covering locally entered teachers. The question of granting accredited representatives paid leave for participation in trade union activities does not, therefore, arise.

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to review the pay and conditions of locally entered teachers employed in Germany; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The pay of all locally entered staff in Germany is currently under review. Conditions of employment are regularly reviewed.

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received concerning the pay and conditions of locally entered teachers employed in Germany; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: There has been a small number of representations to local management about the level of locally entered teacher pay awards in Germany.

Sherwood Forest

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what acreage of Sherwood forest has been used by his Department for each of the years since 1979; whether he has any plans to reduce this acreage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 28 November 1988]: The Ministry of Defence has used the following acreages of land in Sherwood forest for Army training purposes since 1979:

	Acres
1979-1981	720
1982-1987	669
1988	602

Included within the 602 acres is a 28-acre pine forest in Budby south forest which the Army has agreed no longer to use for training. We plan to lease a further 482 acres of land in the Sherwood forest area for training purposes; we expect negotiations to be concluded shortly.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 30 November 1988

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply of Tuesday 29 November at column 178. My Department has no plans to seek removal of Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

Nursery Schooling and Child Care

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the Government will respond formally to the report by Bronwen Cohen for the Equal Opportunities Commission, which forms part of the European Commission's study on the provision of nursery schooling and childcare.

Mrs. Rumbold: As the report was prepared for the European Commission the Government have no plans to make a formal response. The report's findings will be taken into account by a number of Government Departments, particularly in the context of the ministerial group on women's issues in its consideration of childcare needs.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Schizophrenia

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of those convicted of crimes in Northern Ireland in 1987 have ever been admitted to National Health Service mental illness hospitals and units with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave him on 28 November 1988 at column 121.

School Meals

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average price charged to pupils for school meals by each education and library board in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is as follows:

1988-89 school year

Education and library board	Primary pence	Secondary pence
Belfast	75	75
South Eastern	80	85
Southern	75	80
Western	80	85
North Eastern	75	[1]

[1] The North Eastern education and library board operates cash cafeterias in all its secondary schools. Other boards operate cash cafeterias in a number of their secondary schools.

Slaughterhouses

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether, in view of the over-capacity in slaughterhouse facilities in Northern Ireland, he will set out the justification for grant aid for the further provision of slaughtering facilities from Her Majesty's Government or European Economic Community sources.

Mr. Viggers: Investment relating to an increase in beef and pigmeat slaughtering capacity in Northern Ireland is ineligible for consideration for assistance from Her Majesty's Government or the European Community unless it relates to the modernisation, rationalisation or replacement of existing capacity.

Royal Victoria Hospital, Belfast

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many claims have been received in the past 12 months arising from damage to vehicles in the grounds of the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast.

Mr. Ian Stewart: During the 12 months ended 25 November 1988, 10 claims for criminal damage compensation were received for vehicles damaged in the grounds of the hospital.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the allocation to individual programmes in Northern Ireland of the public expenditure totals announced on 1 November.

Mr. Tom King: The autumn statement by my right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on 1 November announced total public expenditure planning figures for the Northern Ireland programme as follows:

Year	£ million
1989-90	5,468
1990-91	5,690
1991-92	5,910

Excluding social security benefits and national agriculture and fishery support, the allocation for 1989-90 represents an increase of some £219 million or 6 per cent. on the forecast out-turn for 1988-89. However when account is taken of resources released through a reduction in the NI Housing Executive's outstanding debt, the cash available for services in 1989-90 will be 7·4 per cent. higher than in 1988-89.

I have decided on the following allocations to individual programmes:

Programme	1989-90	1990-91	1991-92
Northern Ireland Office:
Law, Order, Protective and Miscellaneous Services	627	670	710

Programme	1989-90	1990-91	1991-92
Northern Ireland Departments:
Northern Ireland Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Services and Support	111	110	110
Industry, Trade and Employment	426	430	430
Energy	−50	−50	−80
Transport	157	160	160
Housing	257	240	250
Environmental and Miscellaneous Services	284	300	300
Law, Order and Protective Services (Fire Service)	29	30	30
Education and Science, Arts and Libraries	930	960	1,000
Health and Personal Social Services	940	980	1,020
Social Security Administration	103	110	110
Other Public Services	63	60	70
Total Northern Ireland Block (excluding Social Security Benefits)	3,880	4,000	4,120
Social Security Benefits	1,514	1,630	1,730
Total Northern Ireland Block	5,394	5,620	5,840
National Agriculture and Fishery Support	74	70	70
Total Northern Ireland Programme	5,468	5,690	5,910

Notes:

1. Figures are rounded to the nearest £1 million for 1989-90 and to the nearest £10 million for 1990-91 and 1991-92. Figures may not sum to totals because of roundings.
2. The figures for the energy programme are negative because it is anticipated that in the years concerned NIE will be repaying loans to Government.
3. The plans for the housing programme reflect the intention to reduce Northern Ireland Housing Executive's outstanding debt, subject to parliamentary approval of a forthcoming financial provisions order.

The planning figures for 1989-90 will form the basis for preparation by Northern Ireland Departments and the Northern Ireland Office of main estimates for the coming year. These will be presented to Parliament in due course.

The allocations reflect my assessment of how best to distribute the Northern Ireland public expenditure totals in response to local needs and circumstances. Copies of a more detailed statement on these allocations have been placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Lobster Stocks

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to extend the seeding of lobster stocks.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department and the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland have been closely involved in a series of lobster stock enhancement programmes in inshore waters in which tagged, hatchery-reared lobsters have been released and later recaptured in commercial fisheries. The initial results of these experiments are ecouraging. However, these studies will need to run for at least three years before firm conclusions can be reached or decisions taken on the value of extending this work.

Research and Development Budget

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning the cuts in the research and development budget.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning the cuts in the research and development budget.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning public funding for research in horticulture.

Mr. Ryder: Following discussions with Ministers and officials, industry organisations were asked for their considered responses by the end of October to our proposals for withdrawal of Government funding for near market R and D. So far, about 60 have been received, together with correspondence from other organisations and individuals.

Warble Fly

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will amend the existing regulations to limit the areas where it is necessary to treat cattle against warble fly.

Mr. Donald Thompson: No infected areas requiring compulsory treatment for warble fly were declared in either 1987 or 1988. Where, however, a clinical case of warble fly is identified, the relevant herd owner and those within a 3 km radius are required to treat their cattle.

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the countries in which there has been no incidence of warble fly being reported for the last three years.

Mr. Donald Thompson: In the years 1986 to 1988 (up to 25 November 1988) there have been no reports of warble fly in the following counties of Great Britain:

Bedford
Berkshire
Borders
Buckinghamshire
Cambridgeshire
Central Cheshire
Cleveland
Clwyd
Cumbria
Dumfries and Galloway
Durham
Dyfed
East Sussex
Essex
Fife
Gloucestershire
Grampian
Greater London
Greater Manchester

Butter

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the cost to the European Economic Community for export restitution and other costs for the export of butter for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Expenditure by the European Community on exports of butter and butter oil in 1987 was 758 million ecu (£545 million).

Food Firms

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will estimate the number of food-exporting firms who are still awaiting refunds under the European Community's common agricultural policy; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if his Department will be paying compensation to those food-exporting firms who are still awaiting refunds under the European Community's common agricultural policy; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will make a statement on the delay in payment of refunds to United Kingdom food manufacturers and exporters; how many firms were affected; and if a computer system was responsible.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I share my hon. Friend's concern at the continuation of some delays in the payment of export refunds, which are largely the result of technical problems earlier this year with the development of software for the Intervention Board's computerised external claims system. The Intervention Board continues to do everything possible to restore the position on all claims. Considerable progress has been made, and around 70 per cent. of all claims by value are being paid within two months. Compensation payments will be made under the scheme announced in July on all claims paid since 1 January 1988 after more than two months. Records are not kept of the number of companies whose claims are delayed but, in general, they currently fall within the pigmeat, processed goods and ships stores sectors. Further headway is however being made in these areas, and payment times should progressively improve.

Sellafield

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will seek to obtain from the French Commissariat a L'Energie Atomique the report recently made public that asserts the sea off Sellafield is more radioactive than the sea near to the French Mururoa nuclear test site; and if he will initiate an investigation into these claims.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department has a copy of the document prepared by the French Atomic Energy Commission. We understand that the French authorities did not intend to compare the situation at Sellafield unfavourably with that near their test site, and that they agree that there is no foundation for any speculation that the sea off Sellafield presents any risk to the public. Intensive monitoring carried out by my Department shows clearly that marine radioactivity levels resulting from liquid discharges from Sellafield in 1987 were only about one-hundredth of the level during the 1970s and are continuing to be reduced. The radiation dose even to those consumers who eat large quantities of local fish and shellfish remains well within internationally recommended limits.

Honey (Safety)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if any evaluation has been made of the problem of selling honey found to contain 985 bequerels per kilogram from Chernobyl fall-out, as announced by his Department on 19 August; and what studies have been made of the safety of such honey for human consumption.

Mr. Ryder: No problems arise over the levels of caesium detected in honey. The advice of the National Radiological Protection Board is that, even assuming consumption well above the average, the levels reported are far below those at which action to protect the consumer would need to be considered.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Ryder: I refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply on Tuesday 29 November. My Department has no plans to seek removal of Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

EC Sheepmeat Regime

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to protect the interests of United Kingdom sheep hill farmers during the current negotiations to reform the European Community sheepmeat regime.

Mr. Donald Thompson: In the review of the sheepmeat regime I shall be seeking to secure arrangements which allow United Kingdom producers, including those in the hills, to continue to capitalise on their superior efficiency and natural advantages.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Stevens: To ask the Minister of Africulture, Fisheries and Food whether he proposes to take any further steps to deal with bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. MacGregor: Sir Richard Southwood's working party, in a second interim report, has made two recommendations on which I have decided to act straightaway. First, the report has indicated that it is not at present possible to be wholly sure that rendering as currently practised would eliminate the bovine spongiform encephalopathy agent. I therefore propose to extend by one year, that is until 31 December 1989, the current prohibition on the use of certain animal protein in feed for ruminants. I would like to make it clear that the prohibition would have to continue there after unless processing methods which are sufficient to destroy the casual agent have been identified and are widely available.

Second, the working party has also advised that although in its view the transmission of bovine spongiform encephalopathy via milk is very unlikely, it would be prudent to ensure that milk from animals suspected of having bovine spongiform encephalopathy is destroyed. In fact, little or no milk is produced from such animals. As a precautionary measure, however, I shall be making an order prohibiting the sale or use of such milk for human or animal consumption except for the feeding of the cow's own calf.

WALES

Planning Law

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to change the law which allows a developer to dig a short trench which by doing so satisfies the definition of a specified activity and thereby enables that developer artificially to preserve a planning consent without undertaking any real development on the site.

Mr. Grist: None.

Council Housing (Rents)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the average rent of a three-bedroomed council house within each Welsh housing authority in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Grist: The information requested on the average rent of a three-bedroomed council house is not collected centrally. Such information is published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy in "Housing Rent Statistics".

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Grist: I refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply of Tuesday 29 November at column 178. The Department has no plans to seek removal of Crown Immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

Midwives

Sir Raymond Gower: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many nursing and midwifery staff from each of the old grades have been assimilated to each of the new grades in the clinical grading structure.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information requested is given in the following table:

HOME DEPARTMENT

British Dependencies

115. Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what diferences there are in the regulations relating to admission to the United Kingdom for health treatment from the British dependencies in (a) the Caribbean and (b) Gibraltar and the Falklands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: British citizens resident in any of the dependent territories are not subject to immigration control, whatever the purpose for which they wish to come to the United Kingdom. The admission of passengers requiring leave to enter is governed by the immigration rules, which provide for the admission of passengers from any country who wish to receive private medical treatment at their own expense. Separate arrangements also exist by which the medical authorities of a number of countries, including Gibraltar and the Falkland Islands, may refer patients for free treatment in the United Kingdom under the National Health Service.

Fines (Non-payment)

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average amount owing by people imprisoned for non-payment of fines, in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is not available centrally.

Cell Toilets

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of his Department on the installation of cell toilets in prison wings when wings are being rebuilt or redeveloped; and if he will list the prisons in which this has been done.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Prison department policy is to install in-cell sanitation when prison wings are being rebuilt or redeveloped. Major refurbishment schemes of this type have begun at Liverpool and Stafford prisons.

Women's Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the creche facilities at each of the women's prisons in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on such facilities.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None of these prisons has creches. But they exist, staffed by volunteers, at a number of male establishments. The Department is encouraging governors of establishments without such facilities to set them up wherever possible.

Police (Leicestershire)

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now approve the request of the chief constable of Leicestershire for more police officers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The police authority wrote on 8 September notifying us of a revised application for 89 police posts subject to the county council's decision on the availability of finance. This will be considered along with applications which have been received from other authorities for increases in 1989-90.

My right hon. Friend is able to approve 800 police posts for provincial forces in 1989-90. This is an increase on the 500 which were available for this financial year. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary will offer advice on how the available posts should be allocated. The aim is to announce decisions in December.

Fire Safety

Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to improve the standards of fire safety in newly-constructed private dwelling houses; and if he has any plans to give the fire service authority to intervene in matters relating to newly-constructed private dwelling houses.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: All new buildings have to meet the requirements of part B of the Building Regulations 1984 relating to structural aspects of fire safety. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is currently undertaking a review of all building regulation requirements and a consultation paper will be issued when the part of the review concerning fire is completed. I do not have plans to give the fire service authority in these matters, for which responsibility rests with building control authorities.

Immigration

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the number of letters received but not opened at Lunar house on 21 November.

Mr. Renton: On 21 November, the approximate total number of unopened items of mail and those opened for the extraction of fees but not acknowledged was 591. All mail received in the post room is now being opened and acknowledged within 24 hours.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate the date of receipt of applications for the citizenship being dealt with by Lunar house on 21 November.

Mr. Renton: Information is not available in the form requested. The average time since the date of application for cases completed by the nationality division (including the Liverpool nationality office) during October 1988 was 13 months for registration and 21 months for naturalisations.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for (a) citizenship and (b) variations of leave have been received; and how many applications have been (i) granted and (ii) not granted in each case, in each of the last two years.

Mr. Renton: Information on applications for citizenship and variation of limited leave to stay and how they are dealt with is published in the annual report "Immigration, Nationality and Passports". Information on applications made, and decisions taken, in 1986 and 1987 for these two types of cases is given in the following two tables:

(a) British citizenship

	1986	1987
Number of applications received in caseworking groups	57,480	[1]80,020
Number of grants of British citizenship[2]	45,870	64,880
Number of applications not granted	4,900	5,690

Notes:

[1] This figure does not include some 210,000 applications which had been received by the end of 1987 but had not then been sorted and prepared for consideration.

[2] These figures for grants of British citizenship were published in Home Office statistical bulletin "Citizenship Statistics, United Kingdom 1987" (Issue 12/88).

(b) Variations of limited leave to stay in the United Kingdom, excluding EC nationals[3]

	1986	1987
Number of applications received (by post or in Public Enquiry Offices)	261,280	230,470
Number of grants of extensions of stay or settlement	214,270	197,510
Number of refusals of extension or settlement	9,280	9,130

Note:

[3] This table does not include figures for applications which were withdrawn, or which for other reasons did not require a decision.

Asylum

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people applied for asylum in the United Kingdom in each month of 1988 to October; how many were (a) refused and (b) granted; and how many were (i) detained and (ii) removed.

Mr. Renton: Information for the first two quarters of 1988 is given in table 1. Information on the number of asylum applicants detained is not collected in the form requested. However, table 2 gives the number of asylum applicants at ports who, on the first day of the month indicated, had been detained for more than one month. Comprehensive information on the numbers of asylum applicants removed is not available centrally.

Visitors (Entry Refusals)

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate the number of refusals of visitors at United Kingdom ports of entry in 1985, 1986 and for the first 10 months of 1988, showing the figure as a percentage by the number of visitor applications made.

Mr. Renton: The available information on the numbers of passengers admitted into the United Kingdom and on those who were refused leave to enter and removed in 1985, 1986 and 1987 are published annually in table 1 of the annual Command Paper "Control of Immigration Statistics, United Kingdom" (Cm. 9863, 166 and 415 respectively). Although the numbers of visitors admitted are known, it is not possible to distinguish from the refused and removed figures those passengers who had sought entry as visitors.

In the first nine months of 1988, 13,743 non-EC passengers were refused leave to enter and removed. The corresponding admission figures are not yet available.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply on Tuesday 29 November. The Home Department has no plans to seek removal of Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

Car Phones

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been made against vehicle drivers for the use of car phones while driving a vehicle.

Mr. John Patten: The available information relates to proceedings at magistrates courts for all offences of careless driving etc., and is published annually in "Offences relating to motor vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary tables" (table 5 of the issue for 1986, the latest available). The figures for 1987 will be published soon. Information is not collected centrally about the circumstances of these alleged offences.

PRIME MINISTER

Poland (Visit)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if during her recent visit to Poland she discussed with the Polish Government the possibility of the export of pollution abatement technology for rivers and waterways from the United Kingdom;

(2) if during her recent visit to Poland, she took the opportunity to raise with the Polish Government the possibility of Poland purchasing combined cycle clean coal-burning power station technology from the United Kingdom;

(3) if during her recent visit to Poland she discussed with the Polish Government the effect of the Chernobyl fall out on Polish agriculture; and if there were any lessons the United Kingdom could learn, in terms of environmental protection, from the Polish experience;

(4) if during her recent visit to Poland she raised the issue of Her Majesty's Government's concern over pollution released into the atmosphere from Polish power plants and factories contributing towards acid rain, ozone layer depletion and the greenhouse effect;

(5) if during her recent visit to Poland she discussed with officials and members of the Polish Government the possibilities of the United Kingdom exporting nuclear reactors, nuclear fuels and nuclear waste disposal technologies to Poland;

(6) if during her recent visit to Poland she discussed with Polish Government ministers progress made in nuclear, chemical and conventional arms control talks, in regard to the stabilisation of security in central Europe;

(7) if during her recent visit to Poland she discussed mutual methods of support of the non-proliferation treaty and the international nuclear safeguard regime.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) on 11 November 1988 at columns 315-16.

Greenhouse Effect

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if, as part of her policy to develop a United Kingdom and European Community response to the greenhouse effect, she will seek to obtain, and set in train an expert evaluation of the Schmidbauer report on precautions for the protection of the earth's atmosphere released by the Bundestag in August.

The Prime Minister: All available relevant information will be taken into account in considering possible responses to the threat of global warming. The inter-governmental panel on climate change, under the auspices of UNEP and the WHO, has established three working groups to report on the science, effects and response to the greenhouse effect. The United Kingdom will be playing a major role in this key international forum, both leading the working group on scientific assessment and contributing to clarification of possible policy responses.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if she will initiate an interdepartmental evaluation of the total annual replacement numbers of incandescent light bulbs currently used by each Government Department, Government agencies, quangos, local government departments and educational establishments in the United Kingdom, as part of her recent policy announcement to counter the greenhouse effect; and if she will further initiate a cost comparison between replacement with compact fluorescent energy efficient bulbs and those incandescent bulbs currently in use.

The Prime Minister: No. It is already Government policy to use the most cost effective and energy efficient form of lighting appropriate to the circumstances.

Arms Control

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if during her recent visit to Washington and meeting with President Reagan and President-elect Bush, she discussed developments since the December 1984 memorandum of understanding of the strategic defence initiative and the anti-ballistic missile treaty on (a) arms control verification for space weapons, (b) the recent United States-Union of Soviet Socialist Republics joint review of the anti-ballistic missile treaty, (c) future contract possibilities in the United Kingdom for strategic defence initiative research and development and (d) the continued implications for the strategic defence programme of the agreements at the 1986 Reykjavik summit and the treaty of Washington in 1987 on intermediate range nuclear forces and other arms control issues.

The Prime Minister: No.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if she has any plans in her forthcoming meeting with President Gorbachev to put forward new initiatives to convert the 1963 partial test ban treaty into a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty.

The Prime Minister: No. For the foreseeable future United Kingdom security will depend on deterrence based in part on possession of nuclear weapons; this will mean a continuing requirement to test them to ensure that they remain effective and up-to-date. A comprehensive nuclear test ban remains a long term goal but progress will only be made by a step-by-step approach which must take account of technical advances in verification as well as progress elsewhere in arms control and the attitude of other states.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if in her forthcoming meeting with President Gorbachev she will make it her policy to attempt to secure common agreement on a joint United Kingdom-Union of Soviet Socialist Republics initiative on nuclear arms elimination under article 6 of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

The Prime Minister: No.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if during her recent visit to Washington DC and meeting with President Reagan and President-elect Bush, she put forward any new arms control and disarmament initiatives in the field of verification measures for a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty.

The Prime Minister: No.

TRANSPORT

Dangerous Substances

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will bring forward proposals to strengthen the existing regulations regarding the transportation of dangerous and toxic materials by road; and if he will take steps to see that the existing regulations are properly enforced.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Proposals are made when necessary in the light of new developments and practical experience. The regulations are enforced by the Health and Safety Executive with the support of the police and the Department's traffic examiners.

Sewage Works (Perry Oaks)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the feasibility report on the possibility of moving the Thames Water sewage works from Perry Oaks to an alternative site; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A report commissioned jointly by the then British airports authority and the Thames water authority on the feasibility of releasing the Perry Oaks sludge works site was completed in July 1986, and a copy deposited in the Library. I understand that the further technical trials recommended by the report, to determine the optimum method of releasing the site, are now complete and that BAA plc and the Thames water authority are discussing its future.

Road Accidents

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, in the light of the report of the Royal College of Surgeons on deaths following road accidents, he will now consider further measures to eradicate congestion, increase facilities for offenders and encourage the transfer of traffic from road to rail.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is considering the issues raised by this independent report, which deals with fatal injury accidents in general, not just those from road accidents.

On alleviating road congestion, I would refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 28 November to his previous question on this issue at column 167.

On the question of transferring traffic from road to rail I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply of 28 November to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) at column 162.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply on Tuesday 29 November. This Department has no plans to seek removal of Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Satellite Information Services Ltd.

Mr. Watts: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has about equity shareholdings in Satellite Information Services Limited and about arrangements made for unallocated shares to be placed and the mechanism to be used for such placing.

Mr. Maude: Information has been given in connection with the company's application to be licensed under the Telecommunications Act 1984. Save for specified purposes section 101 of the Act precludes its disclosure in the absence of the company's consent. The most recent publicly available information is that contained in the company's public record held under the Companies Act 1985 at Companies house.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on United Kingdom manufacturing industries productivity since 1980 and that of major international competitors.

Mr. Maude: Since 1980 manufacturing productivity, as measured by output per head, has grown faster in the United Kingdom than in all other major industrialised countries. Over the previous two decades the United Kingdom was at the bottom of the league.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing in terms of 1988 prices the balance of trade in manufactures each year from 1958 and to the current year to date at an annualised rate, where possible less erratic items.

Mr. Alan Clark: Figures are only available at 1988 prices from 1970 onwards. The remaining figures requested are shown in the table below:

Manufactures less erratics (BOP basis) at 1988 prices (£ billion)

[1] The figures for 1988 are for January-October 1988 at an annualised rate.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the percentage increase in the volume of imports of manufactures from and exports to the European Economic Community since 1970.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on trade at constant prices is not available by area. Data at current prices are in the following table:

United Kingdom Trade in Manufactures with EC Countries[1]

Inward Investment

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the level of inward investment into the United Kingdom in 1987.

Mr. Alan Clark: According to the latest figures known to the invest in Britain bureau, in 1987, 323 inward investment decisions were made to locate in the United Kingdom. It is expected that these will create 21,279 jobs and safeguard a further 20,284. The associated capital investment is not known.

Scottish and Newcastle Breweries

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects to receive the report from the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the proposed take-over of Scottish and Newcastle Breweries.

Mr. Maude: The Monopolies and Mergers Commission is due to submit its report by 9 March 1989.

Single European Market

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on progress with regard to arrangements made by his Department to assist British firms to take full advantage of the completion of the internal market in 1992.

Mr. Alan Clark: Nine out of ten firms in this country are now aware of the significance of the single market. The central aim of DTI's Europe "Open for Business" campaign is to encourage firms throughout the country to examine the implications for their business and take action to prepare for the challenge.

Japan

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the current balance of trade in manufactured goods with Japan.

Mr. Alan Clark: The crude balance of trade in manufactured goods, defined as sections 5 to 8 of the standard international trade classification revision 3, with Japan based on the provisional figures for the nine months to September 1988 was £3,632·9 million in deficit.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Forth: I refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply on Tuesday 29 November at column 178. My Department has no plans to seek removal of Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

Takeovers

Mr. Stern: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has any plans to amend the regulations for reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in relation to projected takeovers by non United Kingdom resident companies.

Mr. Maude: No. The Government's policy on merger control was set out in our Blue Paper of 3 March following a review of mergers policy. The main consideration in deciding whether a merger should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission is the effect of the merger on competition. This applies to bids by foreign companies just as to bids by domestic companies.

Post Office Users Council

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last met representatives of the Post Officer Users Council; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Forth: The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs last met with the chairman of the Post Office Users' National Council on 2 November. This was one of a number of meetings which the Minister has had in recent months with representatives of the council to discuss Post Office matters.

EEC

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the internal market council held on 18 November.

Mr. Maude: The Council, at which I represented the United Kingdom, agreed six single market measures including three food law harmonisation directives relating to labelling, batch-marking and foods for particular nutritional uses; two directives to cut barriers to trade in pharmaceutical products; and a directive setting standards for the design and construction of side guards to be fitted to heavy goods vehicles. It also approved the EC/Switzerland agreement giving Community and Swiss non-life insurers reciprocal rights of establishment for branches and agencies within Switzerland and the Community. There was discussion of the proposal for an EC merger regulation during which I stressed the need for additional action to remove unfair barriers to takeovers which exist in some member states.

The Council also discussed proposed measures relating to the safety of machines, the official inspection of foodstuffs, patents and trademarks, broadcasting and the Commission's memorandum about proposals for a European company statute; and the Commission made a statement about progress in completing the single market.

SCOTLAND

Health Boards

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance is given to health boards regarding performance-related pay schemes to general and unit managers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The guidance is contained in circular SHHD/DGM(1987)21, a copy of which will be placed in the House of Commons Library.

Pacemakers

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland in which units of Greater Glasgow health report there was the shortfall in pacemakers mentioned in the finance report 88/118(b) of Greater Glasgow health board; what was the initial shortfall; and what is the current figure.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This is a matter for the health board. I understand that they have written to the hon. Gentleman asking him to substantiate comments made to the media.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the provisions allowing for the recovery of value added tax in circumstances where boards would otherwise be penalised financially for putting services out to tender.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Whitley Council Procedures (Appeals)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will give the mean time taken for an appeal to be resolved by the Whitley council procedures;

(2) if he will give the number of appeals currently being processed by the Whitley council procedures.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The procedures for settling differences between employing authorities and individual NHS employees relating to conditions of service, including questions of grading, are prescribed in section 32 of the general Whitley council conditions of service handbook. The Scottish Home and Health Department has no role in these procedures, and no information of the kind sought by the hon. Member is held centrally.

NHS Ancillary Services (Privatisation)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the cost so far in redundancy and early retirement payments resulting from the privatisation of National Health Service ancillary services.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The first contracts to be awarded in the present round of competitive tendering for NHS ancillary services—which is not privatisation—are only now coming into effect. It is therefore too soon to give precise costs but eventual redundancy payments and premature retirement compensation costs resulting from this round are estimated to total £4 million and £800,000 respectively.

"The Scottish Health Service"

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the cost for printing and distributing the publication "The Scottish Health Service."

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The cost of printing was £28,740 or 47p per copy. Costs of handling and distribution of bulk supplies to health boards were £560.

Health

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list (a) the financial resources allocated to the National Health Service in Scotland for the care of the elderly and (b) the number of units and staff specifically allocated within the National Health Service in Scotland for the care of the elderly.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Financial resources allocated to health boards take account of a range of factors including the population in each board's area weighted to reflect age structure and, in particular, the number of elderly people, who require more intensive health care.

Most hospital and other NHS facilities provide services for a range of specialties. Throughout the NHS in Scotland there was an average of 10,997 staffed hospital beds in the year ending 30 September 1987 in the specialties of geriatric long-stay and geriatric assessment. At 30 September 1987 there were 204 hospital doctors in the NHS in Scotland within the specialty of geriatric medicine.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list (a) the number of people in Scotland between 65 and 75 years of age who have been identified as needing or having (i) hip replacements, (ii) cataracts, (iii) chest complaints, (iv) heart disease, (v) strokes, (vi) Parkinson's disease, (vii) Alzheimer's disease and (viii) osteo/rheumatoid arthritis, and (b) the number of people in Scotland over 75 years of age who have been identified as needing or having the above;

(2) if he will list (a) the number of 65 to 70-year-olds receiving private sector care, (b) the number of 70 to 75-year-olds receiving private sector care, (c) the number of 75 to 80-year-olds receiving private sector care, (d) the number of 80 to 85-year-olds receiving private sector care and (e) the number of people over 85 years of age receiving private sector care in Scotland;

(3) if he will list (a) the number of 65 to 70-year-olds receiving National Health Service care, (b) the number of 70 to 75-year-olds receiving National Health Service care,

(c) the number of 75 to 80-year-olds receiving National Health Service care, (d) the number of 80 to 85-year-olds receiving National Health Service care, and (e) the number of people over 85 years of age receiving National Health Service care in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is not held centrally.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has initiated any studies into the conclusions reached by Dr. Brenda Gibson and Dr. Tim Eden published in the Lancet on 9 September relating to childhood leukaemia in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The letter referred to reached no conclusions. It reported an observation that during 1987 more children than one would normally expect were diagnosed with leukaemia. The authors offered no likely explanation for this. Rates of child leukaemia vary considerably from year to year in the normal course of events. However, I shall be looking closely at the 1987 and the 1988 rates when they are available, in case they offer evidence of a rising trend.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply on Tuesday 29 November. The Scottish Office has no plans to seek a general removal of Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations. But it does not seek to alter the position whereby National Health Service premises, under the National Health Service (Amendment) Act 1986, automatically lose Crown immunity in respect of any matters which are the subject of regulations under the Health and Safety Act 1974.

Rating Reform

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assumptions he made, in calculating his estimates of community charge levels which local authorities might reasonably levy, in respect of each local authority in Scotland about provision to be made in 1989-90 for (a) inflation over 1988-89 budgets, (b) increased borrowing by authorities to finance capital expenditure under section 94 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973, (c) full year commitments of expenditure incurred for only part of the year 1988-89, (d) loss of rate income in previous years due to revaluation appeals, (e) new services or expansion of existing services to meet demands created by demographic change, (f) any increased level of bad debt, (g) any proportion of the adult population which would avoid payment of the community charge and (h) the size of the adult population liable for payment of the community charge.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is as follows:

(i) 6 per cent.;

(ii) full account of the best available estimates of such borrowing less the reduction in borrowing which will result from the capitalisation of housing improvement and related specific grants;

(iii) none. The estimates specifically excluded increases in the volume of expenditure;

(iv) local authority's latest estimates of non-domestic rate income were used in the calculations;

(v) £35 million;

(vi) and (vii) It was assumed that losses in collection and exemptions (net of the additional income from standard charges) for community charges would together be at the same level as losses and reliefs for non-domestic rates;

(viii) 3,905,177 before exemptions or 3,806,571 taking account of exemptions and standard charges.

Blood Tests

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements have been made for the results of blood tests, including those involving DNA profiling, to be available for use in the Scottish courts.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Questions have recently arisen in civil proceedings as to whether a court has power to order a person to submit to such tests or to draw an inference from a refusal to be tested. My noble and learned Friend, the Lord Advocate, has accordingly requested the Scottish Law Commission to consider questions arising from the provision of bodily samples of both civil and criminal cases and to report with their recommendations in the near future. I understand that the Commission intends to issue a discussion paper, with provisional proposals, on 8 December.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many current occupants of National Health Service hospital and unit beds have a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses in each health region; and what those figures are as a percentage of (a) mental and (b) all hospital beds in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 28 November 1988]: The information, which is provisional, is as follows:

Residents with main diagnosis of schizophrenic psychoses at end of 1987 by health board and expressed as percentage of psychiatric and all hospital beds

Health Board of Residence	Total Number of Residents	Per cent. of psychiatric beds	Per cent. of all beds
Argyll and Clyde	283	16·5	6·6
Ayrshire and Arran	132	14·3	4·5

Shetland	—	—	—
Tayside	330	16·2	6·5
Western Isles	—	—	—
TOTAL	3,331	15·3	6·0

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients with a primary diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in Scotland in the last year; and how many were admitted for a hospital stay more than once during the year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 28 November 1988]: Provisional figures indicate that 1,402 individual patients were discharged from mental illness hospitals in 1987 with a primary diagnosis of schizophrenic psychoses of whom 250 were readmitted at least once within the calendar year.

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in Scotland in each of the last five years; and how many of them were taken into local authority residential care in the same year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 28 November 1988]: The information is as follows:

Discharges[1] from mental illness hospitals with a main diagnosis of schizophrenic psychoses, 1982-87, showing discharges to local authority or hostel care

	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	[2]1987

[1] Includes discharges following readmissions.

[2] Provisional.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Attorney-General if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of the Lord Chancellor's Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply of Tuesday 29 November at column 178.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he has any plans to propose to the World Bank that all future funds from the International Development Association to the poorest countries be in the form of grants not loans;

(2) if he has any plans to propose to the governing bodies of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund that, as part of their Third world debt policy, they include the six guidelines for structural adjustment programmes agreed by Ministers at the Development Assistance committee meeting in December 1987;

(3) if he will propose to the European Community that all aid loans, past, present and future, to the poorest countries now be converted into grants and all new aid be in the form of grants.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the answers that I gave the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mrs. Barnes) on 28 November at columns 69-70.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to increase the number of staff in the overseas development administration dealing with environmental and social aspects of aid.

Mr. Chris Patten: The number of social development advisers has increased from two to four over the last year and an associate professional has recently been appointed.

All project managers have responsibility for the environmental aspects of aid which must be addressed at the earliest stage of the project cycle. Environmental advice to the Department has recently been strengthened by a formal link with the International Institute for Environment and Development.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to restore Britain's overseas aid programme budget to its 1981 level of gross national product.

Mr. Chris Patten: Britain already has a substantial and effective aid programme of some £1,387 million in the current financial year. It is planned to grow significantly in real terms over the next three years.

Lomé Talks

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take steps to ensure that the Lomé talks result in European Economic Community aid making provisions for more staff and resources for environmentally sustainable projects.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Community has already made clear the importance that it attaches to protecting the environment and has reaffirmed its willingness to step up co-operation with its African, Caribbean and Pacific partners in this area under the next Lomé convention.

It is for the Commission to decide how its staff complement is distributed but I certainly hope that it will give due weight to enhancing its own capacity to cover environmental concerns. We ourselves are temporarily financing a forestry expert to work within the Directorate-General for Development.

HEALTH

Home Chiropody Service (Nottingham)

Mr. Graham Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance and advice his Department issues to district health authorities regarding the home chiropody service.

Mrs. Currie: A circular HC(77)9 issued in April 1977 advised health authorities that while some domiciliary service would remain necessary, especially for elderly housebound people, for patients generally they should examine the scope for more economical alternatives which would not affect the standard of service, but would enable better use to be made of chiropodists' time. That advice remains unchanged. It is, however, for individual health authorities to determine the level of chiropody services that they provide, including domiciliary visits, in the light of their assessment both of local needs and of resources.

Eye Tests and Dental Examinations

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department has on the numbers of people who currently have eye tests and dental examinations.

Mr. Mellor: We estimate that 11·7 million sight tests were undertaken in the general optical services in England in 1987-88. In the same period, just over 29 million dental examinations were undertaken in the general dental services.

Miss Sharon Campbell

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what conclusions the Government draw from the report of the committee of inquiry into the care and aftercare of Miss Sharon Campbell, Cm. 440.

Mrs. Currie: The report made a number of very helpful recommendations relating to the care of mentally disordered people in the community. It was drawn to the attention of health and local authorities to whom its contents will be of value in terms of service planning and good practice.

We are considering those recommendations which are specifically directed to the Secretary of State, and others which may require some action or consideration at national level. We shall, of course, take action to implement any changes that are necessary.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funds are available for the Myalgic Encephalomyelitis Association and what proposals he has for funding this group.

Mrs. Currie: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) on Tuesday 8 November at column 180.

Brain Tumours

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research is proposed or currently being undertaken into the cause of an above average number of brain tumours among male adults in certain parts of north Humberside.

Mrs. Currie: We have not yet received the assessment and advice to which I referred in my reply on 28 July to my hon. Friend at column 538. We do not propose to consider further research before then. We are not aware of any similar research by anyone else.

Childhood Cancers

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he has received from experts on medical statistics following his request for an assessment of the report on childhood cancers in north Humberside.

Mrs. Currie: The advice is still awaited.

Nurses (Grading)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many appeals regarding (a) nurses and (b) midwives grading have been received by each district health authority; and what percentage that is of all nurses and midwives in each area;

(2) how many appeals have been heard in each of the last 15 days concerning nurses and midwives grading, for each grade A to G; how many were won and how many lost; how many persons were involved in each case;

(3) how many appeals have been lodged regarding nurses and midwives grading, how many persons are involved (a) in total and (b) by rank; how many involve each grade A to G; and how many appeals are expected to be heard in each of the next 10 weeks.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold this information centrally.

Stone Old People's Hospital

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has received for approval proposals to transfer Stone old people's hospital from the National Health Service to Stone elder centre.

Mrs. Currie: No.

AIDS

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he proposes to publish the report of the working group on the short-term prediction of HIV infection and AIDS in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The report has been published today. We are most grateful to Sir David Cox and members of the working group for their work in preparing this report. A copy has been placed in the Library.

The main conclusions of the report are:

- between 10,000 and 30,000 AIDS cases are likely to be diagnosed between 1987 and 1992, and the "recommended basis for planning" is 13,000 cases;
- by the end of 1992 between 7,500 and 17,000 persons are expected to have died from AIDS;
- assuming that no treatment emerges which significantly prolongs the life of people with AIDS, the number of living people with AIDS at a particular point in time is expected to rise from the present level of about 1,350 to a recommended basis for planning of over 5,000 by the end of 1992;
- the figures given above relate only to cases expected to be reported to the communicable disease surveillance centre under current conditions. Adjustments for under-reporting would increase them by at least 20 per cent.;
- the rate of increase in new AIDS cases is slowing, probably as a result of changes in behaviour of the homosexual community which occurred from about the mid-1980s, but the report stresses that "it would be a gross error to regard even the lower predictions as grounds for complacency". This, it says, is particularly so in view of the significant number of heterosexuals thought to be infected and the potential for spread within the general population. The report points out that any reversal of the changes which have led to the slowing down of the spread amongst homosexual men could lead to a further phase of rapid growth;
- by the end of 1987 between 20,000 and 50,000 persons were infected with HIV in England and Wales of whom some 13,000 to 30,000 were probably homosexual men. Between 2,000 and 5,500 are thought to have been infected through heterosexual contact, but assuming that most injecting drug misusers and haemophiliacs are heterosexual, the total pool of infected heterosexuals could be between 6,000 and 17,000;
- the group made no predictions about future numbers of HIV infections because these depend on unforseeable changes in behaviour patterns.

The Government accept the figures in the report as a basis for future planning.

We accept the report's recommendations for updating its predictions and for improving the present data collection arrangements. We are taking forward with the communicable disease surveillance centre arrangements for preparing annual updates of the projections for England and Wales. In Scotland similar annual updates of the predictions of the Tayler Report of 1987 will be undertaken in conjunction with the communicable diseases (Scotland) unit.

The recommendations for further research studies to improve epidemiological information, notably for large scale HIV surveillance based on anonymous testing, will be followed through as part of the action to improve HIV surveillance announced by my right hon. and learned Friend last week.

On the recommendations for improving the reporting systems for cases of HIV and AIDS we are inviting Dr. Joe Smith, director of the public health laboratory service, to make proposals to the chief medical officers on ways of reducing to a minimum the under-reporting of HIV infection and AIDS.

Retirement Homes

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what representations have been made to him regarding the regulation of privately managed retirement homes for the elderly;

(2) whether he has any proposals for the regulation and control of fees for privately managed retirement homes for the elderly; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The fees of private residential care homes for elderly people paid from private resources are a matter between the proprietors and fee payers. Assistance from public funds towards paying such fees was considered by Sir Roy Griffiths in his report "Community Care: an Agenda for Action". We have received many representations on the regulation of such homes since the publication of Sir Roy Griffiths' report and of the report of the independent review of residential care chaired by Lady Wagner, both of which included recommendations on this matter.

We are currently considering these reports and the responses to them and will be bringing forward our own proposals in due course. Copies of both reports are in the Library.

Seriously Injured Patients (Deaths)

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will set up an inquiry to establish why 30 per cent. of seriously injured patients admitted to accident and emergency units die from potentially treatable causes.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 28 November 1988]: No. We are not aware of any evidence that 30 per cent. of seriously injured patients admitted to accident and emergency departments die from potentially treatable causes. What the recent report of the Royal College of Surgeons on the management of patients with major injuries did put forward was the hypothesis that, of the patients who die, up to 30 per cent. do so from potentially treatable conditions. Most patients who are treated in accident and emergency units will eventually return home lafter treatment.

My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State welcomed the report on the day it was published. Issues raised by the report are being carefully studied.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing Benefit

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by what percentage total housing benefit for (a) Nottingham and (b) England and Wales has been reduced in the current year in the months for which comparable figures for 1987 are available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Actual expenditure is collected only on an annual basis and the information for 1988-89 will not become available until mid-1989. However, the estimated 1988-89 annual expenditure on housing benefit in Nottingham shows a reduction of 1·9 per cent. from 1987-88. The estimated reduction for England and Wales is 2·9 per cent.

Lone Parents

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which organisation has been commissioned by his Department to undertake research on the behaviour of lone parents receiving benefits, referred to in his answer of 11 November, Official Report, column 225.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Independent research exploring the motivations and perceptions of lone parents receiving benefits has been commissioned from Professor Jonathan Bradshaw of the social policy research unit at York university and Dr. Jane Millar of the centre for the analysis of social policy at Bath university.

A study of factors influencing the economic activity of lone parents, using family expenditure survey data, has also been commissioned from the Institute for Fiscal Studies.

Retirement Pensions (Australia)

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to negotiate a new reciprocal agreement with the Government of Australia to ensure the indexation of retirement and widows' pensions being paid to British pensioners who live in Australia and Australian pensioners who live in Britain.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government have at present no plans to renegotiate the social security agreement with Australia so as to provide for the indexation of retirement and widows' pensions.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost of unfreezing the retirement pensions of British ex-service men and their widows now living in Australia.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that separate statistics are not kept on the number of British ex-service men and their widows who receive United Kingdom retirement pensions and live in Australia. However, the cost of paying full rates of pensions and widows benefits to all United Kingdom pensioners in Australia, including British ex-service men and their widows, is estimated at 1988 rates to be £88 million a year.

Benefit Offices

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the results of the staffing review for his Department's benefit offices in the north-west will be announced.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The results of the staffing review were announced in the north-west during the week of 21 November 1988.

Sir Peter Blaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what new areas of work have been introduced in the last two years by his Department at their offices at Norcross and Warbreck hill, Blackpool; and to what extent the newly introduced work is at different grades compared with work previously done at these locations.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No new areas of work have been introduced in the last two years at the Department's Norcross site. At Warbreck hill the new family credit branch has absorbed the staff of the family income supplement unit, which it replaced. In order to accommodate the additional staff required for family credit, some work had to be moved to Newcastle Central office. The net result has been an increase of 123 posts at Warbreck hill.

The grading of administrative and executive staff employed on family credit work is broadly the same as for staff previously employed on family income supplement, with the temporary addition of management resources to oversee the introduction and early development of the new scheme.

DEFENCE

President Waldheim (War Record)

116. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the progress of the Government's inquiry into the circumstances of President Kurt Waldheim's involvement in the capture of British service men.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The review concerning the fate of captured British service men and the involvement, if any, of the then Lieutenant Waldheim is being conducted with all the speed consistent with the proper consideration of evidence and the need for accuracy. I can assure the hon. Member that the work is being brought as quickly as possible to its conclusion and that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Stewart) promised on 29 February, a report will be published.

Anglo-Egyptian Relations

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about Anglo-Egyptian defence relations.

Mr. Sainsbury: Anglo-Egyptian defence relations are excellent, as illustrated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's recent visit to Egypt for the El Alamein commemoration when a full range of matters of mutual interest were discussed with Egyptian Ministers.

Tendering Procedures

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the benefits of improved tenders procedures in securing better value for money.

Mr. Sainsbury: The improved tender procedures have contributed to the substantially better value for money which is now being achieved. Our commercial approach to defence procurement is also promoting the more efficient use of industrial resources which has stimulated innovative ideas and led to greater export success for British industry.

Nuclear Test Ban Treaty

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are being taken to secure an international and comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave on 29 November to the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott).

Statistics (Non-Communist Countries)

Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the number of infantry men in each of the non-communist countries of the world and the standard personal weapons issued to them.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Not all countries publish this information, and a comprehensive unclassified survey covering the many different types and definition of infantrymen and personal weapons cannot therefore be readily produced. However, some material is obtainable from open sources, and if the hon. Member would care to write to me with a particular query, I would be pleased to see what could be provided.

Soviet Chemical Weapon Capacity

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why it is the policy of Her Majesty's Government not to give details of Government assessment methods of Soviet chemical weapon capacity.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Our assessment of the Soviet Union's chemical warfare capability is based in part on classified sources. It would not be in the national interest to discuss such sources in detail.

Uranium

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what criteria he uses in assessing what details of imports of uranium for defence purposes may be given in parliamentary answers.

Mr. Sainsbury: The national interest.

Warsaw Pact Forces

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the basis on which internal estimates of Warsaw pact central front forces are calculated by his Department.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Our estimate of Warsaw pact forces on the central front is based in part on classified sources. It would not be in the national interest to discuss such sources in detail.

Agency Status

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress in evaluation of the prospects for agency status for the Meteorological Office and non-nuclear research establishments.

Mr. Sainsbury: An initial report submitted in the summer put forward a prima facie case for establishing the Meteorological office as an agency. Further work is now proceeding to develop the necessary detailed structures. The report by the Defence research study team into the feasibility of establishing the non-nuclear defence research establishments as an agency was also submitted in the summer. We are now considering the way ahead in the light of its conclusions and recommendations.

Soviet Weapon Capacity

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, following his comments that the Soviet Union is producing a new submarine every six weeks, plus two new aircraft and eight new tanks each day, if he will make a statement on the basis for this information and how this has been verified for accuracy.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Our assessment of Soviet arms production is based on all available sources of information, some of which are classified. Every effort is made to ensure that our assessments are as accurate as possible.

INF Warheads

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what NATO decision has been taken on the use to which nuclear material recovered from the dismantlement of the withdrawn intermediate nuclear force warheads is to be put.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The use of materials from United States nuclear warheads withdrawn from Europe as a result of the INF treaty is a matter for the United States Government.

NATO

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement setting out details of the joint study with the Federal Republic of Germany on the binding of closer links in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation alliance, including its cost, time span, number of officials and ministers likely to be involved; and whether it will include evaluation of non-proliferation measures.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, agreed with Dr. Scholz on 4 October that a joint study should be undertaken on British-German bilateral defence co-operation to consider practical ways in which our already close links can be further strengthened within the Alliance, and to examine the scope for increasing public awareness of them. Work at official level is well underway and my right hon. Friend expects to discuss the matter further with Dr. Scholz later this week. It is too early to say what the outcome of the study will be; however, it is not at present addressing non-proliferation measures, which are dealt with on a multilateral basis within the Alliance. The costs of the study will be minimal.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply on Tuesday 29 November at column 178.

Nitroglycerine

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to the retention of a United Kingdom-based capability to manufacture nitroglycerine.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 25 November 1988]: We keep the requirements for our defence industrial base for ammunition, and its components, under continuing review.

Royal Ordnance

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his agreement with Royal Ordnance for the supply of explosives, propellants and ammunition includes any conditions relating to the maintenance of reserve capacity in Royal Ordnance factories.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The agreement relates only to the requirement for Royal Ordnance to deliver to the MOD, at annually reducing prices, specified quantities of ammunition in the fiscal years prior to March 1993. I am satisfied that Royal Ordnance is capable of meeting our foreseeable requirements, supplemented by other supplies as necessary.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many times he has discussed the retention of specific manufacturing capabilities with the management of Royal Ordnance since it was sold.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 25 November 1988]: None. We await the outcome of the Royal Ordnance rationalisation plans.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Domestic Spending

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the percentage rise in total domestic spending each year since 1978, including the estimate for 1988; and what has been the target for each of these years in the medium-term financial strategy.

Mr. Major: The growth in total United Kingdom domestic expenditure at current market prices since 1978 was as follows:

Percent change in total domestic expenditure

	Per cent.
1978	14·6
1979	18·1
1980	14·9
1981	9·6
1982	10·1
1983	10·3
1984	7·8
1985	8·1
1986	8·8
1987	9·1
1988	11·4

Source: United Kingdom National Accounts 1988 Edition (table 1.2) CSO except for 1988 which is an estimate [consistent with the forecast published in the autumn statement.]

There are no "targets" for domestic expenditure in the medium term financial strategy.

NHS Ancillary Services (VAT)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had on the payment of value added tax on private contracts for the provision of National Health Service ancillary services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: These matters are kept under continuous review.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the timetable for the imposition of value added tax on domestic construction; and what response he has made.

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Member no doubt intended to refer to non-domestic construction.

There have been a large number of written responses to the consultation paper issued on 21 June a number of which commented on the timetable. The majority of those wanted the implementation date implied by my statement on 21 June (1 April 1989) to be deferred to 1 August 1989. All responses to the consultation paper are being considered carefully. Draft legislation is being prepared for exposure in the new year.

Interest Rates

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of interest rates.

Mr. Lilley: Bank base rates are 13 per cent.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the future movement in interest rates over the next year.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 29 November 1988]: Interest rates will remain as high as they need be, for as long as it takes, to bring inflationary pressures back under control.

Mortgages

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report the months since May 1979 in which average building society mortgage rates were below 10 per cent.; what has been the average charged in the previous two decades; and if he will consider imposing an upper limit to mortgage interest relief if and when the average rate falls below 10 per cent. to reduce the amount of relief by one-fifth for each half per cent. fall in the rate of interest.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No.

Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what relative priority the Government accord to (a) further reductions in income tax and (b) an increase in means-tested social security benefits as a means of reducing dependency.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The sound economic policies pursued by this Government have allowed both reductions in the rate of income tax and increases in spending in priority areas. We intend to continue in this way.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to review the present tax paid on petrol and motor oils.

Mr. Peter Lilley [holding answer 29 November 1988]: Decisions on excise duty rates are a matter for my right hon. Friend's Budget.

Money Supply

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in the money supply since May 1979; and what contribution was made by the public and private sectors, respectively.

Mr. Lilley: Figures for the money supply are published regularly in the Bank of England "Quarterly Bulletin," "Financial Statistics" and "Economic Trends." Most of the published aggregates are defined as assets of private sector United Kingdom residents. There is therefore no public sector contribution. M0 is an exception and includes all currency in circulation, including that held in the public sector. No split between public and private sector holdings is available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the percentage increase in the real money supply between February 1974 and May 1979 and between May 1979 and the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Lilley: There is no universally accepted definition of the real money supply. But figures for the money supply are published regularly in the Bank of England "Quarterly Bulletin," "Financial Statistics" and "Economic Trends." A wide range of price indices and deflators is published in official statistical sources.

Privatisation

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the dates of each of the privatisation sales since 1979, together with the amount of money received from each separate sale.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Moneys received together with dates of sales up to the end of 1987-88 are as follows:

Company	Date of sale	Net proceeds (£ million) to 1987-88
Amersham International	February 1982	64
Associated British Ports	February 1983	46
	April 1984	51

	Istel (subsidiary of Rover Group)	47·6

European Community Grants

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on European Economic Community social and regional grants to the United Kingdom and their relation to domestic funding.

Mr. Brooke: Receipts from the Community's structural funds are taken into account each year when the United Kingdom's public expenditure plans are set, thus enabling public spending as a whole—and specifically expenditure on programmes to which the receipts relate—to be fixed and maintained at higher levels than would otherwise have been possible. As regards individual projects and programmes financed by structural fund grants, it is a condition of Community assistance that member states pay a specified share of the total cost from domestic funds.

Security Service Personnel (Pensions)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many former members of the security services are drawing public pensions.

Mr. Brooke: In common with previous Administrations it is not the practice of this Government to provide information of this nature about the security services.

Inflation

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest forecast for the level of inflation in 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: In his autumn statement the Chancellor forecast that the retail prices index in the last quarter of 1989 would be 5 per cent. higher than a year earlier.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current rate of inflation.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 29 November 1988]: The rate of retail prices index inflation was 6·4 per cent. in October 1988.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Mans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the implementation of the extension of the BES to private rented housing.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 29 November 1988]: This year's Finance Act extended the BES to companies specialising in letting properties on new-style assured tenancy terms. The scheme applies to investment in shares issued after 29 July (Royal Assent) and the indications are that it will be highly successful. The Government are confident that the extension of the scheme will make a significant impact on the supply of private rented housing.

Oil revenue

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give details of North sea oil revenue accruing to the Government from all sources for each year since 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 29 November 1988]: The latest figures for Government revenues from United Kingdom oil and gas production in each year from 1979-80 are as follows:

£ million

	Royalties	Petroleum Revenue Tax[1]	Corporation Tax before ACT set-off	Supplementary Petroleum Duty
1979-80	628	1,435	250	—
1980-81	992	2,410	341	—
1981-82	1,396	2,390	681	2,025

1984-85	2,426	7,177	2,425	—
1985-86	2,057	6,375	2,917	—
1986-87	919	1,188	2,683	—
1987-88	1,024	2,296	1,350	—

[1] Including advance payments

International Monetary Fund

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet Mr. Michael Camdessus, the managing director of the International Monetary Fund; and what matters will be discussed.

Mr. Peter Lilley [holding answer 29 November 1988]: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer expects to meet Mr. Camdessus, managing director of the International Monetary Fund, at the spring meetings of the IMF and World Bank, next April. He would normally discuss a wide range of international financial issues.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his policy towards releasing the monthly unemployment figures to (a) journalists and (b) hon. and right hon. Members.

Mr. Cope: The figures are made available to anyone who requests them from the set time of release. In particular, every effort is made to ensure that all right hon. and hon. Members can have access to the figures as soon as they are published. Copies of the press notices are made available in the Library, where additional more detailed information can also be obtained via the computer database.

Local Employer Networks

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many local employer networks are presently in operation in England and Wales; and how many more are planned for 1988-89.

Mr. Cope: At the end of October, 98 local employer networks were operating in England and Wales. A further six applications are currently being considered, and discussions are taking place with three organisations showing an interest in applying to "host" a local employer network.

Job Clubs

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have obtained a job whilst participating in job clubs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The number of people participating in the job club programme who have found jobs since April 1986 (when central records begin) is 115,815. A further 29,531 have also gone into other positive outcomes, such as training or a place on community programme or the enterprise allowance scheme.

I am pleased with the continuing success of job clubs in giving positive help to long-term unemployed people. Around 70 per cent. of all those joining the programme achieve a positive outcome.

YTS (Clothing Industry)

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many YTS trainees in the clothing industry have employed status and have their allowance made up to the minimum rate for the job by the company; and what percentage this is of the total.

Mr. Cope: At the end of September 1988 YTS records show 12,600 young people in training on YTS in clothing and textiles manufacturing occupations. Of these 5,700 (45 per cent.) has employed status.

Information is not available on the number of trainees who have their allowance made up to the minimum rate for the job by the company.

Training

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many employment training participants there are in the London borough of Newham.

Mr. Nicholls: In November 1988 there were 264 people in training on employment training in the London borough of Newham.

Equal Pay

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what recent discussions he has had with the Confederation of British Industry concerning equal pay for work of equal value and the House of Lords rulings in the case of Hayward v Cammell Laird and Pickstone v Freemans.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend has had no such discussions, although I understand that the CBI has these matters under consideration.

Age Discrimination

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to protect employees being discriminated against on account of their age.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend has no such plans.

Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if, in the light of the Court of Appeal ruling of 9 November 1988, in the matter of Rayware Ltd. and another v Transport and General Workers Union and another, he plans to introduce amendments to section 15 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 as substituted by section 16 of the Employment Act 1980 and amended by section 21 of schedule 3 to the Employment Act 1982.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to amend this legislation, but the matter is kept under review.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on Monday 28 November at column 218. My Department has no plans to seek removal of Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Self-government

114. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the United Kingdom will sign the Council of Europe's charter for local self-government; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) on 24 November, at column 10.

Right to Buy

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will consider setting Camden council a public target for dealing with the backlog of offer notices under the right-to-buy legislation;

(2) if he will consider setting the London borough of Newham public targets for dealing with its backlog of offer notices under the right-to-buy legislation.

Mr. Trippier: I am requiring regular monthly reports from Camden and Newham councils on progress towards eliminating backlogs. I will take whatever action seems appropriate in the light of the reports.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tenants are waiting for but have not been served an offer notice under the right-to-buy laws within the statutory time limit in (a) Camden, (b) Brent, (c) Lewisham and (d) Newham; and how many tenants have been served with such notices in each of these boroughs during each of the last three months.

Mr. Trippier: The latest available information is:

(a) Offer notices not served within the staturory time limit, as at 31 October 1988

	Number
Camden	[1]2,349
Brent	1,350
Lewisham	1,595
Newham	1,300

[1] 30 September.

(b) Offer notices served in the last three months

	August	September	October
Camden	135	111	n.a.
Brent	22	34	183
Lewisham	182	125	257
Newham	168	165	166

Football (Arrests)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his estimate of the number of arrests (a) within football grounds in the 1987-88 season and (b) in the vicinity of football grounds on match days during the same period;

(2) at how many division III and division IV football matches no arrests were made in the 1987-88 season.

Mr. Moynihan: Total arrests at English league matches during the 1987-88 season were 6,147 with 6,542 ejections, 11 per cent. and 1 per cent. up on the 1986-87 totals respectively. The relevant statistics away from grounds on match days are not available.

Identity Cards

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the proposed identity card system will apply to non-league club supporters attending Football Association cup matches.

Mr. Moynihan: This issue is discussed in the report of my working party on the national membership scheme, published on 9 November. I have sent a copy of the report to my hon. Friend. The report recommends that supporters of non-league clubs should not be required to produce membership cards for FA cup matches involving league teams. This is a matter that we will be considering further when our legislative proposals are published.

Wildlife (Protection)

Mr. Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list any of the administrative implications of the proposed draft European Commission directive on wildlife habitat protection which he will seek to raise with the Commission; and what representations he has had on the subject from the National Farmers Union.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The draft directive proposed a rigid and bureaucratic system of nature conservation. At the Environment Council in Brussels on 24 November, member states unanimously rejected this approach. The majority agreed that the objective of any Community action should be to assist member states, as necessary, to achieve implementation of the relevant existing international conventions.

We have received no representations from the National Farmers Union on this subject.

Greenhouse Effect

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research his Department has commissioned, or has planned, on the role of nuclear power, energy conservation and renewable energy sources in reducing carbon dioxide emissions and the greenhouse effect; if he will list any such studies which have been published and place copies in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department is currently considering what further studies would be timely and appropriate on all aspects of responses to the issue of greenhouse gas emissions. This will take into account the role of the working group on responses recently set up by the UNEP/WMO Inter-Governmental Panel on Climate Change. We will certainly build on the expertise available at the Building Research Establishment on energy conservation in buildings, and on the extensive energy efficiency and renewable sources programmes run by the Department of Energy.

Vehicle Emissions

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the 1987 emissions of carbon dioxide, carbon monoxide and nitrogen oxides from automobile and freight transport.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information available relates to emissions from petrol-engined and diesel-engined road vehicles. The basis for estimation is constantly being updated, and a major revision took place in 1988. For comparability, therefore, figures are given for the years 1977-1987.

Carbon dioxide, carbon monoxide and nitrogen oxides: estimated emissions from road vehicles, by type of fuel

Methane

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the 1987 emissions of methane in the United Kingdom, by source, in million metric tonnes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is not available.

Chlorofluorocarbons

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the 1987 production and usage of chlorofluorocarbons in the United Kingdom, and the projections for 1990 and 1995.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Production and use figures for chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) are not given separately for the United Kingdom (UK) or any individual member state of the European Community (EC). Figures for production and use (sales) in the EC in 1987 are not yet available. Following are 1986 figures for CFCs 11, 12, 113 and 114:

	CFC 11/12 000 tonnes	CFC 113/114 000 tonnes
EC Production	372	66
EC Use (Sales)	259	48

Source: European Council of Chemical Manufacturers' Federation. Figures for CFC 115 are not available.

The Montreal protocol provides for production and consumption of CFCs 11, 12, 113, 114 and 115 to be frozen at 1986 levels by 1990, reduced by 20 per cent. by 1994 and by a further 30 per cent. by 1999. The regulation adopted in October 1988 to implement the protocol within the EC provides for the consumption obligations to be fulfilled by the Community as a whole. The United Kingdom has called for the protocol to be strengthened so as to reduce CFC emissions by at least 85 per cent. by the end of the century.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the reasons which underlie his policy decision to rely on voluntary measures by industry to reduce pollution by chlorofluorocarbons.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The provisions of the regulation to implement the Montreal protocol in the European Community for controlling productions and consumption of chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) and halons are directly binding on producing and importing companies. Within the EC, consumption is to be controlled by control of overall supply not specific uses. Market forces will determine how available supplies are used. It is within this overall regulatory framework that we expect user industries to take steps on a voluntary basis to reduce the use of CFCs and halons to the maximum possible extent. EC Environment Ministers on 16 June asked the European Commission in co-operation with member states to initiate discussions with European industry to this end. Controls on specific uses are not necessary. A voluntary approach is simple, quick and effective. In the United Kingdom and some other EC member states action has already been taken on a voluntary basis to reduce CFCs in aerosols: the United Kingdom aerosol industry expects to phase-out non-essential use of CFCs in aerosols by the end of 1989.

Carbon Monoxide

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the 1987 emissions of carbon monoxide in the United Kingdom, by source, in million metric tonnes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is as follows:

Carbon monoxide: estimated emissions by source

United Kingdom, 1987	Million tonnes
Domestic	·42
Commercial-public service	·01

Planning Consent

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to change the law which allows a developer to dig a short trench which by doing so satisfies the definition of a specified activity and thereby enables that developer artificially to preserve a planning consent without undertaking any real development on the site.

Mr. Chope: The Government have no present plans to amend the definition of a specified operation for the commencement of development given in section 43 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971. Local planning authorities have power to serve a completion notice under section 44 of the Act if they consider that a development will not be completed within a reasonable period.

Mrs. Ana Maria Quick

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to reply to the letter of the hon. Member for South Hams of 20 October concerning Mrs. Ana Maria Quick of 8 MacAndrew Walk, Ivybridge, Devon.

Mr. Chope: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 28 November 1988.

Air Pollution

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what policy considerations underlie the United Kingdom's decision not to make a commitment to a 30 per cent. cut in nitrogen oxide emissions in 1988 at the international meeting on air pollution control held in Bulgaria on 1 November.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The proposition before the meeting of the executive body of the UN/ECE convention on long-range transboundary air pollution was a protocol on the control of emissions of nitrogen oxides (NOx) or their transboundary fluxes. The protocol commits signatories to halt the hitherto inexorable rise in NOx emissions (bringing emissions back to 1987 levels by 1994), to apply suitable standards to stationary and mobile sources, and by 1996 to have adopted control policies based on the "critical loads" which the environment can tolerate.

The United Kingdom and 24 other countries signed the protocol. More indicated their hope to sign in the near future. This represents a major international commitment.

The United Kingdom is committed to taking action on the basis of scientific study of the problems caused by acid deposition and the implications of various possible solutions. The 1979 convention provides the right forum for advancing the international consensus which is essential if transboundary air pollution problems are to be successfully tackled.

Before the protocol was due to be signed the Government received an invitation to sign a draft declaration to the effect that they would by 1998 achieve reductions in NOx emissions of at least 30 per cent. measured from a baseline of any year between 1980 and 1985.

We did not think it right to commit ourselves both to an arbitrary percentage target for 1998 and to the quite different "critical loads" approach of the protocol for the earlier date of 1996.

At the last moment the draft declaration was reduced to a commitment to achieve reductions "in the order of 30 per cent." from a baseline of any year between 1980 and 1986.

Twelve countries signed this version on 31 October. It is uncertain from the final wording what action they mean to take. The protocol is specific.

Radioactive Waste

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the environmental advantages and disadvantages of reprocessing in regard to the production of volumes of radioactive waste.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government's position on reprocessing is contained in the Government's response to the House of Commons Environment Committee's report (Cmnd. 9852, paragraphs 75-82).

The following reports of research commissioned by DOE address the environmental implications of different approaches to spent fuel management.

(i) Management of Spent Oxide Fuel from Thermal Reactors: the Environmental and Radiological Effects of Alternative Approaches—Associated Nuclear Services. Ref. DOE/RW/83-086.
(ii) Direct Disposal of Spent Nuclear Fuel: the Current Status of Technology, January 1987—National Nuclear Corporation Ltd. Ref. DOE/RW/87-021.
(iii) Magnox Fuel Dry Storage and Direct Disposal: Assessment of CEGB/SSEB Reports—Ove Arup and Partners. Ref. DOE/RW/87-125.

These reports are publicly available through the British Lending Library.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if there are any technical problems remaining to be solved in the disposal of (a) low level radioactive waste, (b) intermediate level radioactive waste, (c) high level heat generated radioactive waste and (d) unreprocessed spent nuclear fuel.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There are no fundamental technical problems to be solved in the disposal of radioactive waste. Work is continuing in order to demonstrate the safety of disposal.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what are the current estimated costs (a) per cubic metre and (b) per mile of transporting radioactive wastes in each of the low, intermediate and high level categories;

(2) what are the current estimated costs per cubic metre of packaging radioactive wastes in the low, intermediate and high level categories;

(3) what are the current costs per cubic metre of storing radioactive wastes in each of the low, intermediate and high level categories.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The costs of transporting, packaging and storing radioactive wastes are matters for the waste producers.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, under current or planned European Commission research programmes, the option of subseabed emplacement or disposal of (a) low, (b) intermediate and (c) high level radioactive wastes has been examined.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Seabed disposal of radioactive wastes forms part of the current programme of research at the European joint research centre, Ispra, Italy. The future EC research programme on radioactive waste management has not yet been defined.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the current and future estimated costs per cubic metre of the disposal of radioactive wastes in each of the low, intermediate and high level categories.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Nirex estimates the costs of disposal of low and intermediate level radioactive wastes as:

Intermediate level wastes
—Land based deep repository: £2,000 to £7,000 per cubic metre.
—Offshore deep repository: up to £14,000 per cubic metre.
Low level wastes
—Deep repository: £750 to £2,000 per cubic metre.

For high level wastes accurate cost estimates are not possible as waste in this category will not be disposed of for at least 50 years. An indicative estimate is £500 per litre.

Ozone Layer

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any report from the chairman of the United Kingdom stratospheric ozone review group in regard to co-ordinating ozone layer research in the European Economic Community following the meeting in October in the Netherlands of European ozone researchers.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The meeting in the Hague on 15 and 16 October to discuss coordination of EC/EFTA research on the ozone layer was called by the United Kingdom Government and the Commission of the European Communities. Officials of the Department were present and there was no need for a report from the chairman of the stratospheric ozone review group, who was also present. The Department is now taking steps to set up a co-ordination unit, based in the United Kingdom, following decisions taken at the Hague meeting.

Water Supply (Cuts)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses have had their water cut off for each of the years from 1979 to the present by water authority regions.

Mr. Moynihan: The information requested by the hon. Member is in the table below; a breakdown of disconnections of households for non-payment is not available for years prior to 1984-85.

Data on the duration of disconnections is not held centrally.

Household disconnections for non-payment

Authority	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88
Anglian	218	774	2,268	1,586
North West	110	238	457	448
Northumbrian	70	59	300	480
Severn Trent	650	1,074	1,000	932
South West	76	404	404	324
Southern	115	1,249	1,152	1,164
Thames	788	225	576	1,594
Welsh	90	350	950	1,785
Wessex	0	0	0	32
Yorkshire	25	189	293	560

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will produce a table showing the number of houses having water cut off by region and by length of time cut off for the year 1987.

Mr. Moynihan: Data on the duration of disconnections is not held centrally.

Fauna, Flora and Habitats

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's policy on, and response to, the draft Economic Community directive on the protection of threatened fauna, flora and habitats; and what legislative measures would be necessary to implement such a directive.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: At the Environment Council in Brussels on 24 November member states unanimously rejected the approach embodied in the Commission's draft directive. We await revised proposals.

Emission Controls

Mr. Jack Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on Tuesday 29 November. The Department has no plans to seek to remove Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

Electric Bulbs

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what policy Her Majesty's Government follows in respect of the use of low-energy use and long-life electric bulbs.

Mr. Chope: It is Government policy to use the most cost-effective and energy efficient form of lighting appropriate to the circumstances.

Brundtland Report

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in the light of the Brundtland report "Our Common Future", he will consider publishing an annual report on how Government policies, programmes and spending are being redirected towards global sustainable development.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Prime Minister's foreword to the United Kingdom's response to the Brundtland report, published in July, stated that Government Departments had been invited to examine their policies in the light of the report's recommendations. Promoting sustainable development on a global scale must be achieved through concerted action by the entire international community. The Government are not persuaded that publishing an annual report would be the best way to make progress. The United Kingdom is already taking a leading role within organisations such as the United Nations and OECD to ensure that the main thrust of the report's conclusions is integrated into their activities.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment for what reasons he decided to allocate to the Nature Conservancy Council for 1989-90 less than the council requested; and what criteria he used in deciding the amount of the allocation.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Nature Conservancy Council's alocation for 1989-90 is based on the forward planning figures first notified to the council in November 1987, together with an additional sum of £0·5 million towards new expenditure which the council expects to incur in protecting important wildlife habitats in Caithness and Sutherland.

The allocation will allow the council to fulfil its essential commitments, and is set in the context of the Government's wider policy of restraining public expenditure. The scope for the Nature Conservancy Council to improve its efficiency and generate more revenue from publications and research was also taken into account.

Rating Reform

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to amend the Local Government Finance Act 1988 in respect of (a) the community charge provisions, (b) the revenue support grant and (c) the national non-domestic rate.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman must wait and see.

Local Plans

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will issue guidance on the preparation of local plans, following the consultations undertaken in June.

Mr. Ridley: Two further planning policy guidance notes are being published today, adding to the framework of concise national planning guidance issued earlier this year. PPG12 provides guidance on local plans and PPG13 on highway considerations in development control. Copies of both have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Our proposals for a much wider coverage of statutory development plans have been well received. Each district council should have a plan setting out its policies and proposals for development and conservation, to guide them in their decisions on individual planning applications and to provide guidance to developers and reassurance to local people about the future pattern of development in their area. Local plans are particularly necessary for areas where there is strong pressure for new development.

Local plans may also demonstrate the need for broad phasing of new development and for density policies to protect the character of established residential areas.

Where such plans are up to date and consistent with national and regional policies and with the relevant provisions of the structure plan, they will carry considerable weight in determining planning applications and appeals.

Private Sheltered Housing

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received any representations seeking regulations of service charges and management fees levied by landlords and agents of private sheltered housing.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 29 November 1988]: My Department received a number of such representations earlier this year. We therefore welcomed the initiative taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) in setting up a working party with representatives of the retirement housing industry and consumer interests; I hope their code of practice for the industry will be completed and available soon.

Mersey Basin

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has as to the levels of mercury found in fish tested within the Mersey basin area;

(2) what information he has as to the levels of dissolved oxygen in the waters of the Mersey basin.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 29 November 1988]: As the hon. Member will be aware, the Mersey Basin Campaign is the long-term Government-launched initiative to tackle both water pollution and landward dereliction in this important part of the country. The Department works with many bodies and operational agencies in the campaign organisation, and they carry responsibility in the first instance for much of the detailed information involved.

On mercury levels the relevant tests are on fish for human consumption and, in fact, are carried out in Liverpool bay and the Irish sea—not within the Mersey basin area itself where there are no commercial fisheries. the latest information I have from sea tests is that the level of mercury in fish flesh is 0·2 mg per kg net weight, which is below the EC limit of 0·3 mg.

As to levels of dissolved oxygen in the Mersey system, detailed measurements are carried out by North West water authority as part of its operations. I suggest that the hon. Member should approach the authority direct for any detailed information, and interpretation, he may require. Meanwhile, I understand from the authority that levels of dissolved oxygen are increasing throughout the system, including trouble spots such as the upper estuary.

Azores

Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the provisions of the draft European Community directive on the protection of fauna, flora and habitats extend to the Azores.

Mrs. Chalker: I have been asked to reply.

Yes.

ENERGY

Magnox

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will list his estimate at 1987-88 prices for decommissioning Magnox, advanced gas cooled reactor and pressurised water reactor nuclear power stations; what sums are currently set aside by the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board respectively, for this purpose; and if he will make a statement on his Departmental responsibility once the electricity supply industry is privatised;

(2) what provisions have been made in their annual accounts by the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board, respectively, for the decommissioning of Magnox and other nuclear reactors in the period 1970-87, at 1987 prices;

(3) how he will ensure that following privatisation adequate finance is available to cover the full costs of decommissioning Magnox reactors, including both the removal and storage costs of nuclear waste involved.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The total of the board's provisions for decommissioning, reprocessing of irradiated fuel and other liabilities, including the additional provision of £732 million made in 1987-88, was £3,367 million at 31 March 1988.

After privatisation, provisions will continue to be made for decommissioning; and these will continue to be recovered in electricity prices.

Estimates of decommissioning costs are a matter for the CEGB. Matters relating to the SSEB are for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Energy Efficiency (Housing)

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list Government funding for energy efficiency of housing by way of the homes insulation scheme and of community insulation projects over each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Government expenditure on homes insulation scheme grants and current estimated total expenditure on the Community insulation projects over the period 1983-84 to 1987-88 were as follows:

	Homes Insulation Scheme (£ million)	Community Insulation Projects (£ million)
1983-84	25·5	5·5
1984-85	25·3	8·6
1985-86	28·0	19·4
1986-87	26·5	36·6
1987-88	[1]21·6	45·2

[1] Provisional.

North Sea Installations

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what role trade unions play in health and safety on North sea installations.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Trade unions play a role in offshore safety through their membership of the Health and Safety Commission's oil industry advisory committee and through formal and informal consultation procedures particularly with regard to new safety legislation. My safety directorate officials meet unions on a regular basis and upon request.

Nuclear Safety

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will arrange for publication in the Official Report of the resolutions on nuclear waste dumping and nuclear safety sponsored by the United Kingdom at the International Atomic Energy Authority 32nd regular session of the general conference.

Mr. Michael Spicer: A copy of both resolutions will be placed in the Library of the House.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he is satisfied with the efficiency and effectiveness of the present International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards system as reported in the latest available International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards implementation report.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Yes.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he is now in a position to make a statement on the implications for the United Kingdom of the report of the European Parliament Energy Research and Technology Committee on Sellafield and EURATOM safeguards implementation.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. On 27 October the European Parliament voted against the resolution based on the report of the committee.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has made any evaluation of the failures of safeguards implementation listed in the 1987 International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards implementation report, in regard to United Kingdom facilities, nuclear technology exported by the United Kingdom and nuclear materials exported under safeguards by the United Kingdom.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The agency's conclusion as given in the 1987 annual report was that the nuclear material under agency safeguards in 1987 remained in peaceful nuclear activities or was otherwise adequately accounted for.

Euratom

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy to initiate the full implementation of Euratom treaty articles 88 and 89.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. It is for the European Commission to initiate such proposals.

Hinkley Point C

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish an estimate of (a) the cost of the departmental representation at the Hinkley Point C inquiry, (b) the volume of direct follow-up work in the form of written inquiries by objectors and (c) the continued commitment by departmental staff to monitor developments in the inquiry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Department of Energy officials gave evidence at the Hinkley Point C inquiry from 26 October to 2 November inclusive. The expenses incurred by the Department's official witness, his two technical witnesses, and their backup team attending the inquiry were about £4,500.

There have been two subsequent written inquiries by objectors; my Department has replied to one, and will reply to the other as soon as possible.

Officials of my Department will be following developments at the inquiry as appropriate.

Parliamentary Questions

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will outline the policy considerations which underlie his refusal to review all replies given since June 1987 that give no substantive reply on the grounds that such were only possible at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Parkinson: It is my policy to give a full answer wherever possible, whilst having regard to the efficient use of my Department's resources.

Light Bulbs

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if his Department, or consultants to his Department, have made any recent study on the cost savings arising from the total replacement of incandescent light bulbs in use in (a) the domestic sector, (b) the industrial sector, (c) the commercial sector and (d) Government buildings with compact fluorescent lights.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No recent extensive studies related to lamp replacement have been carried out. However, my Department has supported several projects concerned with improved lighting design and control in commercial and public buildings under the energy efficiency office's energy efficiency demonstration scheme. These have demonstrated that cost effective energy savings of over 50 per cent. can be achieved.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what steps are being taken to promote the sale and use of low-energy use and long-life electric bulbs.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The energy efficiency office promotes high efficiency lighting as part of its general promotion of energy efficiency measures. In addition, the lighting industry promotes energy efficient lighting as part of its commercial operations.

Nuclear Fuel (Electricity Reactors)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will now list separately for each year from April 1980 to March 1986 the proportion of total annual throughput of nuclear fuel arising from electricity board reactors.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have nothing to add to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member on 16 February 1988, at columns 591-92.

Nuclear Accidents (Compensation)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has yet responded to a recent letter from the Director General of the Confederation of British Industry requesting public sector liability for civil compensation in the event of a serious nuclear accident following privatisation of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend will be replying to Mr. Banham in due course.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Parkinson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on Tuesday 29 November 1988 at column 178. My Department has no plans to seek removal of Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

Electricity Supply (Privatisation)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what departmental response has been made to the recent letter sent to his Department by John Baker, the Central Electricity Generating Board managing director and also chief executive designate of National Power, regarding the implication of costs transference to customers of nuclear power plant operation under privatisation of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: It is not Government practice to reveal the details of confidential correspondence.

Plutonium

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what assessment he has made on the desirability of large-scale plutonium shipments by sea in (a) surface vessels or (b) submarines from facilities in the United Kingdom;

(2) if he will make a statement on the recently negotiated modification to annex B of the United States-Japan nuclear agreement regarding the sea shipment of separated plutonium outlining what he now regards as (a) the preferable and (b) the most likely transport arrangements for the return of separated plutonium to Japan after THORP is in service in 1992.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Transport options for returning the plutonium arising from the reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel at THORP are still under consideration. Before any decision is taken all necessary safety and security aspects will be carefully considered.

Fawley B Power Station

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, following the recent announcement to cancel plans to build Fawley B power station, the Central Electricity Generating Board has informed him of any revision in its overall nuclear and fossil fuel power station construction programme and electricity forecasts.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The CEGB's proposals to build a coal-fired power station at Fawley have not been cancelled. As my right hon. Friend announced to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on 27 October 1988 at column 320 the CEGB has been given until 1 May 1989 to advise my right hon. Friend whether it wishes to proceed with the application.

I understand that in evidence to the Hinkley Point inquiry the CEGB has advised that its expected application to construct a PWR at Wylfa will not now be submitted until the spring of 1989. The board also advised the Hinkley Point inspector that its forecasts of electricity demand had increased to show a requirement for new capacity by the year 2000 of 15·5 GW.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

US President-elect

13. Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will meet the President-elect of the United States of America.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall be taking an early opportunity to visit the United States of America to meet the new Administration.

EC (Social Cohesion)

14. Mr. McTaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government will take to ensure that the European Community carries out its duty to promote social cohesion among its member countries.

Mrs. Chalker: The objectives of economic and social cohesion are set out in articles 130A and 130C of the treaty of Rome. To this end we have agreed to double the structural funds by 1993. Provision has been made for spending of 52 billion ecu (£34 billion at current prices) up to 1992 to be concentrated in the less developed regions of the Community.

Dr. Jonas Savimbi

15. Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the recent initiatives of Dr. Jonas Savimbi of UNITA, calling for a cessation of hostilities without pre-conditions and a negotiated settlement.

Mrs. Chalker: I have seen press reports of Mr. Savimbi's statements. We would welcome any move to establish internal peace in Angola which had the support of both sides.

Namibia

16. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had on independence for Namibia under the United Nations Security Council resolution 435.

Mrs. Chalker: We have had discussions recently with representatives of all the Governments involved in the United States-led negotiations for Cuban troop withdrawal from Angola and independence for Namibia. We are also in touch on a continuing basis with the UN Secretariat.

71. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding recent developments in the peace process in Namibia.

Mrs. Chalker: We have lent our full support to the United States-led negotiations. We warmly welcome the recent agreement on a timetable for Cuban troop withdrawal from Angola. We urge the parties to move forward quickly to implementation of the UN plan for Namibian independence.

Chile

17. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet representatives of the Government of Chile.

98. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet representatives of the Government of Chile.

Mr. Eggar: Neither my right hon. and learned Friend nor I have current plans to meet representatives of the Government of Chile. I met the Chilean Foreign Minister in Quito on 11 August. We have regular contact at official and ministerial level with the Chilean ambassador.

35. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of Chile concerning the continued imprisonment of political prisoners in that country.

64. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the government of Chile concerning the continued imprisonment of political prisoners in that country.

89. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the government of Chile concerning the continued imprisonment of political prisoners in that country.

Mr. Eggar: We take every opportunity in our contacts with the Chilean Government to discuss a wide range of human rights matters. Her Majesty's ambassador in Santiago does so frequently in his own contacts with the Chilean authorities.

Gibraltar

18. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Chief Minister of Gibraltar; and what was discussed.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend last met the Chief Minister of Gibraltar on 12 April. They discussed a wide range of subjects of mutual interest. My right hon. and learned Friend and I expect to see the Chief Minister when he is in London tomorrow.

Drugs (Caribbean)

19. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received concerning the progress of anti-drug campaigns in the Caribbean.

Mr. Eggar: We are working to strengthen the Caribbean's defences against the threat of drugs, in close co-operation with regional Governments and with the Americans. We are providing assistance including training and equipment. I will be discussing progress with regional leaders at the Miami conference later this week.

Human Rights

20. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress he can report from the Vienna review conference and the bilateral human rights talks held with the Soviets in June.

Mr. Waldegrave: On the Vienna review conference I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) earlier today.

The inaugural round of bilateral talks in June was a welcome opportunity for us to press the Russians both on individual cases of concern to us and on the need for fundamental changes to the Soviet system. Progress has been made on a number of individual cases since then, and some legal reforms have been promised. We shall continue to press on both fronts, including at the next round of bilateral talks due early next year.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the names of each case listed in his answer to the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst), Official Report, 1 November, column 547, and the number allocated to it by the European Commission of Human Rights; and if he will also give the same information for cases relating to article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

Mrs. Chalker: The names of, and numbers allocated by the Commission to, the 23 cases listed in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) on 15 November 1988, are as follows. Where the Government are not aware that the applicant has informed the Commission that his or her identity may be disclosed the letter X is used.

Application number	Applicant's name	Date first introduced with Commission by applicant

Council of Ministers

21. Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will next attend a meeting of the European Community Council of Ministers; and what subjects he expects to discuss.

63. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will next attend a meeting of the European Community Council of Ministers; and what subjects he expects to discuss.

91. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will next attend a meeting of the European Community Council of Ministers; and what subjects he expects to discuss.

Mrs. Chalker: The next Foreign Affairs Council will be held on 19-20 December. Subjects currently on the agenda are GATT; New Zealand butter and sheepmeat; hormones; EC/EFTA relations; and steel tariffs.

54. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of meetings of the Council of Ministers of the European Community held in November.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Amos) on 24 November for a statement on the Foreign Affairs Council of Ministers. My ministerial colleagues have reported on the outcome of specialist Councils of Ministers on matters which are their responsibility.

Vietnamese Refugees

22. Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he intends to meet the Government of Vietnam to discuss the problem of Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has no current plans to do so.

44. Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the position of Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong.

65. Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to reduce the number of Vietnamese refugees accommodated in Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

68. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in relation to the plight of Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong.

90. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the position of Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong.

Mr. Eggar: There are some 25,000 Vietnamese boat people in Hong Kong. Some 15,500 of these have refugee status and are awaiting resettlement overseas. They are gradually being moved into open camps with access to training and employment opportunities which will enhance their resettlement prospects. Since 16 June all new arrivals who meet UNHCR criteria will join those refugees awaiting resettlement. Those who do not qualify as refugees will be held in detention centres pending their eventual return to Vietnam, once internationally acceptable arrangements for this can be agreed with the Vietnamese authorities. We are continuing to take in refugees from Hong Kong at the rate of about 20 per month and urging the other resettlement countries to play their full part.

Kampuchea

23. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives have been taken by the United Nations representatives of the five permanent members of the Security Council towards finding a solution for the problems of Kampuchea.

86. Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives have been taken by the United Nations representatives of the five permanent members of the Security Council towards finding a solution for the problems of Kampuchea.

Mr. Eggar: Responsibility for finding a solution to the Cambodian problem rests primarily with those directly involved. However, my right hon. and learned Friend discussed Cambodia with the Foreign Ministers of the four other permanent members of the Security Council when they met during the United Nations General Assembly. We expect informal contacts to continue between our missions in New York.

Southern Africa

24. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the development of a solution to the regional problems in Angola and Namibia.

Mrs. Chalker: We have lent our full support to the United States-led negotiations. We warmly welcome the recent agreement on a timetable for Cuban troop withdrawal from Angola. We urge the parties to move forward quickly to implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibian independence.

48. Mr. Couchman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last visited southern Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: In September my right hon. and learned Friend paid a successful visit to Sudan, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania and Mozambique. He has no present plans for a further visit to the region.

61. Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent his Department will be involved in the planning of the Prime Minister's forthcoming visit to the front-line states.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has no plans at present to visit southern Africa.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information relevant to the present United Kingdom policy on relations with South Africa was presented at the 32nd annual conference on the International Atomic Energy Authority in Vienna on 19 to 23 September.

Mr. Eggar: No new information relevant to United Kingdom policy on relations with South Africa was presented at the International Atomic Energy Agency's general conference. The conference passed a resolution resolving to take a decision on the suspension of South Africa from rights and privileges of membership of the agency at its 33rd session in 1989. The United Kingdom opposed the resolution because there is no legal basis under the agency's statute for suspending South Africa and to do so for political reasons would violate the fundamental right of any state to belong to the agencies of its choice.

36. Mr. John Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on sanctions against South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: Our objective remains the replacement of apartheid as soon as possible, through peaceful means, by a non-racial, representative system of government. We do not believe that punitive sanctions against South Africa would help achieve this.

United Nations

25. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what subjects were discussed at recent meetings between Her Majesty's ambassador at the United Nations and the new President of the General Assembly.

Mr. Eggar: No such meeting has yet taken place. However, Dr. Caputo, in his capacity as Chairman of the United Nations General Assembly, has asked to see our permanent representative to the United Nations, Sir Crispin Tickell. This invitation has been accepted but no date has yet been fixed.

108. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when next he plans to meet the Secretary General of the United Nations; and what matters will be discussed.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has no immediate plans to do so.

Soviet Union

26. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to meet the Foreign Minister of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; and what issues he will be discussing.

Mr. Waldegrave: We expect Mr. Shevardnadze to accompany the Soviet President, Mr. Gorbachev, when he visits the United Kingdom from 12 to 14 December. We shall wish to discuss a wide range of issues, including bilateral matters, human rights, arms control and regional questions.

31. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to visit the Soviet Union.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and learned Friend has no such plans.

52. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of Anglo-Soviet relations.

Mr. Waldegrave: Anglo-Soviet relations are in better shape than at any time since 1945. Mr. Gorbachev is to visit Britain in December, when he will be having his fourth round of talks with the Prime Minister. Although fundamental differences between us remain, we are developing an increasingly wide range of worthwhile contacts with the Soviet Union at all levels.

Italy

27. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the Italian Prime Minister.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right and learned Friend the Secretary of State will both attend the European Council at Rhodes on 2-3 December.

Israel

28. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to visit Israel to discuss the situation in the middle east.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has no plans at present to visit Israel.

El Salvador

29. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of El Salvador regarding the Amnesty International report on human rights abuses in that country; and what further action he proposes to take.

Mr. Eggar: We have not discussed the Amnesty International report with the Government of El Salvador. It is one of a number of recent reports on the human rights situation in El Salvador, including that by the UN special representative. The Government of El Salvador are aware of our long-standing concern about the human rights situation, and we shall continue to raise these concerns whenever appropriate.

39. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from Amnesty International on human rights abuses in El Salvador; and what action Her Majesty's Government are taking in response.

Mr. Eggar: Representatives of Amnesty International met FCO officials on 9 November to discuss the human rights situation in El Salvador. The British Government condemn all abuses of human rights. We are concerned by reports of a recent increase in human rights violation on both sides of the conflict in El Salvador, and we shall continue to raise our concerns with the Salvadorean Government whenever appropriate.

Afghanistan

30. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the suspension of the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan and continuing atrocities by the Red Army.

Mr. Eggar: We have noted with concern Soviet statements implying that withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan had been suspended. We continue to call for the prompt completion of their withdrawal. We condemn Soviet offensive military operations, including air strikes, which intensify the sufferings of the Afghan people.

33. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to meet the Soviet Foreign Miniter to discuss the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend will be meeting the Soviet Foreign Minister on 13 December. We shall continue to press for the complete and prompt withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan.

France

32. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met his French counterpart.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend last met M. Dumas at the EC Foreign Affairs Council on 21 November. We last had bilateral talks on 2 November in Paris.

Fiji

34. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on how the new constitution of Fiji will affect United Kingdom-Fiji relations.

Mr. Eggar: The traditionally friendly relations between the United Kingdom and Fiji continue to exist, and we hope that Fiji will soon be able to return to parliamentary democracy under a constitution acceptable to a majority of all the people there.

Africa

37. Mr. Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the significance of increasing super power co-operation over regional problems in Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We welcome closer co-operation between the United States and the Soviet Union, and recognise the constructive contribution such co-operation has made to the recent progress in the United States-led negotiations on Angola-Namibia.

Señor Jorge Montes

38. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Chilean authorities regarding the arrest and detention of Señor Jorge Montes.

Mr. Eggar: We understand that Señor Montes was released on 18 November and that no charges have been brought against him.

Angola

40. Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current peace talks concerning the war in Angola.

Mrs. Chalker: We have lent our full support to the United States-led negotiations. We warmly welcome the recent agreement on a timetable for Cuban troop withdrawal from Angola. We urge the parties to move forward quickly to implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibian independence.

62. Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to why the MPLA Angolan Government have so far ignored Dr. Savimbi's offer of peace, in view of South African military withdrawal.

Mrs. Chalker: It is for the Angolan Government to respond to whatever Mr. Savimbi may have said. We would welcome any moves which led to peace in Angola.

76. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to whether there has been any withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola.

Mrs. Chalker: We are not aware yet of any withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola. However, agreement has been reached between the Angolan, Cuban and South African Governments on a timetable for total Cuban troop withdrawal. We look to the early implementation of this agreement.

88. Mr. Knowles: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether his Department has ascertained from those African leaders most closely involved with bringing about a settlement to the civil war in Angola what terms and conditions are being required by the MPLA Government of Angola in order to negotiate with UNITA.

Mrs. Chalker: We are, of course, in touch with African leaders in the region. It is, however, for the parties concerned to bring the war to an end. We would welcome any move to establish internal peace in Angola which had the support of both sides.

97. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the United States Administration, and in particular Dr. Chester Crocker, on the agreement on the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State's speech in the debate on the Address.

Hong Kong

41. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will next meet the Governor of Hong Kong; and what matters will be discussed.

Mr. Eggar: We are in close contact with the Governor of Hong Kong on all aspects of the territory's administration. We meet regularly but at present there are no definite dates for our next meeting.

United States of America

42. Mr. Bevan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of Anglo-American relations.

Mr. Eggar: Anglo-American relations are in excellent order, as the recent visit to Washington of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister demonstrated.

56. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussion he proposes to hold concerning the foreign policy priorities of the next United States Administration.

99. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he proposes to hold concerning the foreign policy priorities of the next United States Administration.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will be taking an early opportunity to meet his new opposite number, Mr. James Baker.

United Arab Emirates

43. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to visit the United Arab Emirates.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and learned Friend has not yet visited the United Arab Emirates, but it is one of the Arabian countries which he will be visiting early next year.

Cyprus

45. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the President of Cyprus; and what issues were discussed.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend last met President Vassiliou of Cyprus when he called on my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 4 October, when we reviewed the progress of the intercommunal talks in Cyprus. My right hon. and learned Friend could not be present at the further discussions with President Vassiliou on 25 November.

Central America

46. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will be sending an observer to the next meeting of the Central American presidents.

Mr. Eggar: No. There has never been any question of foreign observers attending such a meeting.

Palestine National Council

47. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the recent declaration in Algiers by the Palestine National Council; and if he will make a statement.

60. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications of the recent declaration by the Palestine National Council in Algiers for the middle east peace process.

66. Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Palestine National Council's recent declaration in Algiers.

112. Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications of the Palestine National Council's recent declaration in Algiers for the peace process in the middle east.

Mr. Waldegrave: The decisions of the Palestine National Council represent modest but potentially important steps towards a peaceful settlement of the Arab/Israel conflict, although we believe that the declaration of a Palestinian state does not help to carry matters forward.

Gulf States

49. Mr. David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current state of relations between the United Kingdom and the Gulf states.

Mr. Waldegrave: Our relations with the Gulf states are long established and very good.

92. Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last visited the Gulf states.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State last visited some of the Gulf states in January 1986. He will be visiting the area again early next year.

Kurds

50. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received on the current position of the Kurdish population in Iraq and neighbouring countries.

Mr. Waldegrave: The position of the Kurdish people is a matter of continuing concern. We condemned the use of chemical weapons against the Kurdish population in Halabja in March and more recent Iraqi military operations against the Kurdish community.

We have called for an independent investigation of allegations that Iraq has recently used chemical weapons against the Kurds and deplore Iraq's refusal to co-operate.

58. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any proposals to meet representatives of the Kurdish people.

Mr. Waldegrave: Ministers do from time to time meet representatives of the Kurdish people as members of wider delegations. The last occasion was on 21 September when I met a delegation of various interested groups including hon. Members to discuss allegations of use by Iraq of chemical weapons.

Some Kurdish organisations have publicly declared their commitment to overthrow the legitimate Government of Iraq by violent means. It would not be proper for Ministers to receive the representatives of such groups.

93. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Iraqi and Turkish Governments about the treatment of Kurdish refugees.

Mrs. Chalker: We remain in contact with the Turkish Government about the Kurdish refugees. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State informed the hon. Member on 10 November, we have donated £250,000 to the Turkish Red Crescent via the British Red Cross for its Kurdish refugee relief programme.

We have repeatedly called on the Iraqi authorities to respect the human rights of the Kurdish community. We supported the demarche of the Twelve to the Iraqi Government in September, urging the extension of the amnesty granted to Kurdish refugees. We regret that this was rejected.

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what protests Her Majesty's Government has made to the Iraqi authorities over the gaoling of 30,000 Kurds after they attempted to flee the country as a consequence of that Government's campaign against the Kurdish minority.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have repeatedly expressed our concern over the treatment of the Kurdish community in Iraq, and have called on the Government of Iraq to respect their human rights. With other members of the Twelve we called on the Government of Iraq to extend the recent amnesty to members of the Kurdish opposition. We have condemned recent Iraqi military operations against the civilian Kurdish population, and called for an independent international investigation into allegations of use of chemical weapons.

Human Rights Declaration

51. Mr. Archer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received asking Her Majesty's Government to mark the 40th anniversary of the universal declaration of human rights.

Mr. Eggar: Various non-governmental organisations have made representations about commemorating the 40th anniversary of the universal declaration. There is a great deal of public interest in the occasion. To mark the event the Government intend, amongst other things, to ratify the United Nations torture convention, and to produce a brochure for distribution to schools throughout the country.

In addition, I shall address the special commemoration session at the United Nations on 8 December.

Iran

53. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the United Kingdom's relations with Iran.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and learned Friend agreed with the Iranian Foreign Minister on 30 September in New York that full diplomatic representation would be restored in Tehran and London. Talks between Iranian and British officials on implementing this agreement were concluded on 10 November. Relations between the two countries will be conducted in accordance with the Vienna convention on diplomatic and consular relations, to which both countries are signatories. We hope that this agreement will form the basis for developing a more constructive and businesslike relationship with Iran in the future. A chargé will soon be in place and other staff will follow. We will consider the raising of representational levels from chargé to ambassador in due course.

Lebanon

55. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made to resolve the hostage crisis in the Lebanon.

Mr. Waldegrave: We continue to follow up all possible leads within our policy of refusal to make substantive concessions to hostage-takers. We also continue to make it clear to those states which may have influence over such groups that we consider it their humanitarian responsibility to encourage the release of the hostages.

Qatar

57. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when was his most recent visit to Qatar.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and learned Friend has not yet had an opportunity to visit Qatar, but hopes to do so in the future.

Turkey

59. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Turkey about torture and human rights.

77. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in the light of Amnesty International's recent report on alleged human rights violations in Turkey, Her Majesty's Government will urge the Turkish Government to take positive steps to prevent torture.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend raised the subject of human rights with the Turkish Foreign Minister during his talks with him in July. More recently, my officials have discussed the issue with the Turkish Foreign Ministry in Ankara and the Turkish embassy here in London. We are assured that allegations contained in the recent Amnesty International report are being investigated by the Turkish Government. We continue to urge the Turkish Government to maintain the improvement in human rights there has been in recent years and to respect and abide by the terms of the United Nations and European conventions against torture, signed and ratified by Turkey earlier this year.

Middle East

67. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to meet the United States Secretary of State-designate to discuss acceptance by the Palestine Liberation Organisation of United Nations resolution 242.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will be taking an early opportunity to meet Mr. Baker, and he looks forward to discussing with him the prospects for progress in the middle east peace process.

82. Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any new proposals to establish a middle east peace conference; and if he will make a statement.

102. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest prospects for an international middle east peace conference.

Mr. Waldegrave: We shall continue our efforts to remove the barriers to an international conference on the Arab/Israel dispute. We are encouraged that the Palestine National Council has accepted Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, as the basis for such a conference.

Chemical Weapons

69. Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps have been taken to procure the compliance of the Government of Iraq with United Nations resolutions in the use of chemical weapons.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have called for an independent investigation under United Nations Security Council resolution 620 into allegations of recent use of chemical weapons by Iraq. We deplore Iraq's refusal to co-operate. We are working for effective multilateral action to prevent future use and proliferation of chemical weapons.

Eastern Europe (Human Rights)

70. Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest information he has on the state of human rights in eastern Europe.

Mr. Waldegrave: The human rights situation in the countries of eastern Europe is generally unsatisfactory. The position varies considerably from one country to another. Hungary's record, though not faultless, gives the least cause for concern. In Poland, much progress has been made. In Romania, on the other hand, the authorities' flagrant disregard for human rights shows little sign of improvement, and in Czechoslovakia there have been several serious instances recently of the breaking up of peaceful demonstrations or meetings. Her Majesty's Government will continue to raise serious violations with the countries concerned. There has been little improvement in East Germany or Bulgaria.

Departmental Staff

72. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there are any plans to end separate recruitment for civil servants in his Department.

Mr. Eggar: In common with other Government Departments, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is responsible for its own recruitment at certain levels, mostly in the clerical and secretarial grades. Other recruitment to both the diplomatic and aid wings is carried out on the FCO's behalf by the Civil Service Commission. Entry to the administrative grades of the diplomatic service is through a common scheme of recruitment with the Home Civil Service, in which the same selection procedures apply. We have no plans to change these arrangements.

Caribbean (Health Services)

73. Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received in relation to the provision of health services in the dependent territories of the Caribbean.

Mr. Eggar: We have received representations from two hon. Members and from the honorary secretary of the International Collaborative Committee on Child Health. We have not received representations from any of the Dependent Territory Governments, which are responsible for health services in the individual territories.

Poland

74. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the state of relations between Her Majesty's Government and Poland.

107. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current state of Anglo-Polish relations.

Mr. Waldegrave: Our relations with Poland have improved over the last few years. The Prime Minister's visit, which was very successful, should put these relations on a firmer and more positive basis; and should lead to increased contacts of all kinds in future.

Rain Forests

75. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to have the issue of preservation of the world's remaining areas of tropical rain forest raised at the United Nations.

Mr. Chris Patten: This important issue is already high on the agenda of the Food and Agriculture Organisation within the United Nations system. We also strongly support the activities of the tropical forestry action plan and the International Tropical Timber Organisation.

GCHQ

78. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many employees or former employees at Government Communications Headquarters have been dismissed, or face disciplinary action, as a result of their trade union membership.

Mr. Waldegrave: On 18 November, the employment of four GCHQ staff who refused to give up their national trade union membership was terminated with compensation on full redundancy terms. On 5 December, the employment of a fifth will be terminated on the same terms. Six GCHQ employees who originally agreed to the new conditions of service, but then rejoined their national unions, are currently undergoing disciplinary proceedings.

Mr. George Samoilovich

79. Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will report on the progress which has been made with the case of George Samoilovich of Moscow, who urgently seeks an exit visa for medical treatment in the West.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have raised this repeatedly with the Soviet authorities. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State asked Mr. Shevardnadze to take action on this particularly distressing case when we met in New York in September. He undertook to look into it, but there has been no progress so far. We will continue to press the Russians until there is.

Occupied Territories

80. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has made any recent representations to the Israeli Government concerning the abuse of Palestinian human rights by Israeli troops in the occupied territories.

Mr. Waldegrave: We and our partners in the Twelve have repeatedly urged the Israelis to administer the occupied territories in accordance with international law and human rights standards. We shall continue to do so.

Canada

81. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to visit Canada in the near future.

Mr. Eggar: Yes. I hope to discuss this some time early in the new year with my newly re-elected opposite number.

Single European Act

83. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to meet M. Jacques Delors to discuss interpretations of the Single European Act.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State expect to meet M. Delors during the European Council meeting in Rhodes on 2-3 December, when a wide range of EC issues will be discussed.

Pakistan (Ambassador)

84. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Pakistan ambassador; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has met the ambassador of Pakistan on a number of occasions. Their discussions have ranged over a variety of issues, including bilateral relations between our two countries, and the problem of Afghanistan.

Bombay High Commission

85. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the current levels of his Department's staff at the British high commission in Bombay; and what were the levels in 1987.

Mr. Eggar: The current number of staff at the British deputy high commission in Bombay is 22 United Kingdom-based and 80 locally engaged. Numbers at the beginning of 1987 were, respectively, 21 and 74.

Western European Union

87. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the next ministerial meeting of the Western European Union will take place.

Mr. Waldegrave: On 3-4 April 1989.

100. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made on negotiations leading to the accession of Spain and Portugal to the Western European Union.

Mr. Waldegrave: A protocol for the accession of Spain and Portugal to the modified Brussels treaty was signed at the Western European Union ministerial meeting in London on 14 November.

Sub-Saharan Africa

94. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to make a visit to sub-Saharan Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: In September my right hon. and learned Friend paid a successful visit to Sudan, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania and Mozambique. He has no present plans for a further visit to the region.

Soviet Union (Cultural Agreement)

95. Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in implementing the cultural agreement negotiated with the Soviet Union in 1987.

Mr. Waldegrave: Since the memorandum of understanding (MOU) was signed in 1987, there has been a considerable increase in the number of bilateral exchanges, both official and unofficial, in the educational, cultural and information fields. A number of protocols have also been signed, for example, on school exchanges and broadcasting, specifically implementing provisions in the MOU.

The first two in the series of annual Anglo-Soviet lectures by distinguished figures have taken place. A Soviet week was held in Birmingham in October this year and a British week is planned in Kiev in 1990.

EC Internal Market

96. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom will continue to refuse to support a social dimension for the internal market of the European Community.

Mrs. Chalker: We will continue to support EC social measures designed to stimulate job creation and reduce unemployment. We shall resist those which would impose excessive regulatory burdens on business and thus run counter to job creation. As EC Heads of Government agreed at Hanover, completion of the single market will help counter the Community's main social problem, unemployment.

Baltic States

101. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received concerning political developments in the Baltic states.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are following developments in the former Baltic states closely and sympathetically. We receive reports on them from a wide range of sources.

111. Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom representative at the United Nations meets with the representatives of the Baltic states.

Mr. Waldegrave: The former Baltic states, unlike the Ukraine and Byelorussia, are not separately represented at the United Nations.

Esquipulas II Agreement

103. Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of the United States of America in connection with the progress of the Esquipulas II agreement.

109. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of the United States of America in connection with the progress of the Esquipulas II agreement.

Mr. Eggar: We have regular discussions with the United States Administration on a wide range of issues, including the progress of the Esquipulas II agreement.

Cuba

104. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with Cuba.

Mr. Eggar: We have normal diplomatic relations with Cuba.

Mr. Adolpho Calero

105. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what date the leader of the Contras, Mr. Adolpho Calero, was received at his Department; and which Ministers and officials he met.

Mr. Eggar: At his own request, Dr. Calero called on the head of Mexico and Central American Department on 10 October. He had no meetings with Ministers.

European Single Market

106. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further meetings he intends to hold with European Economic Community Ministers with regard to the establishment of the single market in 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We have frequent meetings on EC affairs, including the single market, with our opposite numbers in other member states. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State regularly takes the opportunity of stressing the importance we attach to opening up the European market in 1992.

EFTA-EC Relations

110. Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about European Economic Community-European Free Trade Association relations.

Mrs. Chalker: EC/EFTA relations are excellent. Collectively the EC and EFTA are each other's most important trading partners. We fully support the efforts being made to build on the solid base of the EC's free trade agreements with individual EFTA states to develop and extend EC/EFTA relations further, in parallel with the completion of the single market.

I had a most useful meeting on the issues with EFTA ambassadors yesterday.

Arms Control

113. Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what policy initiatives his Department intends to pursue to meet the arms control objectives set out in the Gracious Speech.

Mr. Waldegrave: Together with other members of the Western Alliance we shall continue to work for the full range of arms control objectives set out in the Gracious Speech. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to one recent policy initiative—the presentation by the NATO Allies last week of facts and figures on the balance of conventional forces in Europe. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Falklands

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current talks with Argentina on the future of the Falklands.

Mr. Eggar: There are no "direct talks" with Argentina on the future of the Falklands. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State explained to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), the Argentine Foreign Minister, who is currently Chairman of the United Nations General Assembly, has asked to see our permanent representative to the United Nations, Sir Crispin Tickell.

South Georgia

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to extend the territorial limits of South Georgia and declare an exclusive economic zone.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no plans to do so. Waters around South Georgia are subject to the provisions of the convention for the conservation of Antarctic marine living resources, in which we play an active role. The renewable resources assessment group at Imperial college is studying the fishery resources of the area on behalf of the South Georgia Government.

Exit Visas

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise with Mr. Gorbachev and Mr. Shevardnadze the cases of Uri Chernyak and Boris Livshitz, both waiting 10 years for an exist visa.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes.

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in the light of the deliberate extermination of black Sudanese Christians and the enslavement of their children in the Muslim North, Her Majesty's Government has taken steps to ensure that the Sudanese Government desists from such policies.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have told the Sudanese authorities on a number of occasions of our deep concern at reported atrocities and human rights abuses in Sudan.

Algeria (Riots)

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government has made to the Algerian authorities in the aftermath of their crushing of civilian riots in October.

Mr. Waldegrave: This was one of the subjects discussed when the Algerian ambassador paid his introductory calls in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 12 October.

Refusniks

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise with the Soviet authorities the situation of second generation refusniks, Alex Lein and Dima Chernyak.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes.

Visa Applications

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the number of visa applications made at each High Commission from 1985 to 30 June 1988 and the number of refusals in each case.

Mr. Eggar: The number of applications made are not available.

The numbers of entry clearances for the United Kingdom issued at high commissions in 1985, 1986 and 1987 are as listed. The numbers of refusals are available only for 1987. Statistics for 1988 are not yet available.

Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on initiatives currently planned by Her Majesty's Government in preparation for the 1990 nuclear non-proliferation treaty review conference.

Mr. Waldegrave: We intend to play an active role in the 1990 review conference of the non-proliferation treaty and in the preparations for it. With our co-depositary powers and other parties to the treaty we co-sponsored the United Nations resolution notifying the Secretary-General that the conference will take place. The parties have established a preparatory committee for the conference and we are in the process of discussing practical arrangements with other treaty partners.

We have informed the United Nations Secretariat that the United Kingdom is prepared to make an advance payment in the first quarter of 1989 of £100,000, a sum equivalent to virtually the whole of the estimated final proportion of the costs of the conference to be borne by this country. We have appealed to other parties to the treaty to consider making similar advance payments.

Nuclear Safeguards

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any request has been received by his Department to submit evidence on the implementation of nuclear safeguards in the European Economic Community before the Bundestag special inquiry commission on nuclear materials oversight, held in the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to arrange a meeting with the European proliferation information centre to discuss and evaluate recent reports and publications asserting problems in international nuclear safeguards implementation.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Entry Applications

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for each country (a) the number of applications for entry to the United Kingdom (b) the number of refusals and (c) the number of appeals made (i) successfully and (ii) unsuccessfully in each of the last two years.

Mr. Eggar: Figures relating to entry clearances issued for 1986 and 1987 are as follows. Numbers of total applications made are not available. Statistics of applicants refused in individual countries have been kept only since January 1987. Details of appeals are not recorded centrally by individual nationality in all cases but Commands 166 and 415, "Control of Immigration Statistics," at table 5, give a limited breakdown of the numbers of appeals allowed, dismissed and withdrawn for the years 1986 and 1987 respectively.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Eggar: I refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply on Tuesday 29 November at column 178. My Department has no plans to seek removal of Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

Political Prisoners (Iran)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Government of Iran concerning the recent spate of executions of political prisoners.

Mr. Waldegrave: The reports of executions are a matter of concern to the Government. We have consistently condemned such violations of human rights in Iran. We look to the Iranian authorities to co-operate with the United Nations special representative so that he can investigate these and other allegations of human rights abuses.

Pakistan Foreign Minister

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to meet the new Foreign Minister of Pakistan.

Mr. Eggar: When a new Foreign Minister of Pakistan is appointed, my right hon. and learned Friend hopes to have an early opportunity to meet him or her.

Environment (International Action)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to promote and co-ordinate international action to conserve the environment.

Mr. Eggar: We are in close touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment who has the primary responsibility for international action on environmental issues.

Written Answers to Questions

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Turkey (Kurdish Refugees)

Mr. George Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much aid has been provided by Her Majesty's Government to Turkey to assist in dealing with Kurdish refugees from Iraq.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on 25 November, at column 14.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk

11. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has received representations from consumer organisations about the future of milk production in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: From time to time I receive representations from consumers organisations on a wide range of subjects. For example, my right hon. Friend the Minister recently met the National Consumer Council to discuss its views on a range of agricultural issues.

Food Poisoning

12. Mr. Ashley: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what new measures he is proposing to reduce food poisoning.

Mr. Ryder: The Government have a long established system for reducing food poisoning. This involves a close working relationship between several Government Departments, and in particular close links between the Department of Health and ourselves.

For example, the State Veterinary Service monitors infections in animals. Controls are designed to cure the spread of infection in animals, animal products and animal protein used in feeding-stuffs. And detailed statutory requirements exist for the hygienic production of meat.

Early in the new year, we plan to launch, with the Department of Health, a major national campaign aimed at reminding, and educating, the public about the importance of maintaining good food hygiene practices to prevent food poisoning.

Wool Board

13. Mr. Waller: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what response he has received to his statement that the British Wool Marketing Board will remain in its present form.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My right hon. Friend and I have received a favourable response from the farming industry, and from the board itself, to the continued operation of the British Wool Marketing Board.

50. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what response he has received from the National Farmers Union and the chairman of the Wool Board to his recent statement on the British Wool Marketing Board's future role.

Mr. MacGregor: The president of the National Farmers Union and the chairman of the British Wool Marketing Board have both welcomed the continued operation of the statutory marketing arrangements for wool.

Set-aside Scheme

14. Mr. Mans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he has taken to ensure that the rules contained within the set-aside scheme will protect the local environment.

Mr. Ryder: In framing the rules of the scheme, my right hon. Friends and I took full account of the need to ensure that set-aside took full account of the environment. The detailed rules for the management of fallow land are outlined in the scheme documents, which also give advice on how set-aside can be used to maintain and improve environmental features such as hedgerows, shelterbelts and bridleways.

23. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest figures on registration for the set-aside scheme.

Mr. MacGregor: About 2,000 farmers in the United Kingdom have applied for set-aside, representing about 150,000 acres of land to be taken out of arable production in this crop year. About 24,000 further farmers have registered their arable land so that they are in a position to apply for set-aside in the future without needing independent evidence of their 1987-88 cropping pattern.

59. Mr. David Davis: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to make the set-aside scheme compulsory.

Mr. Ryder: No.

55. Mr. Latham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make a statement on the progress of the set-aside scheme.

61. Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the take-up so far of his Department's set-aside policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Member to the answer that I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens).

Potatoes

15. Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to impose regulations governing the maximum residue level of pesticides, fungicides and sprout inhibitors allowable in potatoes, in line with United Nations regulations.

Mr. Ryder: The Government have introduced statutory residue limits for potatoes under the Pesticides (Maximum Levels in Food) Regulations for 36 pesticide active ingredients covering all the main classes of pesticide use. There are a limited number of recommendations in this field from the Codex Alimentarius Commission, but no United Nations regulations.

Forestry Commission

16. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next expects to meet the chairman of the Forestry Commission; and what matters will be discussed.

Mr. MacGregor: I meet the chairman of the Forestry Commission regularly. No meeting is planned for the immediate future.

Transport and General Workers' Union

17. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to meet representatives of the agricultural and allied workers trade group of the Transport and General Workers' Union.

Mr. Ryder: I have no plans to do so at present.

Countryside Commission

18. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next expects to meet the chairman of the Countryside Commission; and what matters will be discussed.

Mr. Ryder: I met the chairman of the Countryside Commission on 7 November when we discussed many issues of concern to the countryside. I have no immediate plans for another meeting but remain ready to discuss with him any matters of mutual concern.

"Farmers Guide to the Planning System"

19. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when his Department's document "The Farmers Guide to the Planning System" will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I hope that this guide, which my Department is preparing in association with the Department of the Environment and the Welsh Office, will be published in January.

British Veterinary Association

20. Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any plans to meet the British Veterinary Association.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have no plans to meet the BVA at present but my officials are in frequent contact with it.

Common Agricultural Policy

21. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimated cost to Britain of the common agricultural policy in 1989-90.

Mr. MacGregor: The latest forecast of public expenditure in the United Kingdom under the common agricultural policy in 1989-90 is £1,467 million. This covers all expenditure under Community market support and structural aid schemes for agriculture and fisheries but excludes related expenditure such as disease prevention, advice, research and development, land drainage and administration.

The United Kingdom Government also support spending under the common agricultural policy elsewhere in the Community through our net contribution to the European Community budget, which in 1989-90 is estimated at £1,970 million. Over that period it is expected that more than 60 per cent. of the European Community budget will be spent on the common agricultural policy.

33. Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next plans to meet other European Community Agriculture Ministers to discuss the common agricultural policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I expect to meet other Agriculture Ministers in the Council of Ministers in the Council starting on 12 December.

37. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what initiatives he plans to take to implement the proposals for the reform of the common agricultural policy as outlined in the Gracious Speech; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I am consistently endeavouring to ensure that the reforms established by the European Council in February and the price negotiations in July are carried out and to maintain the impetus at all appropriate times

53. Mr. Kirkhope: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will indicate the positive results achieved by reforms of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. MacGregor: European Community stocks of most commodities have fallen significantly. Butter stocks are down 80 per cent. over the last year and skimmed milk powder stocks virtually eliminated. Stabilisers are cutting support levels, where production has exceeded the agreed threshold for cereals, oilseeds, olive oil, protein crops, cotton and sheep. The common agricultural policy is being effectively managed, within the guidelines, under the new budgetary discipline rules.

Monetary Compensatory Amounts

22. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress is being made by the European Community towards the abolition of monetary compensatory amounts by 1992.

Mr. MacGregor: The United Kingdom has made it clear that we regard it as essential to abolish monetary gaps by 1992 if we are to achieve the benefits of a single market in agriculture. With this objective, the Council with our strong support and pressure in 1987 agreed to a mechanism to dismantle newly-created monetary gaps in stages following each EMS realignment; and in July 1988 that the existing fixed monetary gaps should be eliminated in four stages by 1992. The Commission is to report on how to remove variable monetary gaps and solve the other transitional problems which will arise.

Agricultural Budget (EC)

24. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reduction in the spending of the European Community has arisen from savings on the agricultural budget as a result of decisions by the European Council in or since December 1986.

Mr. MacGregor: Decisions taken in December 1986 and since to reduce Community spending on agriculture have been estimated by the Commission to have saved about 2·7 becu, or about £1,840 million by the end of 1988.

Beans

25. Mr. Hind: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest estimates for the amount of beans harvested in 1988.

Mr. Ryder: Our estimate of the 1988 United Kingdom field bean crop, passed to the Commission in late August for purposes of forecasting Community production, was 512,000 tonnes. Latest trade estimates suggest that production may be higher than this.

An official estimate of the United Kingdom crop will be given in "Agriculture in the UK 1988" to be published early in the new year.

Animal Foodstuffs (Chemicals)

26. Mr. Ward: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what monitoring takes place of requests by individual farmers for animal food suppliers to add chemical substances to animal foodstuffs.

Mr. Donald Thompson: All sales of animal feedingstuffs have to meet the requirements of the Feedingstuffs Regulations 1988. Where medicinal substances have been used, the feed must also comply with the Medicine (Medicated Animal Feedingstuffs) Regulations 1988. Samples of feedingstuffs are taken by trading standards officers for analysis. In the case of medicinal substances, there is also enforcement of the controls by the Royal Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain.

Fisheries (Devon and Cornwall)

27. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the Devon and Cornwall fisheries development group with regard to the Cornish fishing industry past 1992.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I visited the group in Plymouth on 9 November. We had a full presentation and stimulating discussions of its plans and aims for the future.

Nitrates

28. Mrs. Gillian Shephard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what effect the proposed restrictions to deal with the problem of nitrates will have on farmers; and if he will make a statement.

29. Mr. Harris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what effect the Government's response to the problem of high nitrates levels in water will have on farming practices.

30. Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how farmers will be compensated for loss of crop yield if they reduce the use of nitrate-based fertilisers.

68. Ms. Quin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any proposals to further restrict the use of nitrogen fertilisers in British agriculture.

69. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further action he proposes to take to help farmers deal with the problems caused by nitrogen leaching from the soil.

Mr. Ryder: I refer my hon. Friends and the hon. Member to the reply given on 24 November to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris).

Research and Development

31. Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the future funding of agricultural research and development expenditure.

Mr. Ryder: My Department's examination of its research and development programme took place against the objectives outlined in the July 1987 White Paper on civil research and development (Cm 185) and the Government's view that research which offers the prospect of commercial application or exploitation within a reasonable time scale is appropriate for funding by the industry. As announced in the Autumn Statement, funding for near market R and D has been reduced by £5 million for 1990-91 and £14 million for 1991-92. Together with the reduction announced last year this is equivalent to a reduction in 1991-92 of £30 million at full economic cost. Final decisions on the future level of Government funding will not be made until after consultations with industry have been completed.

54. Mr. Darling: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with the agricultural industry about the future of research and development in agriculture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Following earlier discussions I had with the industry, my noble friend the Parliamentary Secretary has held meetings with all sectors of the agricultural horticultural and food industries to discuss the fututre funding of near market research and development following the completion of the Barnes review. More detailed consultations with the industry have taken place with officials from my Department. Industry organisations were asked to give their considered response by the end of October and these are now being studied.

56. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the likely future contributions of the agricultural industry towards research and development; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: No such assessment has yet been made. We are currently examining industry's considered responses and consultations are continuing.

Waste

32. Mr. Franks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to review the grant system to upland-lowland farmers for waste handling facilities.

Mr. MacGregor: As I announced on 28 November a major feature of the new capital grant scheme that I hope to introduce in February will be improved aid for waste storage, treatment and disposal. We have made provision of up to £50 million over the next three years to allow for improved lowland grant rates and for the extension of eligibility to include fixed disposal piping and safety fencing.

Cereals

34. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the 1988 United Kingdom cereals harvest.

Mr. Ryder: My Department currently estimates the 1988 cereals harvest in the United Kingdom to be 21·0 million tonnes.

48. Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the latest estimates for the 1988 cereal harvest.

Mr. Ryder: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh).

Sheepmeat

35. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on what progress has been made in the European sheepmeat regime negotiations.

42. Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any plans to review the operation of the sheepmeat regime; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Country Landowners Association

36. Mr. Ashby: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the president of the Country Landowners Association; and what was discussed.

Mr. Ryder: I last met the president of the Country Landowners Association on 4 November when I spoke at the CLA conference on set-aside. We discussed set-aside.

Milk Marketing Board

38. Mr. Knox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he is next due to meet the chairman of the Milk Marketing Board to discuss the dairy sector.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next expects to meet with the chairman of the Milk Marketing Board; and what will be discussed.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My right hon. Friend the Minister and I have regular contacts with the chairman of the Milk Marketing Board to discuss various issues affecting the dairy industry.

Marine Mammals

39. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any proposals to monitor the incidental capture of marine mammals by commercial fishing vessels; and if he will make a statement.

57. Mr. McLeish: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department has recently held discussions with fishermen's organisations regarding the phenomenon of the incidental capture of marine mammals.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion).

Sheep Premium

40. Mr. Rogers: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with European Community agriculture Ministers about the future of the sheep variable premium scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The Council of Ministers (Agriculture) has twice considered the proposals for a review of the sheepmeat regime tabled by the European Commission. These proposals include one to phase out the variable premium. Negotiations are as yet at an early stage.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

41. Mr. Hicks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will increase the level of compensation to 100 per cent. for confirmed cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy affected cattle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I believe that the existing compensation rate of 50 per cent. of market value is fair, given that the animals are suffering from a terminal illness but are valued as if unaffected by the disease.

66. Mr. George Howarth To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy have been identified to date; in which counties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave on 28 November and which appears in the Official Report at columns 97-98.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will outline the procedures for the disposal of carcases of cows infected with bovine spongiform encephalopathy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The disposal of carcases of cattle suspected of being affected with bovine spongiform encephalopathy is the responsibility of the Ministry's State Veterinary Service. It ensures that transportation, which is prohibited except under licence, and incineration or burial is carried out in accordance with strict animal health conditions.

Employment

43. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has assessed the implications of his agricultural policies on employment in the countryside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: The encouragement of rural employment is one of the main features of the Government's strategy for the countryside. Within that strategy, the aim of our agricultural policies is to assist the farming industry to adapt to changing market forces, while encouraging farmers to develop new initiatives which should provide opportunities for rural employment.

Bovine Somatatropin

44. Mr. Clelland: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will outline his plans for the future of research into bovine somatatropin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department's programmes of research are kept under continuous review and this includes the need for research into bovine somatotropin, particularly in respect of public interest issues such as animal welfare.

Most research into bovine somatotropin is undertaken or commissioned by the veterinary pharmaceutical industry. My Department has been funding a small study on dairy cow nutrition in which bovine somatotropin has featured and this is part of the work offered for industry funding following the review of near market R and D.

Small Farmers Association

45. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will next be meeting representatives of the Small Farmers Association; and what he proposes to discuss.

Mr. Ryder: I have no specific plans to do so at present, though I have frequent contact with all sections of the farming community.

Torrey Research Centre

46. Mr. Doran: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he plans to visit the Torrey research centre in Aberdeen in the near future.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My right hon. Friend has no plans to visit Torrey research station in the near future. I visited it in August with the hon. Members for Aberdeen South (Mr. Doran) and for South Shields (Dr. Clark).

Pesticides

47. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will outline his plans for the future of pesticides research; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: The crop protection R and D commission, upon which my Department spent around £8 million in 1987-88, is under review at present. The research consultative committee's report on invertebrate pests, diseases and weeds in growing crops was published in May 1987 and a report on the protection of stored and growing crops is expected to be published around the end of this year. Much of the work is of a public good nature and thus unlikely to be significantly affected by the current review of near market research.

Research Budget

49. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement in the cut of £31·5 million in the agricultural research budget.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker).

Sheep

51. Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met representatives of the farming unions to discuss the support system for the sheep industry.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I continue to maintain regular contacts with the farming unions and their representatives on matters relating to the sheep sector.

Green Pound

52. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to press for further devaluation of the green pound.

Mr. McGregor: The Council and Commission have now agreed that monetary gaps should be phased out as part of the completion of the internal market, an objective that United Kingdom Ministers have persistently pressed for. The next step in this process is likely to be decided in the 1989 price fixing.

EC (Discussions)

58. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next plans to meet his European Economic Community counterparts; and what issues he will be discussing.

Mr. McGregor: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given today to the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith).

Tributyltin (Fish)

60. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is in a position to assess the reduction of concentrations of tributyltin in fish in inshore waters following the ban of the sale and use of this anti-foulant in 1987.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Over the last year, levels of tributyltin in shellfish have fallen by more than two-thirds in the Crouch estuary and by over half in other estuaries monitored in England. Juvenile oysters are already showing good growth in these waters and new growth is also clearly detectable in oysters previously affected in the Crouch.

Expenditure

62. Mr. Marland: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how the savings on planned expenditure outlined in the Autumn Statement will benefit farmers, taxpayers and consumers.

Mr. MacGregor: The Autumn Statement shows savings over previous plans for agriculture of £1,080 million during the three years 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91. These stem partly from external factors, such as the United States drought which reduced the cost of export subsidies, and partly from internal economies following recent wide-ranging reforms to the common agricultural policy.

I have always said that a common agricultural policy that was running the risk of being out of control was not in the interest of farmers and was no balance for future stability in agriculture. These reforms have brought the European Community budget under control and led to a significant reduction in the level of intervened stocks which were overhanging Community and world markets and depressing prices. Therefore farmers now have a firmer and more stable base for planning their future.

Taxpayers—including farmers—will benefit from these savings because they have improved the value for money of Government spending and have helped the Government to increase the provision for priority programmes while keeping public expenditure as a proportion of national income on a declining trend. They also enhance the scope for reducing taxation when it is prudent to do so.

These savings in themselves will not have any marked impact on consumers.

Greenhouse Effect

63. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will indicate the level by which the seas around Britain could rise if nothing is done about the greenhouse effect; and what effect this would have on the adequacy of the United Kingdom's sea defences.

Mr. Ryder: There are a wide range of predictions about the rise in mean sea level that could take place, but given the many uncertainties it is not realistic to make firm assessments of the implications for our sea defences.

We are monitoring the position carefully and will take account of the results of current research programmes as they become available.

Fisheries Ministers

64. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last attended a meeting of the European Community's Fisheries Ministers council; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) on 29 November.

Women's Farmers Union

65. Mr. Day: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next expects to meet the chairman of the Women's Farming Union.

Mr. MacGregor: I met the chairman of the Women's Farming Union most recently at the annual general meeting of the Women's Farming Union on 23 November.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

67. Mr. Patnick: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to publish a report on existing environmentally sensitive area arrangements and how they are working.

Mr. Ryder: Yes. I expect to publish a report on environmentally sensitive areas, as required by section 18(8) of the Agriculture Act 1986, early next year.

GATT

70. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the United States Secretary of State for Agriculture to discuss the general agreement on tariffs and trade mid-term review.

Mr. MacGregor: I last met Secretary Lyng in London on 17 November. We discussed a number of topics, including the GATT mid-term meeting.

71. Mr. Amos: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he proposes to attend the general agreement on tariffs and trade mid-term review in Montreal, in view of agriculture featuring in the negotiations.

Mr. MacGregor: Yes.

Food Surpluses

72. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the disposal of European Economic Community food surpluses.

Mr. Ryder: Economic Community stocks of most commodities have fallen significantly. Butter stocks are down 80 per cent. over last year and skimmed milk powder stocks virtually eliminated. Wheat stocks have fallen by two thirds since 1985 while beef stocks have fallen by 25 per cent. over the last year.

Land Development

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many consultations with local planning authorities for non-agricultural development on agricultural land not in accordance with the development plan were received in the first six months of 1988; what was the Ministry's response to these consultations and what area they covered for each grade and subgrade of land, as defined by the agricultural land classification.

Mr. Ryder: From our records it is not possible to identify solely those consultations for non-agricultural development which were not in accordance with the development plan.

Latest figures for the first six months of 1988 indicate that MAFF/WOAD responded to some 690 consultations from local planning authorities in England and Wales relating to individual planning applications for non-agricultural development. Those responses involved 17 objections, six conditional objections, 100 conditional acceptances, 284 appraisals, 231 no objections and 52 cases which were either withdrawn or the referral was inappropriate. The grades of agricultural land and areas involved were 232 hectares of grade 1, 999 hectares of grade 2, 1,514 hectares of grade 3 (not subdivided), 2,097 hectares of grade 3a, 2,423 hectares of grade 3b, 1,247 hectares of grade 3c, 779 hectares of grade 4 and 147 hectares of grade 5.

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries of Food what proportion of consultations with local planning authorities for non-agricultural development on agricultural land not in accordance with the development plan are (a) in respect of an area of agricultural land in excess of 20 hectares and (b) in respect of agricultural land of grades 1, 2 or 3a, as defined by the agricultural land classification.

Mr. Ryder: From our records it is not possible to identify solely those consultations for non-agricultural development which were not in accordance with the development plan.

In 1987 some 17 per cent. of the consultations by planning authorities in England and Wales related to areas of agricultural land in excess of 20 hectares and some 28 per cent. related to grades 1, 2 or 3a agricultural land.

North Sea (Fishing)

Mr. Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure fishing is practicable in the North sea once gas and oil installations are abandoned.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The Government have taken the necessary powers in the Petroleum Act 1987 to control the abandonment of oil and gas installations. The fishing industry is being consulted on the measures to be included in abandonment programmes; it will also be consulted by the operators in the compilation of abandonment programmes for individual installations, and by Government after such programmes have been submitted to them. I shall certainly ensure that the interests of fishermen are taken fully into account before final decisions on each programme are taken.

Mr. Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with the fishing industry over proposed air combat training ranges in the North sea; and when he expects to make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department has consulted the fishing industry over a proposal to construct an air combat training range in the North sea. The industry's views will be taken fully into account when the Government decide whether the construction of the range can be approved.

Radioactivity (Cumbria)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will outline his reasons for giving information to farmers about the aerial survey into post-Chernobyl radioactivity at a meeting of representatives of the National Farmers Union in Carlisle on 23 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: It is our policy to keep restricted area farmers and their representatives fully informed of our programme of monitoring and research. The 23 November meeting was arranged so that my officials could provide a further progress report on our 1988 activities, including the aerial survey.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the results of the aerial survey into post-Chernobyl radioactivity levels in Cumbria; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member on 28 November, Official Report, col. 100.

Hill and Upland Areas

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he and his right hon. Friends have completed their review of the economic conditions in the hill and upland areas; and if he will make a statement on the rates of hill livestock compensatory allowances and associated scheme conditions for 1989.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friends and I have now completed the annual review of the economic conditions in the hills and uplands.

The review has shown that the average net farm incomes of livestock producers in the United Kingdom's less favoured areas have improved over the last two years, in some cases considerably. This situation owes much to the Government's support measures, including hill livestock compensatory allowances which are likely to top £115 million this year. We recognise that the support provided through HLCAs is of fundamental importance in maintaining the hill and upland communities and in providing environmental benefits, and we shall continue to give particular assistance to farmers in the LFAs. However, against the generally improving economic background in the LFAs, my colleagues and I have decided that the rates of hill livestock compensatory allowance for 1989 should remain at the current levels and that there should be no change in the associated conditions.

My colleagues and I know that many LFA producers are concerned about the impact on them of the proposed changes in the EC sheepmeat and beef regimes. We understand these concerns and, while we cannot predict the outcome of the current EC negotiations, we shall certainly have the special interests of the LFA livestock sector very much in mind in these negotiations.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

British Council (Arts)

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the annual expenditure on the arts by the British Council, showing the art form and regional distribution, for each year since 1978.

Mr. Waldegrave: Reliable figures are not available for the years before 1984-85 and are not broken down by geographical area. Recent figures showing British Council annual expenditure on the arts are as follows:

British Council annual expenditure on the Arts

Hong Kong (Vietnamese Refugees)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have taken place with the Hong Kong Government in an effort to help resettle the Vietnamese boat people now being cared for by the Hong Kong Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are in close and frequent contact with the Hong Kong Government on all aspects of the Vietnamese boat people problem, including resettlement.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement of forthcoming business in the European Council of Ministers.

Mrs. Chalker: The usual forecast was deposited in the House earlier today. At present 14 meetings of the Council of Ministers are planned for December. There may also be a Telecomunications Council on 12 December, but this is yet to be confirmed by the Presidency.

The European Council, to be held on 2-3 December at Rhodes, will discuss the further development of the Community with particular reference to the Commission's report on progress towards completion of the single market, submitted under article 8b of the treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act. It will also discuss the Community's role in the world and the Environment. Political co-operation subjects will also be covered.

The Transport Council is to meet on 8-9 December. Subjects for discussion include transport infrastructure; vehicle weights and dimensions; access to the road haulage profession; international bus and coach transport; barge shipping on inland waterways; shipping; air congestion; aids for combined transport; road haulage cabotage; vehicle taxation; possibly inter-regional air services; and third country transit, where it is hoped agreement to the second stage negotiating mandate can be reached.

The Fisheries Council will meet on 9-11 December to discuss the 1989 total allowable catches and quotas; relations with third countries; and possibly fish guide prices.

The Economic and Finance Council will meet on 12 December to consider the draft directive on the own funds of credit institutions; the Commission's annual report on the economic situation in the Community: and the Commission proposal for a regulation implementing the decision of 24 June 1988 on the system of the Communities' own resources. It will also discuss a statement by Lord Cockfield on the Commission's tax approximation proposals; proposed new regulations on uniform arrangements for the collection of own resources; possible Danish derogation from article 4(i) of Council directive 69/169; and the directive on the prospectus on transferable securities.

The Agriculture Council meets on 12 December and following days to discuss the reform of the beef and sheepmeat regimes; access to the Community for New Zealand butter; milk quotas; labelling of spirit drinks; income aids; beef import quotas; trade in minced meat and meat products; and zootechnical breeding standards in pigs. It may also consider tariff concessions on horticultural produce from the Canary Islands.

The Industry Council meets on 13 December. Ministers will consider an Italian proposal to grant 7,670 billion lire of aid to the Italian public sector steel industry to finance its restructuring. Proposals are also likely to be discussed on the renewal of the ECSC steel state aid code and on the funding of social measures for the steel industry.

The Tourism Council, meeting on 14 December, is expected to discuss a proposal that 1990 should be designated European Year of Tourism; a Commission working paper on priorities for future action in the tourism field; the draft package travel directive and EC co-ordination on the chairmanship of the OECD Tourism Committee.

The Health Council is to meet on 15 December. It will consider a report on Europe against cancer; tobacco; AIDS; drugs; and health aspects up to 1992.

The Research Council will meet on 15 December. The agenda is likely to include discussion of two-research and development programme proposals: JOULE (non-nuclear energy and efficient use of energy) and BRITE/EURAM (research in manufacturing technologies and advanced materials). Aeronautical research and a Commission paper on the state of EC science will also be discussed.

The Social Affairs Council meets on 16 December to discuss the social dimension of the internal market. Other subjects for discussion will be for health and safety proposals (the framework directive on safety in the workplace and the worker protection directives on carcinogens, benzene and limits on exposure to hazards), a directive to change the burden of proof in equal treatment legislation, and a decision on a second COMETT programme for co-operation between universities and industry in new technology training. Other items on the agenda include resolutions on the integration of women, racism, xenophobia and decisions on social measures for Greece and for shipbuilding areas.

The Foreign Affairs Council will meet on 19-20 December. Subjects for discussion will be: follow-up to the European Council; structural funds; the progress of EC/US discussions on hormones; and financial protocols with Cyprus and Malta. In the margins, there will be a conference of representatives of member states on the Rome convention on contractual obligations and signature of the trade agreement with Czechoslovakia. Ministers will possibly also convene a conference of member states, formally to appoint the new Commission and its vice presidents.

The Internal Market Council on 21 December will discuss a number of measures relevant to the completion of the single market.

Robert Heron Blaggogee

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Minister of State intends to reply to the letter of 13 October sent to her by Sir Trevor Jones of Liverpool concerning Mr. Robert Heron Blaggogee.

Mrs. Chalker: I replied on 24 November 1988.

Antarctica

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy towards (a) non-governmental visits to the Antarctic and (b) proposed tourist developments within the Antarctic by other nations.

Mr. Waldegrave: The preamble to the Antarctic treaty calls for Antarctica to be used "exclusively for peaceful purposes". In our view, non-governmental visits and tourist developments in Antarctica fall into this category. We therefore do not object to them, as long as they comply with the relevant provisions of the Antarctic treaty, and measures adopted under it.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect of the proposed change from consensus decision to majority voting in 1991 on the future operation of the Antarctic treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: Any proposed amendment to the Antarctic treaty approved by majority vote at a conference convened under article XII of the treaty would need to be ratified by all Antarctic treaty consultative parties in order for it to enter into force. We do not, therefore, believe that majority voting at such a conference is likely to have a crucial effect on the future of the treaty.

Guatemala (Gunboat Incident)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of Guatemala, following an incident involving a Royal Navy ship and a Guatemalan gunboat in Guatemalan waters on 20 November 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: At the time of the incident the RN vessel HMS Fawn was carrying out peaceful and legitimate hydrographic survey work in the high seas in the Gulf of Honduras. A protest has accordingly been made to the Guatemalan Government. The Royal Navy's survey work in the area will continue.

Mrs. Doina Cornea

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any information about a former lecturer at Cluj university, Romania, Mrs. Doina Cornea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Mrs. Cornea was arrested, along with other Romanian dissidents, in a crackdown following a demonstration in the Romanian city of Brasov last December. Those arrests formed the subject of a demarche by the Twelve to the Romanian authorities, in January this year. Her Majesty's ambassador and his staff have since made further representations, most recently on 22 November. We shall continue to speak up on her behalf.

Mrs. Cornea apparently remains under some form of house arrest. Members of the House may have seen the courageous and moving letter that she recently published in the British press, calling on President Ceausescu to abandon his policy of forced urban and rural resettlement.

We deplore arbitrary arrests and confinement of people for expressing their opinions. Romania's record in this respect is among the worst of all the signatories of the Helsinki Final Act and Madrid concluding document. We look to the Romanian Government, as to all participants in the CSCE process, to observe in full their commitments under these documents.

SCOTLAND

Health Boards

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number of management staff in each area health board in Scotland that have explicit terms in their contracts of employment which increase remunerations when budgetary savings are realised.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Departmental guidance on contracts for NHS general and senior managers does not refer to a condition of service such as described by the hon. Member. Terms of contract are a matter to be agreed between individual staff and their employing health board.

NHS (Competitive Tendering)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all contracts for domestic services let by competitive tendering to outside operators within each of the regional health authorities in Scotland, together with their costs, for the period 1 October 1985 to 30 September 1988, showing in each case the cost of provision of the same services in the last year before competitive tendering was introduced.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: During this period contracts producing annual savings of over £2 million were awarded by the following boards:

	Number
Fife	1
Grampian	2
Greater Glasgow	3
Lothian	2
Tayside	1

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what instructions he has given to health boards concerning putting out annually services as an all-in package to competitive tendering.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None. Health boards know they must explore the scope for achieving value for money and improved services through the further development of competitive tendering. This is what they are now doing.

EC Structural Funds

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the areas of Scotland which will satisfy the criteria laid down, by the comprehensive regulations in the reform of the Community's structural funds approved by the Council of Ministers on 24 June 1988, for each of the following objectives: (a) to improve investment and productivity in deprived regions, (b) to rejuvenate declining industrial regions including urban areas, (c) to combat long-term unemployment which is affecting all age groups of the community's working population, (d) to integrate young people into employment, and (e) to encourage rural development as part of the reform of the common agricultural policy by (i) speeding up the adjustment of agricultural structure and (ii) promoting the development of rural areas;

(2) if he will make a statement on the impact of the Council of Ministers adoption of the comprehensive regulation of the reform of the Community's structural funds agreed on 24 June 1988 (2052/88);

(3) if he will list the areas of Scotland which will be eligible to receive moneys from (a) the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund, (b) the European social fund and (c) the European regional development fund, after the adoption, by the Council of Ministers, of the comprehensive regulation of the reform of the Communities structural funds on 24 June 1988 (2052/88).

Mr. Lang: The full implications of Council regulation EEC 2052/88 for Scotland will not be clear until the implementing regulations are adopted and the European Commission has made its decisions under the regulations on the eligibility of industrial (objective 2) regions and rural (objective 5 (b)) regions and on financial support. No Scottish region is eligible under objective 1 of article 1 of the regulation, whereas objectives 3, 4 and 5(a) may be applied throughout the Community.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the agencies or organisations which have submitted representations about the reform of the Community's structural funds.

Mr. Lang: Representations have been received by various Ministers and their Departments with an interest in the structural funds reform. Several have come from local authorities concerned about their future eligibility for assistance. No central record of representations is kept.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to ensure that the Scottish dimension has been fully considered in discussions on the reform of the Community's structural funds.

Mr. Lang: The Scottish Office plays a full part in determining United Kingdom policy on the reform of the structural funds.

Health Centres (VAT)

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps will be taken to reimburse general practitioners following the introduction of value added tax on new health centre buildings.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: It is proposed to amend the statement of fees and allowances payable to general medical practitioners to take account of the imposition of value added tax on new building work from 1 April 1989. Consultations are at present taking place with representatives of the medical profession.

EC (Regional Assistance)

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the geographical areas or functions in Scotland which are eligible for moneys from (a) the European regional development fund, (b) social fund, (c) agricultural guidance and guarantee funds and (d) the European Investment Bank.

Mr. Lang: The following areas are eligible:

(a) European regional development fund—
All of the Highlands and Islands Development Board area.
The travel-to-work areas of Dumbarton, Greenock, Irvine, Glasgow, Kilmarnock, Lanarkshire, Cumnock and Sanquhar, Ayr, Girvan, Stranraer, Newton Stewart, Stewartry, Dundee, Arbroath, Falkirk, Alloa, Dunfermline, Kirkcaldy, Bathgate.

(b) European social fund—
Some operations apply to the whole of Scotland; others are currently limited to Central, Dumfries and Galloway, Fife, Highlands, Lothian, Strathclyde and Tayside.

(c) Agricultural guidance and guarantee funds—
All of Scotland.

(d) European Investment Bank—
All of Scotland.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total amount of loans made to Scotland by the European Investment Bank in each of the years 1983 to 1987 inclusive.

Mr. Lang: Loans are negotiated directly between the EIB and prospective borrowers. The numbers and amounts of loans disbursed in the years in question are as follows:

	Number	Amount £
1983	3	415,000
1984	2	290,000
1985	8	4,425,000
1986	6	28,363,000
1987	Nil	Nil

EIB loan offers made in the same period are as follows:

	Number	Amount £
1983	9	14,645,000
1984	11	40,236,000
1985	2	23,282,000
1986	Nil	Nil
1987	Nil	Nil

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he wil give the total amount of agricultural guidance and guarantee fund moneys allocated to Scotland in each of the years 1983 to 1987, inclusive, and for each assisted area or function so designated to receive such funds.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A detailed breakdown of receipts from the European agricultural guarantee and guidance fund is not available in the form requested. The table shows EAGGF receipts for the financial years 1983-84 to 1987-88 inclusive in respect of expenditure under various schemes.

To these amounts should be added the Scottish share of market support expenditure incurred by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce—in the current year estimated to be of the order of £920 million.

Roads (Central Barriers)

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many road traffic accidents in Scotland in each of the last three years were caused on motorways or dual carriageways as a result of an absence of central barriers.

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: The absence of central barriers is not itself a cause of road traffic accidents. The number of accidents involving vehicles crossing the central reservation of a motorway or dual carriageway in the last three years is as follows.

Year	Motorway	Dual carriageway	Total
1985	25	55	80
1986	22	46	68
1987	18	50	68

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many miles of (a) motorway and (b) dual carriageway in Scotland have no central barriers; and, of each of these, how many have barriers planned.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: 104 miles of motorway and 204 miles of dual carriageway do not have central barriers at present. As a matter of policy central barriers are installed automatically on all new sections of motorway and dual carriageway. So far as existing sections of road are concerned, motorways are receiving highest priority. On dual carriageways, barriers are installed as opportunity arises in connection with other works and provision will be extended in due course to locations where it can be justified, taking account of traffic volumes and the incidence of crossover accidents.

Rating Reform

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to lay before Parliament the regulations on the community charge relating to exemptions for students.

Mr. Lang: The Personal Community Charge (Students) (Scotland) Regulations 1988, which define those students who will pay only 20 per cent. of the personal community charge, were laid before Parliament on 30 March 1988. Consultations have recently been carried out on the draft of a replacement set of regulations, which will be made very shortly. The main change in the new regulations will be the introduction of prescribed requirements about the provision of certificates and information by educational establishments, in accordance with amendments made to the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987 by the Local Government Finance Act 1988.

Further Education

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Government have any plans to change the method of funding for Scotland's colleges of further education.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend is preparing legislation providing for the delegation of greater financial and managerial responsibilities to further education college councils. Colleges will continue to be funded by the education authorities, but I hope this will be in ways which better reflect each college's achievements in meeting the education and training needs of its area. Colleges will have greater freedom to earn and retain income generated by selling services—such as consultancy, research, and company specific training—at commercial rates.

Nurses (Grading)

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nursing and midwifery staff from each of the old grades have been assimilated to each of the new grades in the clinical grading structure in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Health boards' returns show that for qualified staff almost half of enrolled nurses have gone to the higher grades available with percentage pay increases ranging from 18·7 to 47·2 per cent.: for staff nurses the proportion going to the higher grades is 78 per cent. with increases from 23·8 to 51·0 per cent. and for hospital sisters almost 60 per cent. will receive pay rises of between 16 and 49·4 per cent. Even on the basic grade, nursing auxiliaries will receive at least 7·6 per cent. Comprehensive details of the numbers of staff assimilated to the new grades are given in the table:

Agricultural Colleges

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the future of the Scottish agricultural colleges.

Mr. Rifkind: The Government's policy towards the funding of agricultural R and D and advisory services and changes affecting further and higher agricultural education will have important implications for the future of the Scottish agricultural colleges. It is against this background that the chairman of Scottish Agricultural Colleges Ltd. and I have decided to establish a committee of inquiry, under the chairmanship of Sir Alwyn Williams, with the following terms of reference:

> "To consider the present and future requirement in Scotland for an agricultural advisory service, both general and specialist, which is publicly funded; for agricultural education, particularly those levels currently provided by the Scottish Agricultural Colleges; and for research and development, particularly in respect of these two functions, within the United Kingdom research base.
> To make recommendations to the Secretary of State and the Chairman of Scottish Agricultural Colleges Ltd.: having regard in particular to the present functions, scope and facilities of Scottish Agricultural Colleges as they have been recently developed and are presently organised, and to whether any changes should be made to their present responsibilities and to the relationships with the associated universities, local authority agricultural colleges, agricultural and other research institutes and other public bodies; taking into account the relationships with Scottish Office Departments and the Government's developing policies on the relevant functions."

ENERGY

Coal Mining Subsidence

Mr. Woodcock: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received in response to the Government's consultation paper on coal mining subsidence legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Government have received over 50 written responses to the consultation paper. These are receiving careful consideration.

Prepayment Meters

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what action is being taken to encourage the provision of prepayment meters relying upon the number of coins rather than tokens where desired.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This is a matter for the electricity supply industry. I have asked the chairman of the Electricity Council to write to the hon. Member with the information requested.

Electricity Industry (Privatisation)

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what account he will take of the commitment of the electricity distribution boards to purchase electricity from the proposed power stations at Wlyfa B, Hinkley C, West Burton B and Hams Hall in determining whether to issue a licence.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The CEGB has applied to my right hon. Friend for consent to construct power stations at Hinkley Point C and West Burton B. No applications have been made for Wylfa B and Hams Hall.

In determining whether to grant consent for the construction of a power station my right hon. Friend would take into account all relevant factors.

It would be for the CEGB to decide whether or not to proceed with the construction of a station for which consent has been granted.

Electricity Prices

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether electricity prices for (a) domestic and (b) industrial users will be higher as a result of his decision to create a ring fence for non-fossil fuel in a private electricity supply industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The benefit electricity users get from the diversity of fuel sources used to generate their electricity is reflected in present electricity prices. This will not change as a result of privatisation.

THE ARTS

Nottingham Arts and Leisure

Mr. Allen: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will meet representatives of the Nottingham city council to discuss additional support for the arts and leisure in the city.

Mr. Luce: Funding the arts in Nottingham is the responsibility of East Midlands Arts in partnership with the Arts Council and the local authorities. I have received no request for a meeting from representatives of Nottingham city council.

Libraries

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will list those organisations which have responded to the libraries Green Paper.

Mr. Luce: As I said in reply to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) on 7 November, at column 14, I have received about 7,000 representations.

These include responses from English library authorities (103), national and local political organisations (18), professional library groups and associations (47), other professional bodies (22), local community groups (48), educational groups (47), businesses (30) and other organisations (63). The other responses have come from individuals, including 214 from hon. Members.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Luce [holding answer 30 November 1988]: No. The institutions which I sponsor will be responsible for meeting any new controls on emissions which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment may introduce.

PRIME MINISTER

Winterbourne Zelstone

Q31. Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make an official visit to Winterbourne Zelstone.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Hexham

Q126. Mr. Amos: To ask the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit the Hexham constituency.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

European Commission (Vice-President)

Q149. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister why, and in what respect, experience of the Department of Trade and Industry was a factor in the nomination of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), as a vice-president of the European Commission.

The Prime Minister: As I told the hon. Member on 20 July 1988, at column 607, the same criteria were applied as have been applied in the past, namely, ability and experience.

Privatisation (Costs)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list the publicity and associated costs for each privatisation since 1979.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my righ hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) on 3 March 1988, at column 629. This lists the cost to the Government of corporate and flotation advertising and advertising agency fees, exclusive of VAT, for each privatisation and residual share sale since the British Telecom sale of December 1984. Comparable figures for previous sales are not readily available.

Engagements

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 December.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be departing this afternoon to attend the European Council in Rhodes.

Public Appointments Unit

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister what qualifications are required by an individual in order to be offered a job by the Public Appointments Unit.

The Prime Minister: The range of appointments made by Ministers, with advice from the Public Appointments Unit, where appropriate, provide opportunities for people with widely different qualities and experience.

Russian Spies

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she has any plans to investigate the number of Russian spies in the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: It is not the practice to comment on security matters of this kind.

Advisers

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will give the names and salaries, date of employment and previous occupational position of each of her full and part-time advisers paid out of public funds.

The Prime Minister: The names, dates of employment, and previous occupational position of each of my full and part-time advisers paid out of public funds are as follows:

Name	Year of appointment	Previous employment
G. D. Bourne	1988	BP Petroleum Development Ltd.
Mrs. T. Gaisman	1987	Conservative Central Office
Professor B. Griffiths	1985	The City University Business School
G. R. J. Guise	1986	Consolidated Goldfields PLC
I. K. Whitehead	1988	Bank of Montreal Capital Markets Ltd.
A. Dunlop	1988	Conservative Research Department
Miss C. Sinclair	1988	Her Majesty's Treasury

The current salary bill for these advisers is £246,903.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister how much has been spent by her Office in each year since 1979 on (a) outside consultants and (b) special advisers attached to No. 10 Downing street.

The Prime Minister: (a) There has been no expenditure by my Office on fees to outside consultants since 1979-80 and none is planned for the rest of this year.

(b) the figures required for 1979 to 1985 are not available and cannot be obtained except at disproportionate cost. The amount spent on advisers in the last three financial years is as follows:

1986-87	247,518
1987-88	192,532
[1]1988-89	246,903

[1] Estimate.

10 Downing Street

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will provide a detailed breakdown of the £975,000 due to be spent in 1988-89 on refurbishment, restorations, electrical and security improvements and general maintenance at No. 10 Downing street.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave on 29 July 1988 at column 628.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister why she will not provide an analysis of the £213,318 from public funds spent to date in 1988-89 on furnishings and decoration in No. 10 Downing street.

The Prime Minister: This information is not readily available and a detailed analysis can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Entertainment Costs

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will provide details of the changes made in estimating entertainment and other costs associated with her office.

The Prime Minister: Like other Government Departments, my office has been improving and refining its management accounting system. The most recent change was the introduction, in 1987-88, of delegated budgeting which has enabled expenditure to be estimated, and costs allocated more precisely.

Media (Accounts)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister whether all media organisations sending representatives accompanying her on official transport on visits abroad have settled their accounts.

The Prime Minister: It is too soon to expect all these accounts to have been settled.

Policy Unit

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total cost to public funds of scrapping the Central Policy Review Staff; and what has been the cost of the Prime Minister's policy unit in each year since its inception.

The Prime Minister: In the last full year of its operation (1982-83) the estimated cost to public funds of the Central Policy Review Staff was £1,109,000[1]. Its abolition involved no costs to public funds; indeed, it represented a saving of this amount. The costs of the Prime Minister's policy unit, on a comparable basis, in each year since its inception is as follows:

1979-80	37,669
1980-81	59,366
1981-82	63,846
1982-83	93,633
1983-84	154,923
1984-85	220,234
1985-86	270,610
1986-87	327,979
1987-88	311,110
1988-89[2]	349,527

[1] Based on number of staff in post.

[2] Estimate.

President Reagan (Official Gifts)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will give a description and the cost of each of the official gifts she has given to President Reagan since 1981.

The Prime Minister: No. The customary practice is to give official gifts to Heads of Government, Heads of State, and small numbers of officials on the occasion of each visit to a country, but it is not considered appropriate to give details of these.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister how many Labour hon. and right hon. Members have received hospitality at No. 10 Downing street in the past year.

The Prime Minister: Twenty right hon. and hon. Labour Members have received hospitality at 10 Downing street between 29 November 1987 to 29 November 1988.

President Waldheim

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received any recent communications connecting President Waldheim of Austria with war crimes involving British citizens; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing further to add to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces to the right hon. learned Member on 30 November 1988.

Trevor Clay

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Prime Minister whether she has requested the Public Appointments Unit to consider Trevor Clay for appointment.

The Prime Minister: The Public Appointments Unit maintains a list which currently contains over 5,000 names of people from all walks of life who might be considered for public appointments. It would be inappropriate to comment on individuals who have been nominated in confidence, but nominations submitted to my office from whatever source would be referred to the unit as a matter of course.

Foreign Travel

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister what has been the cost to public funds in real terms in every year since 1979 of foreign travel undertaken by her and those accompanying her; and if she will give the amount spent in real terms in the same number of years prior to 1979.

The Prime Minister: The cost to public funds in real terms in every year[1] since 1979 of my foreign travel and of those accompanying me is as follows:

	Constant prices 1986-87
[2] 1979-80	253,894
1980-81	187,828
1981-82	713,388
1982-83	627,140
1983-84	247,269
1984-85	453,848
1985-86	472,953
1986-87	447,066
1987-88	404,414
[3] 1988-89	393,582

Information on expenditure in years prior to 1979 cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost.

Notes:

[1] Billing delays prevent some costs from being shown in the financial year in which the services were provided. The figures, therefore, do not necessarily reflect when the expenditure was actually incurred.

[2] From May 1979.

[3] Estimate.

WALES

Nurses

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much money has been allocated by his Department to each Welsh county area health authority for payments to nurses as a result of their regrading.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is as follows:

District Health Authority	£m[1]
Clwyd	6·7
East Dyfed	3·5
Pembrokeshire	1·2
Gwent	8·0
Gwynedd	3·6
Mid Glamorgan	9·6
Powys	1·8
South Glamorgan	7·7
West Glamorgan	6·4

Note: [1] The figures quoted differ in the case of some authorities from those provided in the reply to the hon Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) on 4 November, as at columns 781-82, as they include the distribution of the £500,000 which was provided to meet the cost of other consequential changes arising from the review body award.

Sir Raymond Gower: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of clinical nursing and midwifery staff have been assimilated to each of the new clinical grades by each district.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information requested is given in the following table:

Nurses Clinical Grading Review—Wales
Percentage of all clinical staff assimilated to each of the new clinical grades

District Health authority	Total WTE	A per cent	B per cent.	C per cent.	D per cent.	E per cent.	F per cent.	G per cent.	H per cent.	I per cent.

Note: Due to rounding totals may not balance exactly.

Pembrokeshire Coast National Park

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total cost of the Pembrokeshire coast national park in each year since 1984; what was the annual supplementary grant provided by his Department to Dyfed county council in each of these years for the park; and what was the percentage by which the supplementary grant was increased in each of these years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested in respect of the Pembrokeshire coast national park is as follows:

Financial year	Total net expenditure by park (£'s)	National Parks Supplementary Grant paid by Welsh Office for park (£'s)	Percentage increase of National Park Supplementary Grant on previous year (per cent.)
1984-85	888,675	622,500	6·22
1985-86	927,025	663,000	6·51
1986-87	1,033,057	715,955	7·99
1987-88	1,289,664	807,075	12·73
1988-89	[1] 1,460,420	888,300	10·06

[1] Estimated expenditure.

Housing

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from Preseli-Pembrokeshire district council in 1988 concerning the housing stock in its district; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: In common with all Welsh local authorities Preseli-Pembrokeshire district council submits to the Department annually its housing services investment programme for the forthcoming financial year. The authority reacted quickly and positively following the publication of the Welsh house condition survey earlier this year and is liaising with the Department on a strategic approach which will help address the outstanding housing issues in the area.

DEFENCE

Property and Land

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the property and land his Department holds in the Nottingham, North constituency.

Mr. Freeman: The Ministry of Defence has no land holdings in the Nottingham, North constituency.

Bullying

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the allegations of bullying at Bassingbourn barracks, Hertfordshire, in respect of Wayne Beal and other recruits.

Mr. Freeman: The special investigation branch of the Royal Military Police are investigating the allegation of bullying at the Queen's Division depot at Bassingbourn that involve Private Wayne Beal and three other recruits. Once these are completed, I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how he will ensure that members of the armed services who are bullied by non-commissioned officers can complain to senior officers without subsequent victimisation.

Mr. Freeman: I can assure my hon. Friend that there will be no victimisation of any soldiers, especially young recruits, who speak out about bullying or mistreatment. All officers are well aware of their fundamental responsibility for the well-being of their soldiers and of the serious nature of these matters and are alert for such offences occurring. They will undoubtedly assist with passing complaints forward to commanding officers whose duty it is to investigate all such complaints.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what have been the financial savings to his Department since the introduction of competitive tendering.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Department's commercial approach to defence procurement, including the greater emphasis on competition, has achieved substantial cost savings. Eleven examples were included in the 1988 statement on the Defence Estimates where savings of some £105 million had resulted. It is however, difficult to estimate the savings resulting from competitive tendering in the absence, in some instances, of information as to the price that would have been achieved without competition. In addition, the wide range of circumstances where competition can be used to make it impossible to calculate the cumulative savings made since the adoption of this commercial approach in the early 1980s. Competition has also promoted the more efficient use of industrial resources which has contributed to the recent considerable export successes of British industry.

Career Opportunities (Army)

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement of additional measures to increase public awareness of the career opportunities which the Army has to offer.

Mr. Freeman: At present, I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) on 9 November at column 184.

Woolwich Arsenal

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further consideration he has given to the possible release of surplus land at Woolwich Arsenal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I shall be writing to the hon. Gentleman in the next few days with a map of the area to be released, as promised in my answer on 31 October 1988 at column 531.

Directorate-General of Quality Assurance

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he now expects to be able to announce a decision on the future location of the headquarters of the directorate-general of quality assurance.

Mr. Sainsbury: Ministers are currently considering the results of an investment appraisal concerning the future location of the directorate-general of defence quality assurance.

Guatemala (Incident)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which Royal Navy ship was involved in an incident involving a Guatemalan gunboat in Guatemalan waters on 20 November; whether shots were fired; what action he has taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The RN ship involved was the hydrographic vessel HMS Fawn. The incident took place not in Guatemalan territorial waters but while Fawn was conducting a hydrographic survey in international waters to the north of a median line between Belize and Guatemala. Shots were fired in the vicinity of HMS Fawn: it is not known whether these were aimed at her or were intended simply as a warning. A diplomatic protest has been made to the Guatemalan Government. The survey will, of course, continue.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Community Policing

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the present level of community policing in the Braniel and Belvoir estates in the Strangford constituency; and if he will make a statement on the future of policing in these two estates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: In each of the Braniel and Belvoir estates, daily attention is given by a local neighbourhood constable. Passing attention is given by divisional mobile patrol vehicles. Deployment of the RUC is a matter for the Chief Constable but I understand that there is no intention at present to alter the level of police cover in these estates.

Maintained Schools

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will introduce the legislation relating to the establishment of the new Council for Catholic Maintained Schools separately from the overall Order in Council for changes in the education system in Northern Ireland;

(2) whether the forthcoming legislation relating to the establishment of the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools will restrict itself to (a) procedures for the appointment, promotion, dismissal and disciplining of teachers, (b) procedures to centrally appoint and employ all teachers in Roman catholic maintained schools and be responsible for their deployment and (c) the oversight of schools management and co-ordinate planning and rationalisation within the maintained schools sector, as outlined in the document issued on 30 July 1987 by the Northern Ireland information service;

(3) whether the functions proposed for the education and library boards in relation to maintained schools, as outlined in the document "Education in Northern Ireland —Proposals for Reform," remain unaffected by the establishment of the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools; and whether he will make it his policy in any future legislation that this body will have advisory functions only.

Dr. Mawhinney: It remains the Government's intention that the legislation to establish the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools will be included in the proposal for a draft Order in Council which will give effect to the education reforms for Northern Ireland.

The draft order will describe the proposed functions of the council and its publication next year will provide an opportunity for further consultation.

Students

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many EEC students are now receiving grants to attend universities and centres of higher education in Northern Ireland; what is the total estimated cost of these grants; how many of these EEC students come from the Republic of Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Exact figures are not yet available. However, approximately 90 EEC students (of whom 88 come from the Republic of Ireland) are currently receiving discretionary grants, consisting of fees only, to attend universities and centres of higher education in Northern Ireland. In addition to these, some 1,030 EEC students in these institutions are not charged fees, in accordance with the arrangements announced in this House on 1 July 1986 by the then Secretary of State for Education and Science. It is not possible to say precisely how many of the latter came from the Republic of Ireland, but it is known that the overwhelming majority are from that country. The total estimated costs of these grants and forgone fee income is around £655,000.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many undergraduates are at (a) University of Ulster and (b) Queen's university, Belfast; how many students from other EEC countries attend each of these universities; and, of these, how many from the Republic of Ireland attend each of the universities.

Dr. Mawhinney: Provisional information for the 1988-89 academic year is as follows:

	Total (a)	Other EC[1] (b)	Republic of Ireland (c)
University of Ulster
Full-time	7,781	59	828
Part-time	2,017	—	51
Queen's University
Full-time	6,699	4	191
Part-time	773	4	6

[1] Excluding United Kingdom and Republic of Ireland.

Note: Figures in columns (b) and (c) are included in column (a).

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Graduates

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the numbers of young people leaving universities and polytechnics and being available for work in each of the next five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Future recruitment and, certainly, students' intentions after qualifying, are obviously difficult to predict. A key factor over the next five years is the continuing fall in the traditional student entry age group. However, due to increasing participation rates and greater recruitment of part-time and mature students, numbers generally are projected to hold up against that trend. Indeed, the number of home students at higher education institutions in Great Britain who were under 21 on entry and, on qualifying, would enter the labour market is estimated to grow from nearly 100,000 in 1987 to about 150,000 in 1992.

Special Schools, Bromley

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the London borough of Bromley about the transfer of Inner London education authority schools for children with special educational needs which are situated in Bromley to that borough; and whether he has been offered any undertaking by that borough to maintain such schools as special schools if transferred.

Mr. Butcher: The London borough of Bromley has indicated an interest in taking over responsibility for the two residential special schools maintained by ILEA which are located in Bromley. My right hon. Friend will take decisions about the allocation of ILEA's residential special schools in the light of discussions currently taking place with all the councils concerned. Any proposal for the discontinuance of one of these schools would require statutory proposals in accordance with the Education Act 1981.

Students (Financial Support)

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his Department's latest estimate of implementing the proposals in the White Paper "Top-Up Loans for Students," Cm. 520; and what is the cost of the present system.

Mr. Jackson: The additional costs of top-up loans, net of savings in social security benefit and grant, calculated on the assumption of a constant 3 per cent. rate of inflation, are set out in annex E of the White Paper. When the cost of the proposed access funds is also taken into account, the Government's proposals imply a cumulative additional expenditure of about £850 million at 1990-91 prices by the year 2003, when net savings begin to accrue. Net expenditure on mandatory grants to students in England and Wales in academic year 1988-89, exclusive of fees, is estimated at £523 million in current prices.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place in the Library a copy of his Department's full review on student financial support; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The Government's conclusions in the light of its review of student support were published in the White Paper "Top-up Loans for Students" (Cm. 520).

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list those organisations which submitted (a) oral evidence and (b) written evidence to his Department's review on student financial support.

Mr. Jackson: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 28 July 1988 (cols. 403-4). The British Medical Association was mistakenly omitted from the list of organisations provided.

Student Unions

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the terms of reference of his Department's review of student unions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman) on 18 April, at column 292. There are no other terms of reference for the review.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list by grade the personnel currently employed on his Department's review of student unions.

Mr. Jackson: The Department's current work on student unions is being undertaken by a team of officials which includes student affairs among its normal responsibilities. The team comprises the following officers:

	Number
Grade 5	1
Grade 7	1
Higher Executive Officer	1
Executive Officer	1
Administrative Officer	1

City Technology College (Bradford)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the feasibility study being conducted into the Bradford city technology college is to be completed; who was commissioned to conduct the study and at what fee; what were the terms of reference for the study; and if, when complete, he will place a copy of the study in the Library.

Mrs. Rumbold: The study is being carried out by the architects and building branch of the DES. Its purpose is to examine the costs of various options as to size and make-up and to study more generally the feasibility and costs of systems building for new CTC developments. The study is expected to be completed in January. Such studies are confidential to the Department and the sponsor.

TRANSPORT

British Rail

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will revise his quality of service objectives for British Rail to prevent overcrowding on trains between Halifax and Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Quality standards on PTE-supported services are entirely a matter for the PTE.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will discuss updating the railway station at Sowerby Bridge.

Mr. Portillo: That is a management matter for BR and the West Yorkshire PTE.

Accident Statistics

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many deaths on Britain's roads are associated with the taking of alcohol.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Too many, even though the numbers are falling.

In 1986, the latest year for which full figures are available, there were about 950 deaths in crashes where at least one of the drivers or riders had a blood/breath alcohol level above the legal limit. In addition, 30 per cent. (approximately 400 people) of the adult pedestrians killed in road accidents had a blood alcohol level above the legal limit for driving.

It cannot be assumed that alcohol consumption caused every death as we do not collect information on the cause of accidents.

M66 (Portwood-Denton)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects the M66 from Portwood to Denton to be opened; and what are the reasons for the delay.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: By mid-1989. A few weeks delay has been caused by unforeseen difficulties during earthmoving operations and by additional work on the motorway communications.

Dr. Tony Ridley and Sir Keith Bright

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if negotiations on severance terms with Dr. Ridley and Sir Keith Bright have been concluded.

Mr. Portillo: No.

Road Traffic Offences

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to bring forward legislation on the recommendations of the North committee on road traffic offences.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We aim to announce our conclusions on the North report early in the new year. Legislation will be introduced as soon as parliamentary time can be found for it.

Merchant Navy

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for changes to the certification requirements for officers serving on United Kingdom registered merchant ships.

Mr. Portillo: I am today placing in the Library of the House a copy of a consultation paper issued by the Department which invites comments on proposals for changes to the certification requirements for officers serving on United Kingdom registered merchant vessels.

The changes would allow holders of certificates of competency issued by any member state of the European Community to serve as junior officers on board United Kingdom vessels. Such changes would be compatible with our obligations under Community law and would provide shipping companies operating on the United Kingdom register with greater flexibility in manning their vessels. If adopted, the changes would come into effect early next year.

The paper considers the implications of the changes for the safety of United Kingdom ships, the employment prospects for British seafarers, and United Kingdom's defence requirements. It also considers the case for extending recognition beyond the European Community. Comments are invited by 20 January 1989.

Drink-Driving

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will take further measures to tackle the problem of drinking and driving by people who may have a medical alcohol problem.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In 1983 we introduced a scheme covering the high-risk offenders—those disqualified from driving twice within 10 years because the level of alcohol in their bodies was on each occasion 2½ times or more above the legal limit, or for twice refusing to supply a specimen for analysis, or for separate disqualifications for each offence. They are required to satisfy the medical branch of the driver and vehicle licensing centre that they do not have a drink problem and are otherwise fit to drive before their licence is returned after their statutory three-year period of disqualification. In the light of experience, we now propose moving the threshold for that scheme to the level recommended by the Blennerhassett committee, so that it will include all those who are convicted of driving while 2½ times or more over the limit, as well as on the other categories. We propose that offenders should pay all the administrative charges needed to cover the costs of the new scheme.

Our intention is to include these proposals with others which arise from consideration of the North committee's review of road traffic law. We expect to announce the Government's conclusions on North early next year, so that the House will have the opportunity to consider the package as a whole before any legislation is introduced.

Vehicle Number Plates

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when details of the proposed new British standard for vehicle number plates will be made available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The British Standards Institution has now issued for public comment a draft revision of BS AU 145a governing the manufacture of number plates. I have placed a copy in the Library.

We welcome these proposals. The quality and durability of plates would be improved and the proposed unique standard character font would be much easier to read than many of the styles currently available.

The revised standard is an integral part of a package of measures which, if approved by the House, would make it much harder for criminals to obtain number plates for illegal purposes. The package has been extensively discussed with number plate producers, and has been tailored to keep additional costs to the trade and the motorist to a minimum.

Depending on the outcome of BSI's consultation exercise we would hope to present the necessary regulations next spring so that the scheme could be mandatory from 1 August 1990.

South Circular Assessment Study

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which of the options listed in the south circular assessment study 2A report he has instructed Travers Morgan to develop during the south circular assessment study stage 2B.

Mr. Peter Bottomley We have not yet taken any view on the preliminary options produced by the study consultants. This must await the submission of the consultants' report in the summer of 1989.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC (Contributions)

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what refunds the United Kingdom has received as a result of the Fontainebleau agreement, from the net European Community contributions paid since 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Abatements made by the United Kingdom in respect of our VAT contributions since 1985 are set out in the table below:

Year abatement made	Amount of abatement
	(million ecu)	(£ million)
1985	1,000	[1]605
1986	1,900	1,262
1987	1,633	1,153
1988	2,397	[2]1,598

[1] United Kingdom actually received £439 million of this in the first few days of January 1986.

[2] Estimate based on annual exchange rate to October 1988 of £1 = 1·5 ecu.

In addition, the 1989 revised draft budget includes an abatement of 1,780 mecu (£1,187 million).

Trade Balance

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he estimates that the annual balance of trade will next be in surplus.

Mr. Major: The Chancellor's Autumn Statement, which is available in the House of Commons Library, provided forecasts of visible trade for 1988 and 1989. Forecasts for later years are not published.

Ms. Quin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of the current level of interest rates on the prospects for Britain's balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Major: The rise in interest rates since the summer will act to slow the growth of domestic demand. This will, in time, reduce the growth of manufactured imports and thereby help to improve the balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Trade Deficit

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the trade deficit was financed in 1987 and in the current year to date; and if he will publish in the Official Report, a table showing the changes in the capital account which have occurred as a result of the deficit in the current account.

Mr. Major: Figures for the current account, capital account transactions and the balancing item up to the second quarter of 1988 are available in the September edition of Economic Trends, published by the CSO.

Government Debt

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the last available date how much of the indebtedness of central Government, including deposits with savings banks and all short-term debt instruments, are held by the public sector and private sectors, respectively; if he will provide a breakdown showing how much is held by, in particular, the national insurance fund, the Bank of England and the exchange equalisation account, as well as banks, pension funds, building societies and overseas residents; and if he will provide comparable figures for 1958, 1968 and 1978.

Mr. Lilley: I refer the hon. Member to the article on the net debt of the public sector in the November 1988 Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin for the latest figures on central Government debt and a breakdown of market holders. Comparable figures for 1968 and 1978 can be found in the 1968 and 1978 December editions of the Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin respectively. Comparable figures for 1958 are published in the January-March 1962 Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin. A complete breakdown of official holders is not published. However, debt held by the National Insurance Fund (NIF) is published annually in the NIF accounts.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing how much debt has been unfunded in each of the past two financial years and in the current year to date; what is his forecast for the whole of the current financial year and his estimate for 1989-90; and whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the public debt which has been retired as a result of unfunding and the saving in interest which has resulted therefrom.

Mr. Lilley: The Government's policy is to fund the net total of maturing debt, the PSBR and any underlying change in foreign exchange reserves by sales of debt outside the banking and building society sectors. If that total is negative, unfunding is required. The relationship between funding and the stock of public debt is not straightforward. An article in the November 1988 Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin, "The Net Debt of the Public Sector: End March 1988" discusses the matter further.

The Government's estimate of funding or unfunding required in the current financial year is itself, and is based upon, market sensitive information. It is not the Government's policy to publish such information.

Schools (Charitable Status)

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost to the Exchequer of charitable status of non-state schools in the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that this information is not available.

Emission Controls (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will be seeking Crown immunity from prosecution for the institutions which are the responsibility of his Department when the anticipated new controls on emissions come into operation.

Mr. Lawson [holding answer 30 November 1988]: I refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's reply on 29 November. My Department has no plans to seek removal of Crown immunity in relation to the proposed air pollution regulations.

Inflation

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the rate of inflation (a) in June 1979, (b) in June 1988 and (c) now.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 29 November 1988]: The RPI increased by 11·4 per cent. in the 12 months to June 1979, 4·6 per cent. to June 1988, and 6·4 per cent. to October 1988.

Incomes

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures for 1979-80 and 1988-89 showing net incomes, after income tax, national insurance contribution and child benefit, at (a) two-thirds average earnings, (b) average earnings, (c) twice average earnings and (d) three times average earnings, of single-wage married couples with two children as percentages of the net incomes at the same earnings levels of (i) single people and (ii) two-wage married couples, where the combined wage comes to the specified total and the husband earns two thirds and the wife one third.

Mr. Lawson [holding answer 28 November 1988]: The information is in the table:

Net income of one earner married couple with 2 children as a percentage of net income of (a) single person and (b) 2 earner married couple with no children on same level of earnings

Multiples of average earnings[1]	⅔	1	2	3
(a) As percentage of net income of single person
1979-80	121·9	115·3	108·0	106·7
[2]1988-89	117·4	112·0	107·4	105·4
(b) As percentage of net income of married couple with two earners and no children
1979-80	101·9	100·7	103·4	106·7
[2]1988-89	99·8	100·1	102·6	105·1

The amounts of income (£ per week) are as follows:

Net income after income tax, national insurance contributions and child benefit (£ per week)

Multiples of average earnings[1]	⅔	1	2	3
Married couple with one earner and two children
1979-80	65·46	88·60	163·44	226·55
[2]1988-89	145·99	201·89	379·14	531·60
Single
1979-80	53·71	76·85	151·30	212·29
[2]1988-89	124·33	180·23	353·18	505·64
Married couple with two earners and no children
1979-80	64·24	88·02	158·14	288·15
[2]1988-89	146·27	201·62	369·43	533·41

[1] Average earnings are those for full time males working a full week at adult rates in all occupations. They are £109·30 per week in 1979-80 and assumed to be £254·10 in 1988-89, an increase of 8½ per cent. on average earnings in 1987-88 (the increase used by the Government Actuary in assessing the level of the National Insurance Fund as described in paragraph 3.02 of the Autumn Statement 1988).

[2] Provisional.

VAT

Mr. Warren: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he introduced value added tax on components supplied for multinational defence programmes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 28 November 1988]: There has been no change in the VAT treatment of such programmes. Although there is no general relief for defence projects, components for international defence projects may be relieved of tax if they are exported or, in broad terms, if they are supplied by or to overseas bodies under arrangements that incorporate formal inter-governmental agreement to waive tax. If my hon. Friend has a particular point in mind, he is of course welcome to write me.

ENVIRONMENT

National Tree Week

73. Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what initiatives his Department has been taking to encourage and publicise National Tree Week.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department continues to grant-aid the Tree Council, which is responsible for organising National Tree Week. On Monday my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister marked National Tree Week by planting a tree at the Chelsea physic garden and announcing that the Government will provide substantial additional funds to carry forward restoration of the treescape following last year's storm.

Some £7 million has already been allocated for planting of amenity trees, including £2·8 million for the coming financial year. In each of the following two years, 1990-91 and 1991-92, £3 million will now be made available, bringing to some £13 million the total provision for this programme. Most of this is being distributed through task force trees, a special unit of the Countryside Commission and the remainder through English Heritage and its scheme for the clearance and replanting of parks and gardens of outstanding architectural or historic interest.

Lighting (House of Commons)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the lighting in the Chamber of the House conforms to the Health and Safety Executive standards for workplaces.

Mr. Chope: There is no Health and Safety Executive standard which is readily applicable to the Chamber of the House. The HSE Guidance Booklet "Lighting at Work" (HS/G38) suggests a number of levels of average illuminance ranging from 20 lux for corridors and circulation routes to 500 lux for locations such as drawing offices and factories assembling electronic components.

The actual measured illuminance on the Floor of the Chamber varies from over 200 lux at the table to about 60 lux on the Back Benches.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to change the law on waste disposal; and if he is now able to give an estimate of when such legislation is likely to be introduced.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Legislation on waste disposal will be introduced as soon as possible during this Parliament. The main measures to be included were announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 29 June 1988 at column 4 and further proposals were put forward in a consultation paper issued on 23 November 1988.

Bed and Breakfast

Mr. James Lamond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the latest figures for households in bed and breakfast accommodation (a) in Greater Manchester, (b) in the Oldham metropolitan borough council and (c) in England and Wales as a whole.

Mr. Trippier: Latest national estimates of households temporarily placed in bed and breakfast accommodation by English local authorities appear in table 4(a) and numbers reported by individual authorities in table 7 of "Local authorities' action under the homelessness provisions of the 1988 Housing Act: England. Results for the second quarter 1988. Supplementary Tables", which is available in the Library.

For Welsh figures I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Rent Arrears

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out figures showing the increase in rent arrears in each local authority in England and Wales since April.

Mr. Trippier: The information is not available centrally for English authorities. For information about Wales I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Houses in Multiple Occupation

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what legal provisions he intends to make to increase the safety of people living in houses in multi-occupation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: We have received so far over 200 responses to our consultation paper on houses in multiple occupation issued on 18 July, copies of which are in the Library. We are currently considering possible legislative changes in the light of those responses.

Mobility

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to encourage the independent rented sector to make adequate provision for a continuation of the principles of mobility as embraced in the national mobility scheme.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend fully recognises the importance of tenant mobility. With his approval, the Housing Corporation will shortly be issuing guidance to registered housing associations on the management of their housing accommodation. Amongst other things, this will make it clear that associations are expected to respond to the mobility needs of their tenants and to participate actively in national and local mobility and exchange schemes.

Pipeline Schemes (Chelmsford)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to reach a decision on Chelmsford borough council's submission on pipeline schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Of the eight applications submitted by the council, those in respect of the White Hart lane local park and the Airey houses project, Roxwell have already been approved. The applications in respect of the Kings Head meadow and Wharf road development and of the Victoria road livestock market redevelopment will be further considered when decisions on the related compulsory purchase orders have been reached; a decision on the latter is expected shortly. The application in respect of Hylands house will similarly be considered following determination of a planning application now before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. No information on expenditure or receipts has yet been provided in respect of the Airey house project, Galleywood, the highways land exchanges, or the civic centre site development; without these the applications cannot be taken further.

Elderly Persons (Sheltered Housing)

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, for each local authority, how many units of sheltered housing for the elderly they provide.

Mr. Trippier: The number of sheltered dwellings for the elderly owned by local authorities is reported in the annual housing investment programme returns. The information for each local authority appears in columns A2A1 (stock inside authority's own area) and A2A6 (stock outside authority's area) of the "HIP1 (1988) All items print" which is in the Library.

European Community Regulations (Infraction)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many cases of infraction in the United Kingdom have been brought to his Department's attention following enforcement of article 6 of the European Economic Community regulation 3626/82; and what were the results of investigations in these cases.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not readily available. The Department does not hold a comprehensive record of infractions.

Stray Dogs

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with local authority organisations on that part of the Local Government Act 1988 referring to stray dogs; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The powers enabling local authorities to exercise the same powers as the police in relation to stray dogs were included in the Local Government Act 1988 after consultation with the local authority associations.

Dog Registration

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is considering allowing local authorities to introduce local dog registration schemes in accordance with the Local Government Act 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have no plans to introduce local dog registration schemes.

Water Authorities (Land Holdings)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what area of land owned by water authorities is currently registered under the provisions of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1981 as being unused or underused.

Mr. Moynihan: The figure for the nine water authorities in England at 29 November 1988, is 2,200 acres.

Nature Conservancy Council (Budget)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the consequences (a) in financial terms and (b) on work undertaken of the 5 per cent. reduction in real terms in the budget of the Nature Conservancy Council for 1989-90 in the areas of (i) sites of special scientific interest notification/renotification, (ii) land purchase, (iii) marine conservation, (iv) urban conservation, and (v) grants to voluntary organisations; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave him yesterday at column 284 concerning the basis of the Nature Conservancy Council's allocation for 1989-90. The Council is responsible for the detailed planning and distribution of its budget and its estimates and corporate plan for 1989-90 will make appropriate provision for the areas listed.

White Paper on the Environment

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when his Department will be issuing a White Paper on the environment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: It is not customary to issue White Papers unless they contain detailed proposals for legislation. Our programmes for conserving the environment go far wider than what can be achieved through further legislation.

Rating Reform

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Government have now decided on the boundary for rating purposes between domestic and non-domestic property.

Mr. Gummer: My Department and the Welsh Office are today issuing a consultation paper on the boundary for rating purposes after 1 April 1990 between domestic and non-domestic property, prior to making the necessary regulations. The paper makes proposals in several areas where it is difficult to draw a clear distinction between domestic and non-domestic use. The main proposal is that individual short-let accommodation, such as holdiay cottages, should be treated as domestic and subject to the standard community charge. We have concluded that this is the most practical course, given the difficulties involved in identification, valuation and monitoring of use that would arise if they were to be liable to non-domestic rates. Holiday complexes, for instance blocks of holiday flats or chalets, will however be subject to rating.

I am placing copies of the consultation paper in the Library.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would have been the average community charge for the whole of Great Britain in 1988-89 based on local authority expenditure returns.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1988]: The types of service provided by local authorities are not the same in each country and hence an average figure would not be meaningful.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress of negotiations regarding the arrangements for foreign Governments and diplomats to continue paying broadly the same contributions towards the cost of local services under the poll tax system as under the present rating system.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 28 November 1988]: Good progress is being made towards establishing the arrangements for contributions in lieu of the community charge under the new system of local government finance. These will be broadly the same as the contributions made under the present rating system.

Sewage Works (Discharge Consents)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many water authority sewage treatment works failed to meet their discharge consents in 1987; and if he will list them, by water authority, in the Official Report.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 28 November 1988]: Almost 900 water authority sewage treatment works failed to comply with their discharge consent conditions during 1987. Copies of the water authority returns detailing the works concerned are now available in the Libraries of both Houses.

Lead Pipework

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average level of plumbosolvency of the water (a) in Nottingham and (b) nationwide; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: As there is no standard measure of plumbosolvency it is not possible to give a numerical answer. However, the water supply to the city of Nottingham is not considered to be aggressive to lead pipework.

Lead monitoring surveys by water undertakers between 1980 and 1985 identified 130 water supply zones serving some 5 million people where lead levels were of concern. Water treatment schemes have been completed in 66 zones. Schemes should be completed in the remaining zones by the end of 1989.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

General Medical Council

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Lord President of the Council what representations he has received from the General Medical Council concerning an increase in its membership; and if he will take steps to consult interested bodies prior to making any response.

Mr. Wakeham: The Privy Council has recently received an application from the General Medical Council proposing the addition of four elected members (one for Scotland, and three for England) and of a fifth to be appointed by the faculty of occupational health. Following the addition last year of two extra appointed lay members, these proposals would restore the size of the majority of elected members, which is required by the Medical Act, approximately to that which existed before. The GMC has consulted a wide range of bodies representing the profession on these proposals, and the Privy Council will consider what further consultations, outside the profession, are desirable before a decision is reached.

Lobbies of Parliament

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Lord President of the Council what is the limit on the number of individuals allowed to enter the Palace of Westminster during a lobby of Parliament; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: Although there is no firm limit, experience has shown that, during the course of a mass lobby, approximately 1,000 lobbyists can be admitted to Central Lobby. A maximum of 100 people in total, which includes lobbyists and others, are allowed to be in the Central Lobby at any one time. A further 1,000 may be addressed by or meet Members in the Grand Committee Room and in the Interview Rooms off Westminster Hall. Details of these arrangements are contained in the leaflet "Notes for Members of Parliament on arrangements for Mass Lobbies" issued by the Serjeant at Arms.

Lighting (Chamber)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council, what representations he has received concerning lighting in the Chamber.

Mr. Wakeham: The only representations that I have received have been in connection with the work of the Committee on Televising of Proceedings of the House, which I chair. Those received from right hon. and hon. Members have been reported to the House, and copies have been placed in the Library.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

House Purchase

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made with negotiations with estate agents to help promote better practices in connection with house purchase; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: I shall shortly be completing a wide-ranging programme of discussions with the leading estate agency bodies and other interested parties to consider the practices of estate agents in the operation of the property transfer system. The Government's interim conclusions on the relevant issues were outlined in a recent speech given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. I have placed copies of the text of this speech in the House Library for reference.

Manufacturing

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what are the latest industrial trends on overseas order books for manufacturing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The latest CBI monthly industrial trends survey (November) shows that export order books have weakened from the high levels seen at the beginning of the year—a balance of 4 per cent. of manufacturers considers its export order book to be below normal. However, the latest full quarterly survey (October) showed that manufacturing industry continues to be optimistic about export prospects and so far this year the volume of exports of manufactured goods has increased by some 6 per cent. compared with the same period last year.

Tobacco Factories

Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many tobacco factories have been closed since 1 January 1980; where they were located; and how many jobs were lost as a result.

Mr. Atkins: No official statistics are collected on tobacco industry factory closures, nor on the number of redundancies.

The Department is aware of the following closures of tobacco factories since 1 January 1980 to date:

1981—cigarette factory (Carreras Rothmans, Rayleigh, Essex)
1983—cigarette factory (Imperial Tobacco Ltd., Stirling) cigarette factory (Imperial Tobacco Ltd., Glasgow)
cigar factory (Imperial Tobacco Ltd., Bristol)
1984—cigarette factory (Carreras Rothmans, Basildon)
1985—cigarette factory (Gallaher, Middleton) cigarette factory (Imperial Tobacco Ltd., Newcastle)
cigar factory (Gallaher, Lisnafillan)
1986—cigarette factory (Carreras Rothmans, Carrickfergus)
1987—cigarette factory (Imperial Tobacco Ltd., Swindon)
1988—cigarette factory (Gallaher, Belfast)

Takeovers

Mr. Grylls: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what procedures have to be followed should a company, asked to enter into assurances not to buy shares in a particular company following a Monopolies and Mergers Commission refusal to allow a takeover, seek to be released from such assurances.

Mr. Maude: The Director General of Fair Trading will advise the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on whether undertakings given following a Monopolies and Mergers Commission report should be varied or superseded, in accordance with section 88(4) of the Fair Trading Act 1973.

Lawnmowers

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether two-stroke and four-stroke lawnmower engines can be converted to run on unleaded petrol.

Mr. Atkins: All petrol-driven two and four-stroke engines in lawnmowers currently on sale in the United Kingdom can be run on unleaded petrol without requiring conversion.

Shares

Mr. Favell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether his Department is considering any proposals to enable shares to be held, and transferred, without the need for share certificates.

Mr. Maude: My Department has just published a consultative paper on possible changes to the law which, if both the company and shareholder wished, would enable shares to be held on computer, without certificates, and to be transferred without the need for paper transfer forms. I have arranged for a copy of the paper to be placed in the Library of the House.

Lloyd's

Mr. Favell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made by Lloyd's in the implementation of the recommendations of the committee of inquiry into regulatory arrangements at Lloyd's.

Mr. Maude: The chairman of Lloyd's recently submitted a memorandum recording Lloyd's progress to date. This shows that, of the 69 recommendations which were for Lloyd's to implement, it has implemented or is in the course of implementing all but nine. Work on these is still in hand and we will continue to monitor Lloyd's progress towards their early implementation. A copy of the memorandum has today been placed in the Library.

Electric Bulbs

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what are the current levels of sales of home-produced and imported low-energy and long-life electric light bulbs.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 30 November 1988]: This information is not available as official statistics do not separately identify these types of lamps.

EMPLOYMENT

Benefit Fraud

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his Department's initiative to counter unemployment benefit fraud.

Mr. Lee: The White Paper "Training for Employment" issued earlier this year outlined the importance the Government place on ensuring that benefits are paid only to those entitled to receive them and re-emphasised our determination to reduce fraudulent claims.

To this end my Department has increased its resources devoted to fraud detection, particularly in London and the south-east where a new inner London fraud team is being set up.

There are more investigations being conducted into the hidden economy—over 223,000 in the first half of 1988-89 compared with 185,000 for the same period in 1987-88—with particular emphasis on targeting collusive employers.

There is also an increasing level of co-operation between my Department and the Department of Social Security and the Inland Revenue on the investigation of fraudulent benefit claims.

Rural Areas

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the steps his Department is taking to relieve unemployment in rural areas.

Mr. Lee: My Department is playing its part with other interested Departments to foster improvements in the economy of rural areas, notably through encouraging and supporting enterprise, small businesses and tourism. In addition, the full range of our employment, enterprise and training measures are available to help unemployed people in all rural areas.

Benefits (Registration)

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people drawing unemployment benefit are not registered at jobcentres as job seekers.

Mr. Lee: Since the introduction of voluntary registration in October 1982, unemployed job-seekers are still required to be available for work, but are no longer required to register at jobcentres as a pre-condition for claiming unemployment. Certain categories of job-seekers are still offered registration but detailed statistics are no longer collected.

Job Creation (Southwark and Bermondsey)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what action his Department intends to take to ensure the creation and retention of jobs for local people in the Southwark and Bermondsey constituency.

Mr. Lee: My Department, through its employment service and Training Agency, operates a wide range of employment, enterprise and training measures, which are all available in Southwark and Bermondsey, as well as elsewhere.

In addition, the Docklands liaison group co-ordinates the local activities of the employment service and the Training Agency and helps to streamline links with local organisations, with the aim of helping local unemployed people take advantage of the many new opportunities which the regeneration of the London docklands is providing. An employment training project to train local people in construction skills has recently opened in Southwark. This will build up to 175 places.

During the 12 months to October 1988 unemployment in Southwark and Bermondsey has fallen by 910, 13·5 per cent. of the October 1987 figure.

Restart Interviews

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will give, for the Coventry and Warwickshire area and nationally (a) the numbers called each months for a restart interview, since the inception of the scheme, broken down by gender and, where available, age range, (b) the numbers that attended the interviews, (c) the numbers of non-attenders who received a second invitation indicating the consequences of non-attendance regarding eligibility for benefit and (d) the numbers who did not attend for interview after the second letter; and of these, how many subsequently were declared ineligible for benefit;

(2) if he will give, for the Coventry and Warwickshire area and nationally, the numbers of people called each month for a restart interview since the inception of the scheme, broken down by gender and, where available, age range, who subsequently were (a) offered and (b) accepted: (i) a job, (ii) a community programme placement, (iii) a place on a restart course, (iv) a job training scheme placement, (v) referral to a job club, (vi) referral to enterprise allowance, (vii) referral to VPP projects, (viii) referral to employment training, (ix) other training, by type, and (x) other schemes, by type.

Mr. Lee: The figures are not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Tourism

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what consultations he has had, or plans to have, with tourist authorities as part of his current review of tourism.

Mr. Lee: I have had meetings with the chairman and boards of the BTA and ETB to discuss the review. The review team has also had wide-ranging consultations with national, regional and local tourist bodies.

YTS

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of young people, both nationally and in south Yorkshire, who are currently unemployed and who currently have not found or been offered a place on YTS.

Mr. Cope: This information is not available. Only the local careers service will know the number of young people seeking a YTS place at any one time.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many 16 to 18-year-olds have been offered a YTS placement; how many remain to be contacted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: From 1 April to 31 October, the latest available date, it is estimated that 266,700 young people have joined YTS. No information is available on the numbers who have declined a placement. At the end of October more than 435,000 young people were in training on YTS providing them with a sound foundation training for their future working lives.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the number of 16 to 18-year-olds who have accepted offers on a YTS placement; how many have declined a placement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: This information is not available. Only the local authority careers services will have any indication of the numbers involved. However, I am satisfied that the Training Agency has made available more than sufficient places to meet the potential uptake.

Teenagers

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what provision is made for difficult-to-place teenagers; what measures are being considered to increase the level of provision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: There are more than sufficient premium places on YTS to cater for difficult-to-place young people. The scope of funding for the disabled has been widened to include, for example, young people with emotional or behavioural problems. YTS initial training has been introduced for those young people who need a period of preparation and assessment before entering mainstream YTS. Places for difficult young people are also available on community industry.

I believe that these increased measures provide a valuable foundation at the start of their working lives for young people with difficulties.

Mr. Samuel Thomas Antonelli

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether Samuel Thomas Antonelli, a United States citizen resident at 147B Clapton Common, London E5 9AE is in possession of a valid work permit.

Mr. Lee: There is no record of a work permit being issued for this person.

HEALTH

Nurses (Grading)

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of clinical nursing and midwifery staff have been assimilated to each of the new clinical grades by district and by region in England.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is given in the table.

Variations between regions and districts are accounted for by such factors as:

(i) differences in the pattern of service provision, including the balance between hospital and community care;

(ii) differences in the composition of the nursing and midwifery workforce at 1 April 1988, including the proportions of unqualified staff and of first and second level qualified nurses;

(iii) differences in the number and size of hospitals, including long-stay psychiatric hospitals, within each authority.

The new clinical grading structure for nursing, midwifery and health visitor staff within each district and RHA—England
Percentages of all clinical staff assimilated to each of the new clinical grades on the basis of duties and responsibilities on 1 April 1988

Alternative Medicine

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will take steps to establish a committee of practitioners of orthodox medicine, and acceptable forms of alternative medicine, to monitor unorthodox treatments given to sufferers of multiple sclerosis;

(2) if he will establish a registration scheme for practitioners who charge for treatment which does not comply with established practice in the medical profession, or other established bodies.

Mrs. Currie: No. Practitioners registered with the General Medical Council can offer to use any form of therapy, including any of the alternative therapies, if they consider it to be in the interests of their patients and they feel competent to provide it. Practitioners of alternative therapies who are not registered with the General Medical Council, and who are therefore not eligible to work by law within the NHS, can offer their services privately, subject only to those provisions of statute and civil law which apply.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence he has that applied kinesiology can benefit patients suffering from multiple sclerosis.

Mrs. Currie: None whatever.

Calderdale

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many appeals have been made by nursing staff in Calderdale against the regrading system; and how soon all these appeals will be heard.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this information centrally. The question of when appeals will be heard is a local matter.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to increase the ratio of National Health Service beds to population in Calderdale to the regional average; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans he has to increase the ratio of full-time health staff to population in Calderdale to the regional average; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: None. Regional average figures of this type have no meaning. It is not possible to compare one district with another in this way because, for example, some districts have large mental illness or mental handicap hospitals which serve a number of health authorities whilst others have beds for regional or sub regional specialties. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the Yorkshire regional health authority for a more detailed explanation of the position locally.

Ambulancemen

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration he has given to the report he has received from the Ambulance Council working party entitled The Problems of Long Serving Ambulancemen; and if he will make a statement on his response to the report.

Mr. Mellor: We intend giving the contents of the final report careful consideration when it is submitted to Ministers.

Community Care

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many former psychiatric hospital patients have been transferred to the community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: In 1986, the latest year for which figures are available, 176,161 people, including readmissions during the year, were discharged from mental illness hospitals and units in England, and 1,082 of these patients had a length of stay of five years or more.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to ensure that the current level of community care facilities is sufficient to accommodate all those psychiatric hospital patients returned to the community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: It is for the consultant psychiatrists and their professional colleagues to ensure that patients' needs are assessed, and arrangements are made with local authorities and other care agencies for those needs to be met, before discharging their patients.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any plans to increase the number of qualified medical personnel available to assess psychiatric hospital patients' needs in community care hostels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We issued planning guidelines in July this year asking health authorities to ensure that a consultant psychiatrist in each district has special responsibility for rehabilitation and continuing care. This could extend to community care hostels.

Community care is a multi-disciplinary task and other hospital professionals, as well as the primary care team, also have an important assessment role.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any plans to make the medical reports of psychiatric hospital patients available to the community care hostels receiving these patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Caring for mentally disordered people in the community is a multi-disciplinary task. We have stressed the need for collaborative work in this area and the importance of this has been emphasised by the findings of the committee of inquiry into the care and after care of Miss Sharon Campbell. In sharing information doctors have to be mindful of the constraints of medical confidence and respect the wishes of the patient as to how such information is shared.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate current and future needs for community care facilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Current and projected need for community care facilities is one of the factors taken into account in determining the overall allocation of funding to regional health authorities and local authorities. It is for individual authorities to plan local services and resource allocation in the light of local needs and priorities.

Cook-chill Catering

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer given to the hon. Member for Wakefield, Official Report, 28 November, when Mr. Arthur Pinegar, ceased to be involved in the private health laboratory involved in work on cook-chill catering.

Mrs. Currie: About one year ago.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer given to the hon. Member for Wakefield, Official Report, 28 November, what is his policy on allowing microbiologists employed in the public health laboratory service also to operate private laboratories undertaking the evaluation and monitoring of cook-chill catering.

Mrs. Currie: The PHLs board's current policy is not to withhold permission for staff to engage in other remunerative work provided that there is no conflict of interest between that work and the employee's duties with the board, and that it does not prejudice the interests of the service.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer given to the hon. Member for Wakefield, Official Report, 28 November, where the work on the growth and survival of listeria monocytogenes in foods prepared in cook-chill catering being undertaken by the public health laboratory service is being carried out.

Mrs. Currie: At the food hygiene laboratory of the PHLS, Colindale.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer given to the hon. Member for Wakefield, Official Report, 28 November, whether the studies being undertaken by the public health laboratory service concerning the examination of meals provided in National Health Service cook-chill catering systems for the presence of listeria monocytogenes are being carried out.

Mrs. Currie: Yes.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer given to the hon. Member for Wakefield, Official Report, 28 November, why more time is needed before his Department's guidelines on cook-chill catering can be published.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 14 November at column 478.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the advice contained in the guidelines on cook-freeze catering published by his Department in 1970 is still operational.

Mrs. Currie: Yes. However, the reference made in these guidelines to the use of chilled pre-cooked food was superseded by the guidelines on pre-cooked chilled foods published in 1980; the latter are being updated.

Adoption

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what basis local authorities use in assessing an upper age limit for adoption; what that limit is; and whether he intends to review present arrangements governing adoptions.

Mrs. Currie: Adoption agencies, which include local authorities, are under a statutory obligation to choose the most suitable available family for each child. Age is one factor taken into account by agencies in making a decision. Agencies follow the accepted good practice that babies should generally be placed with adopters who are at an age at which most couples start a family. However, many agencies welcome prospective adopters beyond this age to meet the needs of older children or children whose care and upbringing call for experience or particular skills.

Having introduced the Children Bill we plan to turn to a reivew of the adoption legislation as soon as the opportunity occurs and will examine the present arrangements as part of that review.

Nursing Homes

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of places in (a) private and (b) voluntary nursing homes in each district health authority area in (i) 1979 and (ii) the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: Comparable information is available only for 1982 to 1986 (SBH212). Copies are available in the Library. The data do not separately identify voluntary and private homes. Data for 1987 should be available early next year.

European Childcare Network

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps the Government are taking to implement the recommendations contained in the European childcare network report by Dr. Bronwen Cohen; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The ministerial group on women's issues, which is chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Patten), Minister of State, Home Office and on which my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health is considering children's day care and women's employment. Dr. Cohen's report, "Caring for children—services and policies for Childcare and Equal Opportunities in the United Kingdom", which contains recommendations of interest to several Government Departments, is being considered in that context.

Registration Service

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the consultative document on the reform of the registration service.

Mrs. Currie: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health today published a Green Paper entitled "Registration: a modern service", Cm. 531, containing proposals to reform the system for registering births, marriages and deaths in England and Wales.

In presenting these proposals the Government have recognised that the present 150-year-old system places severe limitations on the service and those responsible for it and that there is a need to restructure it to make it more up to date, flexible and responsive to the demands of today's public.

The Government propose that responsibilities for the management of the registration service should be clarified: local authorities would be fully responsible for managing the service while the Registrar General would set national standards for it and the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys (OPCS) would monitor their implementation. Other measures are proposed which the Government believe will provide a more helpful and supportive service to the public. These include a greater choice for members of the public over the registration district and the building in which they marry; a facility for registering deaths which does not require the informant to travel to the district where the death occurred; some changes in still-birth registration to help meet public concern; improvements in the statistical information collected at the time of registration; safeguards on people's ability to buy certified copies of certificates which relate to the recent births, deaths or marriages of complete strangers; and the legal changes necessary to permit access to early registration records on similar terms as to other historic records. The overall financial effect of these reforms would be to reduce the present net cost of the service both locally and centrally.

These proposals are based upon the efficiency scrutiny of the registration service in England and Wales, which reported in 1985, and on the conclusions of a joint working group of officials from OPCS and the Home Office and representatives of the local authority associations which reported earlier this year.

The majority of these proposals will require amendments to main legislation but before any legislative proposals are presented to the House the Government are inviting comments on the proposals in the Green Paper to be sent to OPCS by 31 March 1989.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will announce the allocations to regional health authorities from the waiting list fund for 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The Government are making a further £30 million available through the waiting list fund in 1989-90 to help tackle the problem of long waits for hospital treatment: £25 million will be allocated direct to regional health authorities so that there can fund projects aimed at reducing the time patients have to wait and the remaining £5 million will fund projects in health districts which have particular waiting problems.

This is the third phase of the waiting list initiative. Last year the £25 million fund enabled health authorities to treat some 100,000 additional in-patients/day cases and 44,000 out-patients. In 1988-89 the £30 million is enabling health authorities to treat even more additional patients from the waiting list. The further £30 million that I am announcing today represents the third year of special funding and will build on the successes already achieved.

The allocation to regions are as follows:

Region	Allocation £ million
Northern	1·627
Yorkshire	1·886
Trent	2·488
East Anglian	0·889
North West Thames	2·004
North East Thames	2·108

South West Thames	1·549
Wessex	1·358
Oxford	0·992
South Western	1·547
West Midlands	2·743
Mersey	1·445
North Western	2·407

Care of the Elderly

Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by regional health authority (a) the number of people between 65 and 75 years old who have been identified as needing or having (i) hip replacement, (ii) cataracts, (iii) chest complaints, (iv) heart disease, (v) strokes, (vi) Parkinson's disease, (vii) Alzheimers's disease and (viii) osteo/rheumatoid arthritis and (b) the number of people over 75 years old who have been identified as needing or having the above.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 25 November]: The available information is given in the table.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Family Incomes

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update the example given on page 94 of "Social Trends 18" of a family man earning £73 in April 1987.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend on 28 July 1988 at column 509. This gives an example of a married man with a non-working wife and four children living in local authority accommodation and earning £75 during 1988-89.

Earnings Allowance

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if those achieving retirement with an established reduced earnings allowance before April 1989 will retain that allowance for life.

Mr. Scott: A recipient of the allowance who retires before 10 April 1989 will retain his existing entitlement for life.

Hostel Dwellers

Mr. Allen Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will give the value of the board and lodging allowance paid to hostel dwellers in April 1985, 1986 and 1988 in 1988 prices; and if he has any plans to increase the current rate;

(2) what proposals he has for raising allowances for hostel dwellers in the current financial year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Hostel dwellers do not receive income support (and formerly supplementary benefit) at a fixed rate. Income support includes help towards the accommodation charge and meals subject to a maximum limit, together with a personal allowance. Personal allowances are normally increased each April along with increases in other benefits. These will be increased from 10 April 1989 as follows:

	April 1988 £	April 1989 £
Lower
Single	10·30	11·95
Couple	20·60	23·90
Higher
Single	11·50	13·25
Couple	23·00	26·50
Dependant children
under 11	3·45	4·10
age 11-15	5·30	6·05
age 16-17	6·20	7·00
age 18	10·30	11·95

There are no plans to increase the maximum hostel limit which continues to cover the majority of charges.

The following table shows the average amounts of income support (and formerly supplementary benefit) paid to hostel dwellers in cash terms and at May 1988 values. May figures are used, because information for April is not available. No figures on average payments are available before December 1985.

	Average payment £	At May 1988 prices £
May 1986	65·76	71·38
May 1987	67·24	70·08
May 1988	70·72	70·72

Benefit Offices

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the staffing levels for the Carlisle benefit office for each of the years from 1979 to 1987.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There are no figures available before 1983. The staffing levels for each of the years 1983-87 were:

	Number
1983-84	117
1984-85	110
1985-86	111
1986-87	118
1987-88	117

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in the Coventry and Warwickshire area have claimed unemployment benefit and satisfied all the necessary conditions of entitlement, except that of voluntary unemployment, for each month of 1988 to date; and of these how many were disqualified from unemployment benefit, broken down by age, sex and duration of disqualification.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Attendance and Mobility Allowances

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if there is any facility for claimants for the attendance and mobility allowances to be examined by a woman doctor or a doctor from a particular ethnic background.

Mr. Scott: If claimants for the attendance allowance and mobility allowance specifically request to be examined by a woman doctor or a doctor from a particular ethnic background, these requests are dealt with on an individual basis by the regional office senior medical officer. Every effort is made to meet the claimant's request but the ability to do so largely depends upon the availability of doctors meeting the requirements among the examining medical practitioners in any one locality who have been recruited and trained for the undertaking of such examinations.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many examining medical practitioners for the attendance and mobility allowances are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities with language skills or a particular cultural background where this is relevant.

Mr. Scott: There are 4,863 examining medical practitioners who undertaken examinations on claimants for the attendance and mobility allowances. Of these 816 are women, and 908 are from ethnic minorities with language skills or a particular cultural background.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will tabulate the number of successful applications for review of the attendance allowance and break down the figures into those who sought review because they were dissatisfied with the original decision and those who did so because their condition had deteriorated.

Mr. Scott: Figures for 1987, the latest year for which information is available, are in the following table.

Attendance allowance reviews 1987
Number of successful[1] applications by reason for review

Reason for review	Number
Dissatisfaction	19,190
Deterioration	23,933
Other	981
TOTAL	44,104

[1] Successful reviews include those where an allowance is awarded for the first time, those where an allowance is increased from the lower to the higher rate and those where the period covered by a certificate of attendance needs is increased.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what are the procedures for dealing with doctors who are not fulfilling their duties to claimants for mobility and attendance allowance satisfactorily;

(2) how complaints against examining doctors for attendance and mobility allowance are dealt with.

Mr. Scott: Complaints against examining doctors for attendance and mobility allowance are dealt with by the Department's senior medical officer in the appropriate regional office. The doctor is provided with a copy of the complaint and of the report of the examination concerned and is asked to comment. The senior medical officer considers the complaint, the doctor's reply, any previous complaints made against that doctor and the SMO's personal knowledge of the doctor. The SMO then decides what action to take and arranges for a reply to be sent to the complainant.

Dissatisfaction with the work of an examining medical practitioner may arise as a result of complaints or during the course of monitoring his or her work. There are two main causes for dissatisfaction, inadequacy of the reports or a defect in the doctor's conduct, manner or behaviour. In the former case the unsatisfactory reports are discussed with the doctor in detail by the SMO or a full-time medical officer. Deficiencies are pointed out and the doctor is advised how his work can be improved. The doctor's subsequent reports are monitored and if they fail to reach a satisfactory standard, and if it is clear that no further significant improvement can be expected, he or she is not asked to provide any further reports.

If the doctor's conduct is cause for complaint individual cases are discussed in detail. Advice is given by the SMO or MO on how a change of conduct might prevent further complaints. A doctor whose conduct continues to provoke complaints is not asked to provide further reports.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if there is any matching of doctors with particular specialisations and attendance and mobility allowances claimants with particular disabilities.

Mr. Scott: The medical criteria to be met for attendance allowance and mobility allowance are not dependent on the claimant's exhibiting any particular disabilities. The Attendance Allowance Board, or its delegate, decides whether the conditions for attendance allowance are met on the basis of a report of an examination of the disabled person undertaken by a registered medical practitioner. That report provides an assessment of the nature and extent of attention to bodily functions and/or of supervision to avoid substantial danger which the disabled person reasonably requires from another by day and/or by night by reason of the medical condition(s) from which the claimant suffers. The decision by an adjudication officer to award mobility allowance rests on an examination and assessment by an examining medical practitioner of the claimant's walking difficulties due to a physical disorder.

By their very nature the medical examinations required for the purposes of determining eligibility for these allowances need the expertise and experience possessed by general practitioners who make up the great majority of the doctors selected and recruited by the regional office senior medical officer to perform this function. Consistency of advice across a wide range of disabilities and age-groups is also desirable. This is obtained by employing general medical practitioners. In the small number of cases where a specialist opinion is required to determine diagnosis, or assist in resolving complex cases, an independent report is solicited from a consultant clinician who would possess the necessary specialist knowledge applicable to the individual case.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give (a) the total number of claims for mobility allowance in 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88 for Scotland, England and Wales, (b) average lengths of time involved in processing these claims, (c) the length of time considered reasonable for an individual claim to be processed and (d) the total number of applications which remain to be processed to payments or refusal stage claims first submitted in the period 1 April 1987 to 31 March 1988.

Mr. Scott: The available information about the numbers of mobility allowance claims received is in the table; separate figures for Scotland, England and Wales are not available as claims are administered centrally. We endeavour to deal with all claims as quickly as possible but it is unlikely that the current average processing time of 7·8 weeks can be significantly reduced. I regret that figures for claims received up to 31 March 1988 and awaiting decision are not available.

Mobility allowance: Claims received 1985-86 to 1987-88

	Numbers received
1985-86	151,000
1986-87	169,000
1987-88	223,000

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give (a) the total number of claims for attendance allowance in each of the years 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88 for Scotland, England and Wales, (b) the average length of time involved in processing an individual claim, (c) the length of time considered reasonable by the Department for an individual claim to be processed and (d) the total number of applications which remain to be processed to payment or refusal stage for claims first submitted in the period 1 April 1987 to 31 March 1988.

Mr. Scott: The information requested about numbers of attendance allowance claims received is in the table. We endeavour to deal with all claims as quickly as possible but it is unlikely that the current average processing time of 7·3 weeks can be significantly reduced. I regret that figures for claims received up to 31 March 1988 and awaiting decision are not available.

Attendance allowance: Claims received 1985-86 to 1987-88

	Numbers received
	Scotland	England	Wales
1985-86	24,063	230,434	21,969
1986-87	26,897	246,650	23,620
1987-88	31,266	280,969	25,628

Reduced Earnings Allowance

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people now receiving the reduced earnings allowance were awarded this payment when it was known as the special hardship allowance; and what undertakings were given to those recipients as to the duration of these payments.

Mr. Scott: I regret that the information requested is not available. Special hardship allowance was awarded for a period of up to six years subject to review if circumstances changed.

Family Credit

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on what assumptions about take-up rates the provision for family credit in the 1988 public expenditure White Paper was based.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The estimates of 470,000 family credit claimants and expenditure of £409 million were based on the assumption that the proportion of eligible employed earners who claimed family credit would be one fifth higher than for family income supplement. The estimates of total eligible population and expenditure were themselves subject to a number of assumptions, for example, about the movement in the levels of earnings and other income. They must therefore be treated with some caution.

Young People

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security why copies of leaflet FB23, "Young People's Guide to Social Security," were not circulated to independent advice centres in Bradford, Bradford benefit advice shops, youth clubs, church groups, hostels and other organisations which come into contact with young people.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: One million copies of the leaflet "Young People's Guide to Social Security April 1988" have been printed at a total cost of £77,430. In order to ensure that the leaflets are readily available to all young people they have been distributed to all parts of Great Britain, including Bradford. A total of 45,000 of the leaflets have been issued to career offices, 50,000 to

Department of Employment offices, 589,000 to our own local offices and Her Majesty's Stationery Offices. The Department of Social Security "Freephone" service also arranges for copies of the form to be sent to inquirers. In addition, the 17,000 organisations and individuals on the Department's mailing list, many of whom are involved with or represent young people, would automatically have received copies of the form. Any organisation or individual wishing to be added to the Department's leaflets mailing list may do so by making a written request.

Correspondence

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to reply to the letter of 27 October from the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North, on the loss of benefit by 16 and 17-year-olds.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I wrote to the hon. Member yesterday.

Pensioners

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how much of the proposed increase of £2·50 a pensioner of over 75 years will retain in net additional income if he is in receipt of housing benefit;

(2) how much of the proposed increase of £3·50 a pensioner couple of over 75 years will retain in net additional income if they are in receipt of housing benefit.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is the intention that all pensioners currently on income support will see a gain in net additional income of either £2·50 or £3·50 with any housing benefit entitlement remaining unchanged. Those pensioners with incomes remaining above income support levels after the changes but receiving housing benefit should see a cash increase in their housing benefit but this will be affected by the housing benefit tapers as shown in the following table:

	Couple £	Single person £
Increase in rent rebate or allowance	2·28	1·63
Increase in rate rebate	0·70	0·50
Increase in community charge rebate	0·53	0·38

Retirement Pensions

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to increase the level of retirement pensions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has a statutory duty to review the level of state retirement pension every year, and to increase it at least in line with the movement in prices. He informed the House on 27 October that from 10 April 1989 retirement pension will be increased by £2·45 and £3·90 for single pensioners and couples respectively. He also informed the House on 24 November of additional resources of £200 million to be made available to pensioners on low incomes.

Family Credit

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish figures showing family credit ceilings in 1988 and 1989, for (a) a single person with one child under 11 years, (b) a single person with two children under 11 years, (c) a married couple with one child under 11 years, (d) a married couple with two children under 11 years and (e) a married couple with two children under 11 years and two over 11 years, as percentages of their income support allowances, including family premium, free school meals and free welfare milk, but excluding housing.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 29 November 1988]: The information is set out in the table. The results for April 1989 are speculative as assumptions have had to be made about tax rates, tax thresholds and local authority rate levels.

	Family Credit Ceilings (£pw)				Net income after housing costs on income support (£pw)
Family Type	(Gross Wage)		(Net Wage)
	(i) 1988	(ii) 1989	(iii) 1988	(iv) 1989	(v) 1988	(vi) 1989	(vii) (iii) as per cent. of (v)	(viii) (iv) as per cent. of (vi)
Single person with one child aged 3	130	139	105	113	54·29	57·24	193	197
Single person with two children aged 4 and 6	114	155	114	123	67·49	71·44	169	172
Married couple with one child aged 3	130	139	105	113	68·64	73·24	153	154
Married couple with two children aged 4 and 6	143	155	114	123	81·84	87·44	139	141
Married couple with four children aged 3, 8, 12 and 16	200	218	152	165	122·44	130·69	124	126

Notes:

(a) Family credit ceiling rounded to nearest £.

(b) Net income after housing costs is defined as income support allowance plus free school meals and free welfare milk less 20 per cent. rate contribuition.

(c) Rates are assumed to be the local authority average for council tenants with the appropriate family accommodation.

(d) The approximate possible 1989 rate levels are those for 1988 enhanced by 5·9 per cent.

(e) The average value of free school meals is assumed to be £2·55pw.

(f) The average value of free welfare milk is assumed to be £1·83pw.

(g) Tax thresholds for 1989-90 have been calculated using a simple uplifting of 1988 thresholds.

(h) The basic tax rate is assumed to remain at 25 per cent. in 1989-90.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Department Houses

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present waiting time for the allocation of prison officers' housing for officers serving at London prisons.

Mr. Hurd: Prison service grades are no longer entitled to occupy official quarters as a condition of service and only in exceptional circumstances can such accommodation be provided. Allocation depends on a number of factors including availability and the compelling nature of the applicant's circumstances. Routine statistics are therefore not maintained but information from the five major establishments in London suggests that the waiting time can vary from three months to well over two years.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Board

Mr. Ground: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many cases were awaiting resolution by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board at the end of each month since January;

(2) how many cases were resolved by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in each month since January;

(3) how many staff were employed by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board at the end of each month since January.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is given in the following table:

Month	Cases awaiting resolution at the end of each month	Cases resolved during each month	Staff in post (part-time staff being each counted as one half)
January 1988	76,000	3,652	310·5
February 1988	77,000	3,353	309·5
March 1988	78,000	3,180	301·5
April 1988	79,000	2,724	305·5
May 1988	80,000	2,699	304·5
June 1988	80,000	3,393	311·5
July 1988	80,000	2,970	313·5
August 1988	81,000	2,964	312·5
September 1988	80,000	2,813	319·5
October 1988	81,000	3,201	320·5

Mr. Ground: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to reduce the backlog of cases awaiting resolution by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board.

Mr. John Patten: We have increased the board's staff to 320 (including 107 at a new office in Glasgow) and we hope that this will enable the board to reduce the backlog by at least 2,500 cases during 1989-90.

Immigration

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his best estimate of the cost of measuring the average waiting time of sponsors living in the United Kingdom in relation to applications from relatives living in the Indian sub-continent at his Department's Birmingham office over (a) a three month period and (b) a 12 month period; and if he will outline the basis on which this estimate is made.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to her questions on 29 June, at column 234, and 14 July, column 329. The cost of measuring the average waiting time over any period would include the resources involved in examining files at the port, in various parts of Lunar house and in transit to and from entry clearance posts abroad. I am satisfied that it would be disproportionate.

Norris v. Ireland

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in the light of the recent judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Norris v. Ireland, re-affirming that the complete illegality of consensual homosexual acts between males violates article 8 of the European convention on human rights, what steps Her Majesty's Government proposes to take to ensure that the laws outlawing consensual homosexual acts between males in the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man are brought into line with the court's ruling.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The law in Guernsey has been amended in order to avoid a breach of the convention in this respect. Further discussions have already been held with the law officers in Jersey and the Isle of Man drawing attention to the judgment in Norris v. Ireland.

Homosexuality

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to bring before Parliament proposals to amend the law on sexual offences to implement (a) the recommendations of the Policy Advisory Committee (Cmnd. 8216, 1981) and the Criminal Law Revision Committee (Cmnd. 9213, 1984) concerning the age of consent, the definition of privacy and other matters on which the law treats homosexual conduct more harshly than comparable heterosexual conduct and (b) the resolutions passed by large inter-party majorities in the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe in 1981 and the European Parliament in 1984 calling on those member states with laws discriminating against homosexuals to end such discrimination.

Mr. John Patten: We have no present plans to do so.

Vietnamese Refugees

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of Vietnamese refugees admitted for settlement in the United Kingdom (a) from Hong Kong and (b) from other areas in each of the past five years; and whether he has any proposals to increase these numbers.

Mr. Renton: The number of south-east Asian refugees accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom in the years 1983 to 1987, as published in table 18 of "Control of Immigration: Statistics, United Kingdom 1987" (Cm. 415) was:

	Number
1983	1,220
1984	800
1985	530
1986	830
1987	440

In the first six months of 1988 the figure was 300. A breakdown of these figures between those from Hong Kong and those from other areas is not available.

My right hon. Friend has received proposals that we should admit a greater number of south-east Asian refugees from Hong Kong. These proposals are being considered.

Mr. Ronald Joseph McCartney

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether a visit to establish home circumstances was carried out in the case of Ronald Joseph McCartney before deciding not to allow a transfer to Northern Ireland;

(2) why the decision was taken that there were no compelling circumstances to merit the transfer of Mr. Ronald Joseph McCartney from an English prison to Northern Ireland;

(3) what assessment has been made of the suitability of Ronald Joseph McCartney for transfer to a prison in Northern Ireland; and what is his general policy in regard to such transfers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No decison has yet been taken on Mr. McCartney's application to be permanently transferred to Northern Ireland to serve the remainder of his sentence. A visit to establish home circumstances for this purpose is not standard practice, and was not considered necessary in this case. Permanent transfers to Northern Ireland will normally be granted if the applicant has at least six months to serve, if he was domiciled in Northern Ireland before he committed his offence and his family still live there, and the Home Office and Northern Ireland Office are satisfied that he will not, if transferred, disrupt or attempt to disrupt the operation of any prison establishment or otherwise pose an unacceptable threat to security. Even if these criteria are met, however, a transfer may be refused if the inamate has been convicted of a particularly horrific crime; on the other hand, a transfer may be granted where the criteria are not met if there are exceptional and compelling circumstances in the case.

Students (Lobby)

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to (a) the number of police on duty at the time of and in connection with the lobby on student loans on 24 November and (b) the number of police vehicles utilised at the time of and in connection with the lobby;

(2) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the cost of the police operation on Thursday 24 November at the time of the student lobby of the House on student loans.

Mr. Hurd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 29 November, at columns 174-76.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to why mounted police charged into the groups of students assembled on the south side of Westminster bridge for the National Union of Students lobby of Parliament on 24 November; and who gave the order for this action;

(2) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to why the police completely closed Westminster bridge during the National Union of Students' lobby of Parliament on Thursday 24 November;

(3) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police as to who was in charge of the police operation dealing with the National Union of Students' lobby of Parliament on 24 November.

Mr. Hurd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 28 November, at column 76, and the reply given to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 29 November, at columns 174-76.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to why on Thursday 24 November constituents of various hon. Members in possession of letters from the House of Commons outlining arrangements to meet those Members were prevented by police from getting to Parliament;

(2) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to why police prevented hon. Members, who had previously arranged to meet constituents involved in the National Union of Students lobby of Parliament on Thursday 24 November from meeting those constituents outside the premises of the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Hurd: I understand from the Commissioner that arrangements were made with the organisers of the demonstration for students who wished to lobby Members of Parliament to follow a route to the House over Lambeth bridge. At various times throughout the afternoon NUS stewards and police officers encouraged lobbyists to use this route. The arrangements were used for orderly lobbying so far as was possible consistent with the duty on the police to ensure that the Sessional Order was not breached. By 6 pm the police had counted 494 students entering the Lobby. Many more were directed down Millbank but chose not to join the Lobby queue.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the policing of the National Union of Students lobby of Parliament on 24 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: Other than those which have been made by hon. Members by way of questions, two letters from hon. Members and two letters from members of the public of which I am aware.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to whether police officers involved in dealing with the National Union of Students lobby of Parliament on Thursday 24 November were aware of which officer was in charge of the operation.

Mr. Hurd: Officers were aware of who was in charge of operations.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to how many (a) police vans, (b) police officers, (c) boats, (d) helicopters and (e) horses were deployed by the Commissioner of Police in responding to the demonstrations of students in and around Westminster on the afternoon of Thursday 24 November; and what was the cost to public funds of the operation.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 28 November 1988, c. 75-76]: The additional cost of policing the demonstration was £27,462.

Prison Officers (House Purchase)

Mr. Michael Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officers have purchased their prison quarters since Fresh Start.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In the period since the introduction of Fresh Start until 14 November 1988, 1,101 prison officers have purchased their prison quarters under the Department's discount sales scheme. Information on the few properties sold to prison officers on the open market in this period is not readily available.

Mr. Michael Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many serving officers at Lindholme prison have purchased their prison quarters;

(2) how long it takes for a prison officer serving at Lindholme prison from applying to buy his quarters to signing the final agreement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Twenty prison officers serving at Lindholme prison applied to buy their quarters. None has yet signed a final agreement. The large number of applications for the purchase of quarters under the discount sales scheme has created delays at the conveyancing stage of the sale process which make it impossible to say how long completion of the necessary procedures will take in particular cases.

Correspondence

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate will receive a definitive response in respect of case A424178 about which he first wrote to him in August.

Mr. Renton: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 28 November.

Conservative Trade Unionists Conference

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the additional policing costs arising from the 1988 Conservative Trade Unionists conference in Southport.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the chief constable of Merseyside that the additional costs of policing the 1988 Conservative trades unionists conference in Southport were £32,014.

Trans-frontier Television

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what part his Department's delegation played in the recent Stockholm ministerial conference on trans-frontier television in Europe; what decisions were arrived at; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom delegation, which I led, played a prominent part in this conference, the theme of which was European mass media policy in an international context. We were invited to prepare one of the two main conference papers on the subject of international circulation of European audio-visual works and acted as rapporteur for the discussion of this item. Most of the time of the conference, however, was devoted to discussing the draft convention on transfrontier television, and significant progress was made towards resolving the outstanding issues of difficulty. Our delegation tabled a revised formula on advertising breaks which was generally welcomed and was incorporated into a compromise package which it was agreed could serve as a basis for the final text. The draft convention will now be submitted to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe for finalisation, and we hope that it will be opened for signature early next year.

Mr. Errol Codling

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Mr. Errol "Ranking Dread" Codling was deported or extradited from the United Kingdom; and of what crimes he was accused.

Mr. Renton: The person concerned was removed to Jamaica on 8 November under paragraph 10 of schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971, having entered the United Kingdom illegally.

Electronic Tagging

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether telephones will be provided without charge if electronic tagging schemes are introduced for each offender who does not possess a telephone; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many pilot schemes of electronic tagging are being undertaken in consultation with his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Details of the pilot project on the electronic monitoring of people released on bail are being worked out. There are likely to be schemes in two or three areas.

Dogs (Tail Docking)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, he intends to sign both articles 10 and 21 of the European convention on the mutilation of animals concerning tail docking of dogs; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received about signing article 10 but not article 21 of the European convention on the mutilation of animals.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Tail docking is one of the subjects covered in the European convention for the protection of pet animals. It was also raised in a report on animal mutilations by a working party of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons. Consultation on that report has now been completed; I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) on 15 July 1988 for a list of the organisations involved. In addition, I have received representations from several hon. Members, some correspondence from members of the public and a number of petitions on this subject. We shall consult interested organisations on all the provisions of the convention before deciding how to proceed.

Breath Tests

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many roadside breath tests took place in 1986 and 1985.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The available information is published annually in Home Office statistical bulletins, "Statistics of breath tests, England and Wales" (table 1 of issue 23/88 gives the latest available figures up to 1987).

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce discretionary or random breath tests.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: At present a police officer may require a driver to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test where he has reasonable cause to suspect that the driver has alcohol in his body, and in certain other circumstances. The Association of Chief Police Officers has proposed that the police should in future have unfettered discretion to require breath tests and we are considering this together with proposals on related aspects of road traffic law made by the road traffic law review.

Drink-driving

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions for drunken driving there were in 1986, 1987 and to date in 1988.

Mr. John Patten: The available information relates to findings of guilt for offences of driving, and so on, after consuming alcohol or taking drugs and is published annually in Home Office statistical bulletins, "Offences relating to motor vehicles, England and Wales"; table 9 of issue 32/88 gives the latest available figures up to 1987.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Vietnamese Refugees

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for how many Vietnamese refugees the United Kingdom has provided sanctuary during each of the last five years.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson) on 29 November.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Vietnamese refugees are currently in Hong Kong.

Mr. Waldegrave: On 30 November there were 25,197 Vietnamese boat people in Hong Kong, of whom 15,323 have refugee status.

Human Rights

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Soviet Government about the possibility of a human rights conference in Moscow; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have made it clear to the Russians at various levels and on several occasions that we view their proposal with scepticism and that they would need to make considerale improvements in their human rights record before we could contemplate a CSCE human rights meeting in Moscow.

Raoul Wallenberg

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise with Mr. Gorbachev and Mr. Shevardnadze the case of Mr. Raoul Wallenberg; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Soviet authorities are already well aware of the interest shown by this Government and by the British public in knowing what became of this brave Swede.

Lord Diamond (Photograph)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairsif he will order an investigation as to how the photograph from the MI6 file on the former Labour Minister, Lord Diamond, came to be published on the front page of the Sunday Express on 14 February.

Mr. Waldegrave: It has been the policy of successive Governments not to comment on stories of this kind.

Crete (Medals)

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there is any restriction on members of the British armed services who served in Crete during the second world war receiving any commemorative medal issued by the Greek Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The acceptance and wearing of foreign orders, decorations and medals by British subjects is governed by the Foreign and Commonwealth Orders Regulations 1969. A copy of these regulations was placed in the Library of the House in reply to my right hon. Friend's question which was answered on 27 May 1988. These regulations would apply to any commemorative medal issued by the Greek Government if it is intended to be worn.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Pornography

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Attorney-General what references have been made from courts of the United Kingdom to the courts of the European Community, Luxembourg, in respect of intra-community trade in material judged pornographic by courts in the United Kingdom but also subject to articles relating to trade in the treaty of Rome.

The Attorney-General: Questions concerning the interpretation of articles 30 and 36 of the treaty of Rome in the context of proceedings relating to the importation of indecent or obscene articles have been referred by United Kingdom courts to the European Court in two cases: in 1979, by the House of Lords in the case of R. v. Henn and Darby, and in 1984, by the High Court in the case of Conegate Limited v. Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

I understand that questions relating to article 30 have recently been referred to the European Court in criminal proceedings concerning the licensing of sex shops. The United Kingdom has not formally been notified of such a case by the European Court.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Sylvan High School, Croydon

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what approach he has received from the London borough of Croydon about the conversion of Sylvan high school into a city technology college; and what steps he is taking to consult the parents.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand that the London borough of Croydon is currently consulting interested parties, including parents, about the possible closure of the Sylvan high school and the establishment of a city technology college in its premises. Responsibility for carrying out appropriate consultations rests with Croydon.

Costs (Inner London)

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schools are to be taken over by each of the inner London borough councils as a result of the abolition of the Inner London education authority.

Mrs. Rumbold: At this stage it is not possible to say precisely how many schools each inner London council will inherit on 1 April 1990. Councils are required to list in their development plans the schools that they propose to maintain. In general, schools will be transferred to the council in whose area they are situated, although it is in principle possible for them to be transferred to a different council if, exceptionally, local circumstances warrant this. Future arrangements for the maintenance of the residential special schools located outside inner London are currently under discussion with the inner London councils and ILEA.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will set out the allowances made to each inner-London borough council in respct of education costs to be incurred in 1988-89, indicating how the total figure and the individual allocations have been arrived at;

(2) what representations he has received from inner-London boroughs about the adequacy of the allowance made to them for education costs in 1988-89; and what has been his response.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government is making available grant of £3 million in 1988-89 in respect of expenditure by the inner London councils on their preparation for the transfer of education responsibilities. Each borough may claim up to £240,000, and the City of London £120,000, reflecting the fact that the major items of preparatory expenditure this year will be common to all councils. A small number of boroughs have made representations about the amount of grant available in 1988-89, but we have informed them that we believe the sums available will be adequate to meet reasonable preparatory costs.

Haberdashers Aske's Hatcham Schools, Deptford

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make available a sum of not less than £4 million in capital funding to the Haberdashers Aske's Hatcham school, in Deptford, in the event of city technology colleges being established on the sites of these schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: An occasional professional assistant working for the Department visited the schools in July at the invitation of the governors to advise on possible modifications to the buildings. As a result of this, the governors have concluded that adaptation of the premises to meet the objectives of the CTC programme might cost £4 million. This is in line with capital grants to CTCs already announced. Any approach by the governors to my right hon. Friend to establish a CTC in place of these schools will be treated strictly on its merits.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if the guidance issued by his Department in circular 11/88 on the use of interviews in admissions procedures for non-selective county and voluntary schools is intended to apply to the Haberdashers Aske's Hatcham schools in Deptford; and if he will make a statement on the implications of changing the terms of articles of government for the schools to take account of this guidance.

Mrs. Rumbold: The guidance in circular 11/88 is meant for all county and voluntary schools. In the Department's view, non-selective schools may not have, as criteria for admission, arrangements which involve selection by reference to ability or aptitude, including any arrangements which, by implication, carry an element of selection, such as headteacher interview to assess the qualities a child might bring to the school.

The making of the articles of government of individual voluntary schools is a matter for the maintaining local education authority, which is required to secure the agreement of the school governing body to the terms of the document. In the event of disagreement, the matter can be referred to my right hon. Friend for determination.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received seeking approval of, or advice on, any draft curriculum for the proposed city technology colleges to be established on the site of the Haberdashers Aske's Hatcham schools in Deptford; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand that a governors' working party which is currently considering various options for the schools' future, including seeking to become a city technology college, has had a paper prepared on a possible CTC curriculum. When this paper was in preparation my officials were asked to give technical advice on how far its contents were in line with the requirements and objectives of the CTC programme.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has assessed whether the details of the membership bodies and funding arrangements set out under the three options in the consultation document entitled, "Securing the Future of the Schools," issued in July by the governors of the Haberdasher Aske's Hatcham schools in Deptford are in line with the guidance of his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: In preparing this document, the Governors sought advice from my officials on the statutory provisions relating to the three options outlined for the schools' future. They also sought advice on whether the plans outlined under the CTC option would meet the requirements and objectives of the CTC programme.

Implementation of possible plans for grant maintained status set out under option 2 of the document would be subject to the publication by the governors of proposals under section 62 of the Education Reform Act 1988, and their approval by my right hon. Friend. Implementation of the CTC plans would require the governors to give notice of their intention to discontinue the schools under the provision of section 14 of the Education Act 1944. They are likely to need my right hon. Friend's leave to give such notice. Any decisions which fall to him will be taken strictly on their merits and in the light of the individual circumstances, including the consultations undertaken by the governors.

Student Loans

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the meetings which have taken place and the meetings scheduled to take place between his Department and the banking and financial services sector in respect of proposals for student loans; and if he will give an interim report of the progress made in these talks.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No. Like all discussions of a commercial nature, these discussions are confidential.

Students (Work)

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the numbers of young people leaving universities and polytechnics and being available for work in each of the next five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson [pursuant to his reply, 1 December 1988, c. 354-5]: I regret that, due to a typing error, my answer gave a figure for 1992 of 150,000. This should be 105,000. The corrected answer is therefore as follows:

Future recruitment and, certainly, students' intentions after qualifying, are obviously difficult to predict. A key factor over the next five years is the continuing fall in the traditional student entry age group. However, due to increasing participation rates and greater recruitment of part-time and mature students, numbers generally are projected to hold up against that trend. Indeed, the number of home students at higher education institutions in Great Britain who were under 21 on entry and, on qualifying, would enter the labour market is estimated to grow from nearly 100,000 in 1987 to about 105,000 in 1992.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Companies Registration Office

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has any plans to change the role of the Companies Registration Office following its launch as an executive agency.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 30 November 1988]: The role of Companies House as an executive agency is set out in the policy and resources framework document, a copy of which is in the Library.

Environmental Protection

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will ban the import of products produced with chlorofluorocarbons from non-signature countries to the Montreal protocol.

Mr. Atkins: The Montreal protocol on substances that deplete the ozone layer which the United Kingdom signed on 16 September 1987 and expects to ratify this month, has provision for such controls to be applied by parties within four years of its entry into force to goods containing chlorofluorocarbons and halons. The protocol also has provision for the feasibility of such controls to be considered by parties, in respect of goods made with but not containing these substances, within five years of its entry into force.

The Government will, with the European Community and other parties, consider the implications and acceptability of such controls at the appropriate time.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will impose a mandatory labelling scheme on producers of aerosol cans to distinguish which products contain substances which damage the ozone layer.

Mr. Atkins: The Government continue to believe that this is a matter best left to the operation of the market, rather than rigid legislative control. We welcome the decision earlier this year by the British Aerosol Manufacturers Association to label products not containing CFCs. We also await with interest the outcome of discussions, in the context of the resolution agreed by the Council of Ministers on 16 June, between the European Commission and the European aerosol and other industries on the conclusion of a voluntary agreement for a common Community label for chlorofluorocarbon-free products.

Civil Defence

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether the assessment referred to in his written answer of 12 February 1986, Official Report. column 483, to the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden), of the essential requirements which industry could be called on to supply for civil defence purposes, and industry's capability to meet them has been completed; and if he proposes to place a copy of the completed assessment in the Library.

Mr. Forth: Work on this exercise continues. The results will remain confidential.

TRANSPORT

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what plans he has to recommend higher fastening torques for wheels on heavy goods vehicles;

(2) what is the estimate of the number of road accidents over the past five years attributable to wheel loss on heavy goods vehicles because of inadequate fastening;

(3) what plans he has to require that coned nuts used in the fitting of lorry wheels be replaced by flat nuts.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Since the beginning of 1983, there have been 130 wheel detachments reported to the vehicle inspectorate. They resulted in 10 fatalities and 24 serious injuries.

Wheel security on commercial vehicles has been the subject of recent research by the Motor Industry Research Association, sponsored by the Institute of Road Transport Engineers and the Department of Trade and Industry.

The Department and the British Standards Institution expect to receive the full research reports shortly. These will be carefully considered to see if any changes are needed in the current British Standard and regulations.

Concessionary Fares

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to which districts in England do not have any system of concessionary bus fares for any category of pensioners and which districts confine their concessionary fare system to those pensioners on income support.

Mr. Portillo: According to information supplied on a voluntary basis to the Department in 1986-87, 27 of the 332 English districts outside London have no system of concessionary bus fares for those of state pensionable age and 22 of those districts which do have such schemes specify an income restriction for eligibility.

Speed Limits

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of lorries using Britain's motorways he estimates are in breach of speed limits.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A survey of vehicle speeds on motorways, under conditions where traffic was able to flow freely, found that 22 per cent. of heavy goods vehicles travelling on motorways were exceeding their speed limit of 60 miles per hour in 1987.

During a similar survey in 1983, the corresponding figure was 39 per cent.

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to require lorries to instal speed limiters to prevent them breaking speed limits.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Not at present.

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the number of accidents involving fatalities or serious injury which occurred through lorries breaking speed limits on Britain's motorways for each year between 1983 and 1987.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Data are not collected on the causes of accidents.

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he is considering steps to facilitate the introduction of roadside and car-mounted cameras to monitor road speeds.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have been asked to reply.

The road traffic law review which was published in April recommended the use of cameras to detect speeding and traffic light offences. The Government have endorsed in principle the review's conclusion that the use of cameras for these purposes is acceptable and that satisfactory procedures can be developed for using the evidence from such devices. We shall be announcing our conclusions on the review as a whole early in the new year.

Leeds-Bradford Airport

Mr. Merlyn Rees: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will meet the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority to discuss the monitoring, the timing and the regulation of scheduled flights to and from Leeds-Bradford airport.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to discuss these matters with the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he has any plans, in the interest of safety, to require a review of the designs for Channel tunnel rail shuttle vehicles; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if the railway inspectorate and the marine directorate have been asked to investigate the safety procedures for the operation of the Channel tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: The approval of the Secretary of State is required for any train operating through the tunnel, including shuttle trains, and he will of course be able to look to the railway inspectorate and the marine directorate if necessary for advice on relevant proposals from Eurotunnel.

More generally, Eurotunnel is required under the Channel fixed link concession agreement to submit to the United Kingdom-French intergovernmental commission the general characteristics of the design of the tunnel and the associated transport system including rolling stock, with particular emphasis on safety aspects, and also proposed safety arrangements including operating rules and emergency procedures. Eurotunnel has already submitted a number of design proposals, though so far for the rail shuttle vehicles only conceptual proposals, and it has yet to submit its operating rules and emergency procedures. The intergovernmental commission has the assistance of the United Kingdom-French safety authority, and the commission and the authority can look for assistance to bodies such as the railway inspectorate and the marine directorate. (The deputy chief inspecting officer of railways is in fact a member of the authority).

Pavements (Parking)

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to reintroduce his Department's campaign against parking on pavements.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The campaign is continuing. We have issued more than 37,000 leaflets and posters this year with the message "Pavements are for People". The pavement parking problem has also been publicised frequently on television.

London Underground

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the report of the manning by the London fire brigade, carried out in the current year, into the whole of London Underground.

Mr. Portillo: I am not aware of such a report and would ask the hon. Member for details of the report to which he refers.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many uniformed officers of the British Transport police are usually deployed underground on the London Underground.

Mr. Portillo: On an average day 102 uniformed officers are deployed, on a three shift basis, on the Underground network.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the report of the London fire brigade's inspection of six London Underground stations in March.

Mr. Portillo: Publication is a matter for London Underground. I understand that LUL will be publishing reports on such inspections in future, through the London Regional Passenger Committee, in line with the recommendation in Mr. Fennell's report on the King's Cross fire.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussion he has had with London Regional Transport on improving Underground platform safety and increasing the number of platform staff at Underground stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: The statutory responsibility for Underground safety rests with London Regional Transport. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has asked LRT to make regular reports to him on its implementation of the recommendations of the Fennell report which include a number relevant to platform safety.

Road Accidents (Lorries)

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents leading to fatalities or serious injury involved lorries on Britain's motorways, for each year between 1983 and 1987.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The table shows the number of fatal and serious accidents on motorways in Great Britain between 1983 and 1987 in which heavy goods vehicles were involved.

Accidents on motorways involving heavy goods vehicles
Great Britain: 1983 to 1987

Severity	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987
Fatal	49	70	68	56	78
Serious	260	246	237	269	318

Mr. Mullins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give figures for the number of fatal accidents involving heavy goods vehicles for each year from 1979 to 1987.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The table shows the number of fatal accidents in Great Britain between 1979 and 1987 in which heavy goods vehicles were involved:

Fatal accidents involving heavy goods vehicles: Great Britain 1979-1987

HOME DEPARTMENT

Horse and Greyhound Racing

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to widen the scope of his discussions on the 28th levy scheme and the feasibility study into the privatisation of the Horserace Totalisator Board to encompass an inquiry into the finances of both horse and greyhound racing.

Mr. Hurd: No. I do not believe that it would be practicable or necessary to hold such an inquiry in deciding what the 28th horserace betting levy scheme should be. The feasibility study on privatising the Horserace Totalisator Board takes account of the implications of privatisation for the regulation of gambling and the health of horseracing. I understand that Lloyds Merchant Bank, which is conducting the study, has already had the benefit of views on the circumstances of horse and greyhound racing from the British Greyhound Racing Board. I am considering separately a request from that board for an inquiry into the off-course betting industry and its relationship to the finances of both forms of racing.

Passport Office, Newport

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what representations he has received concerning the situation at the passport office in Newport, Gwent;

(2) if he has any plans to increase staffing levels at the passport office in Newport, Gwent;

(3) what proposals he has to reduce the backlog and delays at the passport office in Newport.

Mr. Renton: Passport applications to the Newport passport office are being processed within six working days. There is no backlog of work. No representations have been received specifically about the passport office in Newport. However, a number of hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Newport, East, have written recently about staffing levels in the passport department, following an approach to them by the Civil and Public Services Association and the National Union of Civil and Public Servants. Replies will be sent shortly.

Football Hooligans

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will take action to prevent convicted football hooligans from travelling to football matches abroad.

Mr. Hurd: Yes. I intend to bring forward proposals for the courts to be given powers to prevent convicted football hooligans from attending matches abroad, by requiring them to report to an agency in this country at times when certain matches are due to take place. The courts would have power to impose a restriction order on a person convicted of a football-related offence here in any case in which the order would help to reduce the risk of disorder and violence at matches abroad. I am also considering how a restriction order might similarly be imposed following conviction for a football-related offence abroad. Provisions will be included in the Football Spectators Bill, to be introduced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Keith Mulcahy

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Halifax will receive a reply to her letter written on 26 October concerning her constituent, Keith Mulcahy, and his treatment by the governor of Armley prison.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I replied to the hon. Member on 1 December.

Electronic Tagging

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many civil servants have volunteered to take part in practical experiments with electronic tagging schemes; what have been the results; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 1 December 1988]: Two officials voluntarily wore electronic monitoring devices. The preliminary tests yielded useful experience as part of our evaluation of these devices, but were not intended to be a systematic assessment of the equipment. Full trials in two or three areas will begin shortly.

Equal Opportunities Commission

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chair of the Equal Opportunities Commission; and whether the commission's recommendation for strengthening the Sex Discrimination and Equal Pay Acts were discussed.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 1 December 1988]: My right hon. Friend met the then chairman of the Equal Opportunities Commission on 26 April to discuss its proposals for strengthening the Acts. At the meeting it was agreed that the first step was for the Home Office to consult the other Departments concerned with the proposals. I have had a number of meetings with the chairman, most recently on 1 November.

Safer City Initiatives

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria he uses in establishing safer city initiatives; and whether he intends to establish a safer city initiative in Liverpool.

Mr. Hurd [holding answer 1 December 1988]: The criteria used to select safer cities initiatives are that the area must (i) be an unban programme area, (ii) have a high crime rate, (iii) be targeted for Government action, and (iv) be willing to participate in the safer cities programme. Nine areas have already agreed to join the programme and a futher seven will be selected shortly. If Liverpool applies, it will be one of the areas considered when coming to a decision.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Currency Reserves

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the gold and foreign currency reserves at the latest available date compared with 1958, 1968, 1978 and each year since 1982, and the extent to which the change was due to a change in the value of the assets held at the beginning of each period; to what extent the increase in the reserves was sterilised by the issue of debt instruments; and if he will give particulars of the holdings of such instruments at the latest available date.

Mr. Lilley: In October this year the official reserves stood at more than $50 billion. The levels of official reserves for earlier years are shown on page 147 of Economic Trends, annual supplement 1988 edition, and in table 28 of the monthly Economic Trends, published by the Central Statistical Office. Details of annual valuation changes since 1979 in the official reserves can be found in pages 98-99 of Financial Statistics, explanatory handbook: 1988 edition, also published by the Central Statistical Office.

The Government's policy of fully funding the PSBR, the underlying changes in the reserves and maturing debt, although not necessarily in the same financial year in which they occur, was last enunciated in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Mansion House speech on 20 October. It is not possible to distinguish the assets used to fund the underlying changes in the reserves from those used for other funding.

Interest Rates

Mr. Pike: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received regarding the effect of high interest rates on levels of consumer credit.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend has received a number of such representations.

Civil Servants (Privileges)

Mr. Amess: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the privileges, other than privileged leave, given to established civil servants.

Mr. Brooke: The terms and conditions applying to established non-industrial civil servants are set out in the Civil Service pay and conditions of service code, a copy of which is in the Library.

Staff Dispersal

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about proposals to relocate offices for Government Departments away from London.

Mr. Brooke: I said in the Adjournment debate on 9 May 1988, at column 130, that I would give the House, at the earliest convenient opportunity, an account of the progress made and planned by Departments under the successor policy to the Government's dispersal programme which I announced on 31 March. Most major Departments already have serious and substantial reviews of locations in hand. I intend to give the House a fuller report in the early months of 1989.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning the effects of present levels of interest rates and inflation on manufacturing industries in the north-west.

Mr. Lilley: A number. Manufacturing industry—wherever it is located—has most to fear from any resurgence of inflation. The Government's monetary policy will ensure continued downward pressure on inflation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing Benefit

Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will adjust the weighting of student private sector rent allowance claims from April 1990 onwards to ensure that the level of administrative subsidy in respect of such cases continues to reflect their complexity and difficulty.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The arrangements for allocating housing benefit administration costs subsidy to local authorities for 1990-91 will be the subject of discussions between the Department and the local authority associations during 1989. No final decisions have yet been taken but it has been agreed with the associations that the weighting given to student cases should be reviewed as part of those discussions.

Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether local education authorities will be reimbursed for the full cost of developing and implementing the liaison arrangements with the rent officer when students put in a claim for housing benefit comprising a claim for rent allowances only.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government have made £1 million available to local authorities for their costs in preparing for the new rent officer arrangements from April 1989 and conducting pilot schemes. In addition, the overall level of provision for local authorities' housing benefit administration costs in 1989-90 has been increased by 1 per cent. to take account of the new arrangements. It is for each local authority to decide how best to allocate the resources available to it for the rent officer arrangements and no separate allocations has been made for claims from students.

Income Support

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many 16 and 17-year-olds in the Ayrshire, Dumfries and Galloway area currently receive (a) income support and (b) bridging allowance.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of 16 and 17-year-olds in Ayrshire, Dumfries and Galloway who were receiving bridging allowance as at 10 November 1988 (the latest date for which figures are available) was 287.

I regret that the information regarding 16 and 17-year-olds currently in receipt of income support could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Child Benefit (Children in Care)

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security under what conditions child benefit payments are made for children in care; whether he has any plans to alter these arrangements; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Child benefit usually stops when a child has been in care for eight weeks but it can continue for longer if the child visits the claimant for stays of at least a week at a time; it can also continue if there is an ongoing arrangement that the child lives with the claimant for at least a day every week.

There are no plans to alter these arrangements, apart from some technical amendments to child benefit rules which will be necessary to reflect proposed changes in child care law.

Pensions

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by how much the pensioner's earnings limit has changed since November 1978 in (a) cash terms, (b) real terms and (c) as a percentage of average earnings; and whether he will increase it in April 1989.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Since November 1978 the pensioner's earnings limit has increased in cash terms by £30 to £75. In real terms there has been a decrease of £20. In November 1978 the pensioner's earnings limit was 51·5 per cent. of average male manual workers' earnings. In September 1988 the percentage was 36·4.

The Secretary of State has a statutory duty to review the earnings limit every year. We shall not be increasing it in April 1989.

Widows' Benefit

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by what percentage the addition to widows' benefit for a dependent child, including child benefit, is to be increased in April 1989; and what was the percentage increase in prices over the 12 months to September 1988.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In common with the other non-income-related benefits the child dependency increase payable with widows' benefit is to be uprated by the best of both worlds approach which my right hon. Friend explained to the House on 27 October. The child dependency increase will rise by slightly more than 6·5 per cent. from April 1989. The addition to widows' benefit for a dependent child, including child benefit, will be increased by 3·5 per cent. The percentage increase in the published RPI over the 12 months to September 1988 was 5·9 per cent.

DEFENCE

Tank Purchase

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce which new tank the British Army will be purchasing.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) on 29 November (column 566).

Facilities (Woolwich)

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for his Department's facilities at Woolwich.

Mr. Freeman: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) on 31 October 1988 at column 531. I also refer him to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement on 1 December 1988 at column 352.

Armaments Depot (Milford Haven)

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the result of the consultation process concerning Milford Haven Royal Navy armaments depot.

Mr. Freeman: After careful consideration of all the arguments put forward by the trades unions, local authorities and other interested parties for the retention of the depot, I have decided that for overwhelming economic and operational reasons RNAD Milford Haven will close. The depot will be converted to a non-explosive storage facility by March 1990 and closed finally by March 1991, before which the site will be cleared of ordnance.

As I informed my hon. Friend during the debate on 28 July 1988, consideration of the removal and demolition of buildings is an integral part of the disposal process. We shall consider what needs to be done when we examine other uses for the site. It is our intention that a new use be found for the site immediately upon military vacation.

The Ministry of Defence will cooperate with the Welsh Office and local authorities in trying to find alternative uses for the site. Every effort will also be made to find alternative employment for the staff employed at the depot whose loyalty and dedication in the past has been highly valued.

European Fighter Aircraft

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the development of the European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) on 29 November at column 568.

Trident

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimate for the cost of Trident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The current estimate for Trident is £9,043 million at 1987-88 prices and on exchange rate of £1 = $1·62. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the House on 29 November, a revised estimate will be announced early next year.

Gurkha Cantonment

Mr. John Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if a date has been set for the conversion of the Gurkha recruiting, resettlement and welfare cantonment at Dharan to civilian use; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As part of my Department's drive to rationalise support and infrastructure facilities, the site at Dharan is to be handed over to the Nepalese Government for civilian use with effect from 1 January 1990. The use to which the site will be put after that date is a matter for the Nepalese Government, but it is our understanding that the provision of health facilities, centred around the existing British military hospital, is likely to be the major priority. The British Government have expressed willingness to offer aid to assist in the transition to Nepalese management. It should be stressed that the decision to convert the Dharan site to civilian use is not related to, or dependent upon, decisions on the future of the Gurkhas as a whole.

WALES

North-south Road Link

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what proposals he has to develop the A470 as the main road link between north and south Wales;

(2) what proposals he has to provide an improved road link between north and south Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Government's plans for development of the A470 and other road links between north and south Wales are set out in "Roads in Wales 1985".

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he proposes to take to ensure that the opportunities presented by the Channel tunnel scheme come to Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: We have already taken a number of actions to ensure that the opportunities presented by the Channel tunnel come to Wales. These include the series of seminars we have arranged to increase awareness of the single European market and the appointment of a Channel fixed link liaison officer to advise companies in Wales of opportunities to tender for contracts as they arise. In addition the Department is represented on the consultative forum which British Rail has set up as part of the process of planning its Channel tunnel services. We will continue to take all necessary steps to ensure that businesses in Wales are aware of the great opportunities which are now arising.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the number of planning appeal decisions in Wales which were (a) allowed, (b) dismissed, (c) withdrawn and (d) undetermined for each of the last five years; and if he will express the numbers allowed and dismissed as a percentage of those determined.

Mr. Peter Walker: Planning decisions by local authorities for each of the last five financial years are as follows (the information is not available for applications withdrawn and undetermined):

Year	Allowed	Per cent.	Dismissed	Per cent.
1983-84	23,362	89·4	2,778	10·6
1984-85	21,475	87·7	3,015	12·3
1985-86	21,656	87·8	3,010	12·2

1987-88	24,106	87·2	3,539	12·8

Planning appeal decisions are as follows:

Year	Allowed	Per cent.	Dismissed	Per cent.	Withdrawn	Undetermined at year end
1983	241	35·9	431	64·1	167	430
1984	229	36·3	402	63·7	161	444
1985	261	42·5	353	57·5	172	570

Year	Allowed	Per cent.	Dismissed	Per cent.	Withdrawn	Undetermined at year end
1985-86[1]	312	44·6	388	55·4	175	541
1986-87[1]	326	41·2	465	58·8	189	591
1987-88[1]	281	32·4	587	67·6	179	610

[1] The basis for the recorded statistics was changed from the calendar year to the financial year from 1 April 1985.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of planning appeal decisions which were (a) allowed, (b) dismissed, (c) withdrawn and (d) undetermined in each of the Welsh national parks in each of the last five years; and if he will express the numbers allowed and dismissed as a percentage of those determined.

Mr. Peter Walker: This information is not available.

SCOTLAND

Nurses (Grading)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each health board the number of nurses in each grade, and when they were first informed of that grade, prior to any review or appeal.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is as follows:

Health board	Staff in post (whole-time equivalents)	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I
Argyll and Clyde	4,354	1,542	73	399	576	649	299	629	96	91

All figures rounded to nearest whole number.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if there will be additional money to fund successful nurse regrading appeals.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Additional funding has been made available to meet in full the cost of the nurses' pay award this year, including regrading. Health boards will be expected to meet their commitments from within the total resources made available to them.

Ambulance Service (Glasgow)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions the Scottish ambulance service has had with greater Glasgow health board concerning accident and emergency services.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There are regular meetings between the Scottish ambulance service and the Greater Glasgow health board at which all aspects of the ambulance service are discussed.

W. Howden

Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has received recent representations from solicitors acting on behalf of W. Howden, a prisoner held in Edinburgh's Saughton prison; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No representations have been received from solicitors representing Mr. Howden since January 1988. A review of Mr. Howden's suitability for release on life licence is in train.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list (a) the discharges and (b) the deaths, by length of stay, including percentage change in numbers and percentage distribution, of patients suffering from schizophrenic psychoses, in Scotland in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 28 November]: Provisional information for 1987 on percentage distribution of discharges and deaths of patients suffering from schizophrenic psychoses contained in the following table. Percentage change in numbers cannot be provided as the period over which to assess change is not specified.

Discharges and deaths of patients with schizophrenic psychoses from all mental hospitals in 1987 showing distributions of total length of stay

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the admissions by diagnosis and order of admissions, including percentage change in numbers and rates per 100,000 population, of patients suffering from schizophrenia psychoses in Scotland in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 28 November]: The available information, which is provisional, is given in the table:

Admissions to psychiatric hospitals with the diagnosis of schizophrenic psychoses, 1987

ENVIRONMENT

Ozone Layer

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that the electronics industry is aware of the dangers to the atmosphere of CFC 113 in cleaning fluids and to encourage greater use of recycling and recovery and of other cleaning methods.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Officials of the Department of the Environment and of the Department of Trade and Industry hold regular meetings with representatives of the users of chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs), including the electronics industry, on the steps that they are taking to reduce use of CFCs to the maximum possible extent. This includes making more efficient use of CFCs as well as switching to alternative substances and processes where feasible. The electronics industry is introducing recycling plant and stringent operating practices to minimise CFC emissions and is playing a full part in the revision and strengthening of the EC code of practice on CFC 113 and encouraging its adoption as an EC standard. Officials from both Departments have participated in seminars organised by the electronics industry on alternative cleaning methods and have disseminated to the industry information on the steps being taken internationally on this front.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on research into the destruction of chlorofluorocarbons.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The first meeting of the parties to the Montreal protocol, planned for April 1989, will be invited to establish a standing technical committee to review and recommend for approval by the parties methods for destroying chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs). Officials of the Department of the Environment and of the Department of Trade and Industry are discussing the work being done in this area with representatives from British industry.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to limit the escape of chlorofluorocarbons into the atmosphere as a result of their use in the food packaging industry.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Under the Montreal protocol measures to control consumption of specified chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) are based on reducing overall supply rather than individual uses. Market forces will determine how available supplies are used. We are, nevertheless, keen that user industries should take steps on a voluntary basis to reduce use of CFCs to the maximum possible extent. We therefore welcome the intention of all United Kingdom manufacturers of extruded polystyrene food containers to phase out use of the CFCs controlled by the protocol.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he will take to eradicate chlorofluorocarbons from domestic use.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Under the Montreal protocol international action to reduce emissions of chlorofluorocarbons is based on measures to control overall production and consumption of CFCs. The protocol will be implemented within the European Community by way of a regulation laying down common rules to limit overall production and consumption of these chemicals. Within that regulatory framework we are strongly encouraging user industries to reduce use of CFCs on a voluntary basis to the maximum possible extent. The British aerosol industry expects to phase out non-essential use of CFCs in aerosols by the end of 1989. Other sectors are also taking steps to reduce their dependency on CFCs. Consumers have an important role to play in assisting this process.

Local Authority Employees

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a breakdown of the number of local authority employees by (a) sex and (b) ethnic origin.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In June 1988 local authorities in England employed 841,000 males and 1,479,000 females in general services (ie excluding law and order services). The information on ethnic origin of local authority staff is not collected centrally.

Carbon Monoxide (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will initiate a consistent series of carbon monoxide measurements for Nottingham.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. In my reply to the hon. Member of 28 November [Official Report, Tuesday 29 November, column 131] I explained that the Department is making measurements of carbon monoxide in London where the impact of traffic, the dominant source, is likely to be among the highest in the country. I am not aware of any factors which suggest that conditions in Nottingham warrant additional monitoring.

Pollution

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will extend the new requirement for industry to use the best available technology to reduce the polluting effect of industrial discharges to existing dischargers; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Works scheduled under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 must be operated using the "best practicable means" to prevent atmospheric emissions and to abate any emissions that cannot be prevented. This incorporates the use of best available technology not entailing excessive cost for newly scheduled works. Existing scheduled works are reviewed periodically and, if appropriate, the controls over emissions upgraded.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which water authorities have reached the permitted levels of ammoniacal nitrogen in their river systems for each year since 1983.

Mr. Moynihan: Water authorities set their own water quality objectives which may include standards for ammonia. Compliance with such standards is a matter for the authorities. However, some 16,000 kms of river length in England and Wales have been designated by authorities for the purposes of the EC directive on the "Quality of freshwater needing protection or improvement in order to support fish life" (75/659/EEC) which does contain ammonia standards. The only compliance data held centrally relate to 1984 and show that overall some 97 per cent. of the length of designated rivers met the ammonia standards in the directive. Results for later years are held by the authorities concerned.

Wildlife and Countryside Act

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what organisations he intends to consult prior to introducing legislation to amend section 53 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have sought the views of the principal organisations representing the interests of farmers and landowners, the users of public rights of way, the local authority associations and the rights of way review committee on the difficulties and deficiencies that the proposed legislation should seek to resolve.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take action to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent. by the year 2000.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government is concerned to reduce emissions of carbon dioxide (CO_2) and other "greenhouse" gases. The realistic pricing of energy to encourage its efficient use and the continued development of sources of power other than fossil fuels will help to reduce the generation of CO_2. The exhaust emission standards for small cars agreed by the European Community last month preserve the incentive to develop fuel-efficient "lean-burn" engines.

We are not yet in a position, given our present understanding of the science, to devise precise reduction targets which are feasible or related to specific environmental objectives. Our first priority therefore is to improve our understanding of the problems of climatic change and their impact on the environment. We are initiating our own research amd playing a full part in international efforts to this end.

Lowland Heaths

Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will support the implementation of the flora, fauna and habitat directive in order to protect threatened lowland heaths in Great Britain.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The draft directive proposed by the European Commission is unacceptable to all member states of the community. In Great Britain the statutory procedures imposed following designation as a site of special scientific interest under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 (as amended) ensure that the conservation interest of the important areas of this type of habitat is protected from potentially damaging operations and is taken fully into account in all land use decisions.

County Hall, London

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from London borough councils about the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of county hall; and what reply he has given.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Representations about the distribution of proceeds from the sale of county hall have recently been received from the London boroughs of Greenwich, Kensington and Chelsea, Kingston, Lewisham, Redbridge, Westminster and Tower Hamlets. All London boroughs will be consulted about distribution in 1989-90 of capital receipts by the London Residuary Body, including any from county hall.

Rating Reform

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the amounts to be allowed to each local authority in (a) inner London and (b) outer London to meet the setting up costs of the community charge, indicating in each case the division between specific and block grant, and showing where available the local authority's own estimates of the costs involved.

Mr. Gummer: Column 1 of the table shows the London authorities' share of the £25 million capital allocation made available for 1988-89. My right hon. Friend announced on 21 October that a further allocation of £135 million would be made for 1989-90 and individual allocations from this total will shortly be made.

My right hon. Friend also announced on 21 October that half the provision of £110 million included in the 1989-90 RSG settlement for the current costs of preparing for the community charge will be met through a specific grant. Column 2 of the table sets out the estimated share of that £55 million for the London authorities. The remaining £55 million will be supported by rate support grant.

We do not have comprehensive figures for local authorities' own estimates of these costs. The figure of £110 million is in line with the estimate made by Price Waterhouse and is higher than the figure for current costs put forward by the local authority associations in July.

Nature Conservancy Council and Countryside Commission

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether new funding is to be made available to the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission to relieve pressure on their support for the voluntary sector; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The public expenditure allocations for 1989-90 announced for the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission should enable them to make grants to the voluntary and private sectors £1·85 million and £5 million respectively. The Nature Conservancy Council has also allocated additional resources of £440,000 for grants in the current year, as a result of savings elsewhere in the council's budget.

Marine Conservation and Bat Ecology

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures are to be taken to safeguard work carried out on practical projects and by volunteers in marine conservation and bat ecology, formerly supported by the Natural Environmental Research Council funds; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I understand that the Natural Environment Research Council has made some staff reductions in areas which it judges to have lower priority. The reductions include one post concerned with bat ecology, in a project which has used volunteer labour. The council has not funded marine conservation work using volunteers in recent years. We will continue to rely on our statutory advisers, the Nature Conservancy Council, for advice on conservation matters, supplemented as necessary by research commissioned by the Department.

Groundwater

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Halcrow report providing an assessment of groundwater quality in England and Wales will be published.

Mr. Howard: I am pleased to inform the House that the Halcrow report is published today. Copies of the report are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Water

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of the State for the Environment what progress is being made by the water authorities in preparation for the establishment of the National Rivers Authority.

Mr. Howard: I have today placed in the Library of the House summary schemes of organisation prepared by each water authority in conjunction with the National Rivers Authority Advisory Committee under my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Crickhowell.

These show the proposed organisation of the National Rivers Authority unit in each water authority region, and together with a summary document indicate that about 6,500 staff are likely to transfer to the National Rivers Authority, of whom about 50 per cent. will work on flood defence/land drainage work, and about a third on environmental and water resource functions.

Provisional estimates suggest that existing water authority assets to a value of £460 million are expected to transfer to the National Rivers Authority. Inevitably, these figures are provisional at this stage, and the final figures will depend on decisions on various matters still under consideration.

I should like to pay tribute to the water authorities, and to the National Rivers Authority Advisory Committee, for the work done so far on the restructuring of the industry.

These documents show that the water authorities are well on target for the operation of separate National Rivers Authority units from 1 April 1989. They represent a major step forward towards the establishment of a National Rivers Authority and the preparation for the privatisation of the utility functions.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of the State for the Environment (1) if he will state, in respect of each water authority, the area of land which has been designated as (a) sites of special scientific interest, (b) national parks and (c) areas of outstanding natural

(2) if he will state, in respect of each statutory water company, the area of land which has been designated as (a) sites of special scientific interest, (b) national parks and (c) areas of outstanding natural beauty.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 1 December 1988]: This information is not available.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Export Refund System

Mr. Allen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what is the total of outstanding payments to United Kingdom food manufacturers from the IBAP;

(2) if he will estimate the payments outstanding to small firms arising from the IBAP processing delays; and what arrangements are being made for loans to cover emergency requirements;

(3) what representations he has had from the makers of cakes and biscuits regarding the adequacy of the export refund system;

(4) what is his estimate of the total cost of the current backlog of the export refund payments in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The net value of outstanding export refund payments is currently estimated at around £35 million, about 70 per cent. below the peak in the summer. I regret that separate figures are not available for any specific category or size of trader. There have been a number of representations to both Ministers and officials from cake and biscuit manufacturers about the impact of delayed payments. The Intervention Board is doing all in its power to reduce outstanding payments and estimate that by the end of the year some 95 per cent. of all claims by value will be paid within two months of becoming payable. As announced on 28 July, the board has been authorised to pay compensation on export refunds paid after more than two months from the time they become payable. This is a fair means of recompensing all exporters who incur additional costs as a result of delays and, by comparison with other methods of compensation, minimises the need to divert resources from processing claims and eliminating payment delays.

Pollution

Mr. McTaggart: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has on the level of PCB emissions in the seas around Britain.

Mr. MacGregor: The quality status report prepared by scientists of North sea countries for the North sea conference in 1987 recorded West German and Dutch data that 3·3 tonnes per year of PCBs entered the North sea from continental rivers. Levels of PCBs in United Kingdom rivers are below detectable levels. The extent of release of PCBs into the North sea from the Piper Alpha platform is being assessed at present.

Food Safety

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure that salmonella enteritidis is absent from eggs that might be consumed by the public.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 1 December 1988]: We are taking this issue very seriously. I am holding meetings with the various sectors of the industry—the eggs, poultry and feedingstuffs industries and the retailers. All are aware of the need to act to reassure consumers—their customers. Steps are being taken as a result. A comprehensive code of practice has already been agreed under the poultry health scheme. The eggs industry, which has already issued new instructions for producers, is meeting today to discuss the adoption of a similar code of practice. A joint feeding stuffs working party met yesterday to consider how we might tighten up enforcement of the feedingstuffs orders, and the preparation of a tough code of practice. A further working party, comprising scientists from my Ministry, the Department of Health and the egg industry have been studying urgently the scientific background to these outbreaks and will make recommendations soon.

All this is in addition to the excellent work of the State Veterinary Service, investigating every outbreak of salmonella enteritidis.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the implications for research into salmonella in poultry of the loss of three AFRC scientists at Bristol engaged in work related to food safety with regard to salmonella in poultry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 29 November 1988]: My Department undertakes ongoing reviews of all commissioned research. Following an extensive review of MAFF commissioned research in microbiology involving consultations with the Department of Health, the Public Health Laboratory Service, the AFRC Institute for Food Research, the food research associations and representatives of the food industry it was decided that work on manipulation of the microbial flora of the gut of young chicks should cease from April 1989 since it was now at the stage where the work was ready for industry to develop. This will not constitute a reduction in Government support on microbiological research, such as on salmonella. The funding is to be diverted to other important microbiological work. The work had been supported by MAFF and the AFRC for more than 10 years. Considerable effort has been made by the Institute for Food Research to interest the industry in the techniques which have been developed. Unfortunately, practical difficulties associated with the technique have proved unattractive to both the veterinary pharmaceutical and poultry industries at present. If future developments should make the work commercially feasible, and industry decides to come forward with funding, the work can be picked up again.

My Department commissions more than £1 million of research each year into the microbiological safety of food and gives a high priority to salmonella control. The deployment of staff at the IFR Bristol is a matter for the AFRC.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Psychiatric Nurses

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many community psychiatric nurses there have been in Northern Ireland in each of the last two years.

Mr. Needham: The information is as follows:

Year	Number
1987	115
1988	127

Beef

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he will put forward to provide alternative financial support for Northern Ireland beef farmers for the anticipated loss of £2·2 million should the proposal to end calf premium on 31 December be implemented.

Mr. Viggers: The ending of calf premium in Northern Ireland cannot be considered in isolation from the European Commission's overall proposals for revision of the beef regime. It is the Government's intention to seek adequate and fair premium support for beef producers in all areas of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make it his policy to oppose any limitations of numbers of male animals eligible for Euro-premium and seek to persuade the European Commission that beef produced from maiden heifers in Northern Ireland should qualify for any headage payment paid out on male animals.

Mr. Viggers: The European Commission's proposals for reform of the beef regime include termination of the beef variable premium and calf premium and the introduction of a special premium on male animals, subject to a headage limit, and an increase in the suckler cow premium. Difficult and detailed negotiations on this proposed package are still in progress. The Government's objectives are to seek adequate and fair premium support for beef producers in all parts of the United Kingdom at a reasonable cost to the Community budget and the United Kingdom taxpayer.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will seek to extend the operation of the United Kingdom beef variable premium until at least the end of the beef marketing year.

Mr. Viggers: If it is decided to discontinue the beef variable premium, the Government will seek adequate arrangements for orderly transition to any new premium system which is agreed. I cannot at this stage give any specific commitment on timing of changes because this depends on the progress of negotiations in and decisions by the EC Council of Agriculture Ministers.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many beef cows in Northern Ireland herds do not qualify for premium because of the rules relating to the proportion of income derived from farming and the proportion of time spent on the farm; what is the estimated loss of income by these rules to the Northern Ireland agriculture industry annually; and if he will seek to amend these rules so that all beef cows qualify for full premiums payable.

Mr. Viggers: The information is not available in the form requested. In the 1987-88 scheme year income checks were applied to 4,468 claims in Northern Ireland and as a result 1,569 claims (involving 6,224 cows and some £208,000 in premium) were withdrawn or failed the main occupation test. The qualifying rules of the beef cow premium scheme are laid down in EC legislation. They will be considered during the current review of the EC beef support arrangements. Any proposed amendment such as removal of the main occupation test will be studied carefully with regard to its budgetary and administrative impact.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many road accidents and how many injuries and death arising therefrom were reported during each of the past three years on the main public roads between Greyabbey and Kircubbin, County Down.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Theft

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many incidents of theft were reported to Greyabbey Royal Ulster Constabulary station during each of the past three years.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The numbers of incidents of theft reported to Greyabbey Royal Ulster Constabulary station during the past three years were:

	Numbers
1986	70
1987	98
1988 (to end of October)	37

Ards Peninsula

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Royal Ulster Constabulary stations there are in the Ards peninsula south of the line between Newtownards and Donaghadee; and what is the estimated winter and summer population in that sector of the Ards peninsula.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Ards peninsula falls within the Royal Ulster Constabulary sub-divisional area of Newtownards which comprises Newtownards, Donaghadee and Portaferry.

South of the line between Newtownards and Donaghadee, there is one Royal Ulster Constabulary station. It is estimated that the residential population of the area is approximately 21,000 and that in the peak holiday period the average number of staying visitors is about 2,000.

Slaughterhouses

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make it his policy to support a system of regional quotas to interested slaughtering plants on the basis of recent volumes as a means of ensuring an element of competition for available quotas and maintaining a place for smaller meat plants if proposals to invite tenders for intervention purchasing of beef proceed.

Mr. Viggers: No. Little information is available on how the tendering system for beef intervention proposed by the EC Commission will operate but regional or slaughter plant quotas based on recent volumes is not envisaged.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps will be taken by Her Majesty's Government to prevent large monopolistic interests from gaining control of the meat industry in Northern Ireland to the detriment of small meat plants by the proposed tendering for beef intervention.

Mr. Viggers: The legal text of the European Commission proposal to introduce tendering for beef intervention provides that > "the tender procedures must ensure equality of access for all persons interested".

The Government supports such an undertaking which, if approved by the EC Council of Ministers, should prevent large monopolistic interests from obtaining unfair advantages in the Northern Ireland meat industry.

Terrorism

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the rate of changes in the number of (a) incidents, (b) injuries and (c) deaths arising from terrorist acts between the three years before 15 November 1985 and the three years since that date.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information is as follows:

	1982	1983	1984	[1] 1985	[2] 1985	1986	1987	[3] 1988

Plastic Bullets

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much compensation has been paid as a result of rubber and plastic bullet injuries in Northern Ireland each year since 1968.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is not readily available since 1968 and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. However, since 1982 compensation paid as a result of rubber and plastic bullet injuries is as follows:

1982	39,250
1983	5,515
1984	57,800
1985	59,751
1986	245,250
1987	96,050
1988	[1] 7,750

[1] To October.

EMPLOYMENT

Statutory Minimum Wages

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many instances have been discovered since 1979 of employers breaking the law in failing to pay statutory minimum wages according to wage council agreements; and how many resultant prosecutions there have been.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is not available in the precise form requested because wages inspectorate statistics about compliance with wages orders are compiled on the basis of establishments rather than employers. With that proviso, the figures sought are shown in the following table.

Establishments underpaying and prosecutions for failing to pay not less than the legal minimum

	Number	Prosecutions
1979	10,969	12
1980	12,154	8
1981	10,074	8
1982	9,269	6
1983	9,842	2
1984	9,466	2
1985	9,064	2
1986	8,205	2
1987	4,443	4
[1] 1988	4,778	[2] 10

[1] At 30 October.

[2] At 30 November.

Establishments are classified as underpaying if one or more workers is found to be underpaid. In the typical case only one or two workers are affected. In 1987 the proportion of workers found to be underpaid in all checks conducted by the wages inspectorate was 3 per cent.

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to increase the staff of the nuclear installations inspectorate.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive plans to increase the number of nuclear installations inspectors working in the inspectorate from the current level of 127·5 (1 November 1988) to 140 by 1 April 1989.

Health and Safety

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report the total number of registered workplaces, the total number of employers and the number of factory inspectors who inspect workplaces for each Health and Safety Executive area for the years 1974 to 1987 inclusive.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is not available in the form requested.

The Health and Safety Executive does not hold information on the number of workplaces registered with the factory inspectorate for the years 1974 to 1977. The number of registered fixed premises for the years 1978 to 1987 is as follows:

Date	Number of Premises
1 January 1978	280,716
1 January 1979	300,718
1 January 1980	309,915
1 January 1981	309,100
[1]1 January 1982	576,456
1 January 1983	468,609
1 January 1984	393,237
31 March 1985	395,860
31 March 1986	399,885
31 March 1987	401,815

[1] The figure for 1982 is the first of those produced from a computerised database which was based on the Department of Employment census. The database was initially inflated by premises for which the Health and Safety Executive was not the enforcing authority and accounts for the high figures in 1982 and 1983.

Figures for the total number of registered fixed premises in each HSE area for the years 1978 to 1987 are not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Figures for the total number of employers for the years 1974 to 1987 inclusive are not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Figures for the number of factory inspectors who inspect workplaces for each HSE area between 1974 and 1979 could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. The number of factory inspectors employed in each HSE area on 1 April each year between 1980 and 1987 is as follows:

[1] The London north-west office is no longer regarded as a separate area office. Factory inspectors located there are outstationed from the London, north or London, south area offices.

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list (a) the number of prosecutions and (b) the average fine under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act for the years 1974 to 1987 inclusive.

Mr. Nicholls: The table shows the available information.

[1] Data include prosecutions taken by factory and agricultural inspectorates, explosives inspectorate, Her Majesty's mines and quarries inspectorate, nuclear installations inspectorate, railway inspectorate and the petroleum engineering division of the Department of Energy.

[2] All figures exclude the results of prosecutions taken by local authorities. The latest information for local authorities (LAs) relates to 1986-87, for which we know of about 390 informations laid under the Health and Safety at Work Act, and 233 under other associated legislation. For 1986-87 the number of convictions was about 530 in total. No information is collected on the average fine.

[3] Factory and agricultural inspectorates only.

[4] Factory inspectorate only.

[5] Data for the period 1 January 1986 to 31 March 1986.

[6] Data for the year commencing 1 April 1986 and provisional data for the year commencing 1 April 1987.

[7] The average includes fines of £500,000 and £250,000 against BP following three fatal accidents. Without these convictions the average fine would have been £420.

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many cases were taken, under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act, to the Crown courts during 1987; and what was the average fine.

Mr. Nicholls: The following table gives the available information for the year commencing 1 April 1987.

Proceedings instituted by the Health and Saftey Executive's factory and agricultural inspectorates, 1987-88

	Number
Informations laid	[1]30
Convictions obtained	19
Average fine per conviction (£)	[2]41,224

[1] These figures are for HSE inspectors only.

Information on prosecutions could not be obtained without incurring disproportionate cost.

[2] The average includes fines of £500,000 and £250,000 against BP following three fatal accidents. Without these convictions the average fine would have been £1,956.

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list (a) the total number and (b) the total number of resignations of factory inspectors for the years 1974 to 1987 inclusive.

Mr. Nicholls: Figures for the number of factory inspectors in post in HSE are only available from 1 July 1975 and details for resignations only readily available from 1979.

	Number of factory inspectors	Number of resignations in each year
1 July 1975	557	n/a
1 April 1976	624	n/a

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list (a) the total number of registered premises, (b) the total number of employees and (c) the total number of inspections by environmental health officers during the years 1974 to 1987, inclusive.

Mr. Nicholls: This information is only available centrally for enforcement activities by local authorities under health and safety legislation for the years 1981 to 1986-87. Estimated figures from local authority returns are set out below. The figures for premises cover those registered statutorily under Factories Act 1961, Offices, Shops and Railway Premises Act 1963, and also those collected informally by the local authorities where no registration requirement exists.

Year	Number of premises	Number of employees (millions)	Total number of visits[1]
1981	879,000	5·9	703,000
1982	874,000	6·3	667,000
1983	897,000	5·7	639,000
1984	958,000	5·8	655,000
1985	940,000	5·6	610,000
1986-87	958,000	5·8	567,000

[1] These figures refer to visits paid by all local authority officers appointed under the HSW Act (these included technical assistants, EHOs and specialist health and safety inspectors).

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how frequently environmental health officers inspect workplaces registered under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no requirement to register premises under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974, and there is no set frequency for inspection.

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will list in the Official Report (a) the total number of workplaces and (b) the total number of Health and Safety Executive workplace inspections for the years 1974 to 1987, inclusive;

(2) if he will give (a) the offences and (b) the fines for each of the 25 prosecutions taken under the 1987 Health and Safety Executive blitz on construction sites.

Mr. Nicholls: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the ages of the currently employed factory inspectors.

Mr. Nicholls: The ages of factory inspectors currently employed by the Health and Safety Executive on 30 November 1988 are as follows:

	Number
All Grades Aged (22 - 30)	95
All Grades Aged (31 - 40)	240
All Grades Aged (41 - 50)	164
All Grades Aged (51 - 60)	118
All Grades Aged (61 - 65)	2
Total	619

Employment Training

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the implications to the Lancashire Trust for Nature Conservation of the change from the Manpower Services Commission's community programme to employment training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: Following discussions between local officials of the Training Agency and representatives of the Lancashire trust for nature conservation, the trust's community programme Seaforth nature reserve project has continued into employment training and is now run by the METAL organisation. Currently all the places on the Seaforth nature reserve project are filled and local officials see no reason why the project should not continue to play a valuable role within employment training.

Employment Act 1988 (Commencement)

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has made a commencement order in respect of the remaining provisions of the Employment Act 1988.

Mr. Cope: The Employment Act 1988 (Commencement No. 2) Order has been published today. It provides that section 8 (use of funds for indemnifying unlawful conduct) and sections 19 to 21 (appointment of and assistance from the Commissioner for the Rights of Trade Union Members) will come into force on 5 December 1988. Section 15 (independent scrutiny of certain ballots and elections) and related provisions in schedule 3 to the Act will come into force on 1 February 1989.

HEALTH

Mental Illness

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he has taken to ensure that regional health authorities conform to his advice contained in the policy paper on mental illness services, Cmnd 9674, on the retention in mental illness hospitals of patients whose condition is unlikely to improve; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The responsibility for assessing and providing in-patient care rests with health authorities. This will include long-stay facilities, in-patient and out-patient work and new developments such as hospital hostels. The main method by which health authorities are held accountable for their work is by annual ministerial review. Mental illness services are included in these reviews.

"Look After Your Heart"

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the 95 health authorities which received "Look After Your Heart" grants in the first year of the campaign and the statutory authority under which the Department made such grants.

Mrs. Currie: The list is as follows:

East Cumbria
Sheffield
Hastings
Worcester
Warrington
Bolton
Newcastle
Aylesbury Vale
West Berkshire
Medway
Kettering
Riverside
South Bedfordshire
Northumberland
Macclesfield

Some health authorities received more than one grant.

The grants were made on behalf of the "Look After Your Heart" campaign by the Health Education Authority under article 3(2)(h) of the Health Education Authority (Establishment and Constitution) Order 1987.

Mentally Ill Patients

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the amounts provided in (a) the current and (b) the forthcoming year by each health region in England and Wales for bridging funds for local care of patients discharged or excluded from mental hospitals; how much, in each case, is provided for the long-term patients still to be discharged from hospitals; and how much for those already discharged from hospital; and what the amount per patient is in each case.

Mrs. Currie: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 28 November 1988 at columns 143-144. The information relating to Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Pharmaceutical Staff

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn on 29 November, if he will list those district health authorities in England from which he has received reports of vacancies for qualified pharmaceutical staff.

Mr. Mellor: We have received reports of shortages over a long period and by different people. No central record has been kept.

Rutland Memorial Hospital

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the effect of the closure of Rutland memorial hospital on the level of maternity care in the area.

Mrs. Currie: Leicestershire health authority is currently consulting on proposals to close maternity services at Rutland memorial hospital. Since these proposals could come to Ministers for a decision if agreement cannot be reached locally, it would not be appropriate for me to comment on this at present.

AIDS

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on policy towards prevalence screening for HIV.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have now completed consideration of comments arising from consultation on the report of the working group on the monitoring and surveillance of HIV infection and AIDS (the Smith report). Assisted by these comments we have reached a decision on anonymous and named screening for HIV. We are grateful to the large number of organisations which have let us have their comments.

Anonymous screening is the testing under conditions of total anonymity, for HIV infection of blood from patients who have voluntarily given it for other tests, but who have not specifically consented to an HIV test. Before any of the blood taken is tested for HIV identifying details are removed from the blood sample so as to render the test wholly anonymous. The balance of scientific opinion strongly favours such testing as the best way to obtain information about the overall prevalance of HIV infection by age and sex in the various parts of the country, and the rate at which it is spreading in the population at large. The Cox report, on short-term prediction of HIV infection and AIDS in England and Wales, which was published on 30 November, explicitly recommends anonymous testing.

The Government see no legal obstacle to such testing. From the layman's point of view, we also see no ethical objections to the testing for scientific purposes of blood samples taken property in the first place for another purpose from a patient no longer identifiable.

We are therefore inviting the Medical Research Council to bring forward proposals within three months for a programme of anonymous screening.

The Smith report recommended setting up large scale named antenatal studies, which the report believes should play an important role in identifying how far the infection has spread beyond the at-risk groups. Two such studies have been already announced and have begun in Dundee and Edinburgh. These studies are extremely important because of the higher prevalence of HIV in drug abusers in Scotland. We accept in principle the case for a programme of named studies in England as recommended in the report but believe many important matters of detail as to scale and groups to be tested need to be determined. It is of course essential that the patients in these tests are volunteers who have been advised fully before the test and will if they wish to be told the results afterwards. We are therefore asking the MRC to let us have detailed proposals on such studies within three months. Further named studies will enable comparisons to be made of the results of surveys based on anonymous testing and on named testing.

The Smith report made a number of other useful recommendations concerning epidemiological studies of particular groups and improvements to the collection and collation of data. These recommendations were generally welcomed and we are asking the MRC, public health laboratory service and other bodies concerned to take them forward. £1·7 million has been made available to the MRC in 1989-90 for research into the spread of HIV infection and AIDS including such studies. The adequacy of this sum will be kept under review.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he will take to ensure that the reporting of positive HIV test results is covered by the confidentiality provisions of paragraph 3 of the schedule to the AIDS (Control) Act 1987; and when he expects the reports under the Act to be published.

Mr. Mellor: Under the AIDS (Control) (Contents of Reports) (No. 2) Order 1988, the reporting of positive HIV test results in the reports required under the AIDS (Control) Act 1987 are covered by the confidentiality provisions of paragraph 3 of the schedule of that Act. Under section 3 of the Act, the reports have to be published by the health authority or board by which they are made. All the reports for the period April 1987 to March 1988 are now available.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the current annual cost to the national blood transfusion service of the use of existing tests to identify antibodies of the HIV-2 virus; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is (a) the number and (b) the proportion of total blood donors currently screened in respect of the HIV-2 virus; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what would be the cost to the national blood transfusion service of full-scale testing of blood from all donors in respect of the detection of HIV-2 virus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Potential blood donors are given preliminary screening by medical questionnaire. Donations from those who are accepted are routinely tested for HIV-1 and other diseases at the regional transfusion centres of the national blood transfusion service.

Since June 1988 samples of donations from donors who have visited specified West African countries where HIV-2 is more common have been referred to the public health laboratory service for testing for antibodies to HIV-2.

Of the donations collected between June and November 1988 around 4,500 (0·4 per cent.) have been tested and all have been found negative. The cost of these tests is not readily identifiable.

It is not possible to give the precise cost of testing all donations for HIV-2 because an evaluation programme to identify a suitable test for use by the NBTS has not yet been completed. However, it is estimated that testing all blood donations for antibodies to HIV-2 would cost the NBTS between £1 million and £2 million annually. The need for testing on a wider basis is kept under constant review.

Dalkon Shield

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what, to the knowledge of his Department, is the deadline for claims for compensation for women injured by the Dalkon shield;

(2) if his Department will make moneys available to regional health authorities in order that they may carry out locally based advertising campaigns alerting women to any rights they may have in regard to compensation for injuries caused by the Dalkon shield;

(3) how many British women have, to the knowledge of his Department, registered claims for compensation against the manufacturers of the Dalkon shield;

(4) if he will list in the Official Report any publicity conducted by the manufacturers of the Dalkon shield in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Currie: In the years following their voluntary withdrawal of the Dalkon shield from the United Kingdom market, the manufacturers A. H. Robins have written to doctors on a number of occasions and have placed advertisements in the women's press. In early 1986 the company conducted media publicity, in accordance with the directions of the United States bankruptcy court, to publicise the deadline of 30 April 1986 for filing claims. We understand that claims were subsequently received from over 3,000 British women.

We are aware of no subsequent court directions on publicity but we understand that a trust established in the United States has set aside compensation funds for claims received before 31 December 1988 which are successful.

Decisions about funding local advertising campaigns are for individual health authorities.

Elderly People (Deaths)

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people over 75 years died in each of the last 12 months.

Mrs. Currie: The latest available data for mortality by month of occurrence and age are shown in the table; figures for 1988 are provisional, and the later months in particular are likely to be affected by late registration.

Haemophiliacs

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made at the blood products laboratory at Elstree towards meeting the needs of haemophiliacs in England and Wales for factor VIII.

Mrs. Currie: The £60 million blood products laboratory is now producing factor VIII at record levels, but it is not yet possible to predict when we shall no longer need to import factor VIII. Yields so far are lower than expected though higher than the commercial producers', and a reappraisal of the buffer stock of plasma has shown it to be less than previously thought. Action is being taken by the central blood laboratories authority to increase yields and by the blood transfusion service to increase the collection of plasma which will lead to higher output over the next three years.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department has any information on diagnostic tests for multiple sclerosis which involve applied kinesiology and which can identify foods or other factors to which sufferers are allergic.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 1 December 1988]: Kinesiology is an alternative medical technique. There is no evidence of the value of applied kinesiology as a diagnostic test for multiple sclerosis. There are already effective diagnostic tests for this disease. There is no convincing evidence that diet has any role in precipitating or affecting the course of mutiple sclerosis. It is advisable for people with mutiple sclerosis to pay the same attention to diet and allergic reaction as other people.

Nurses (Regrading)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the money awarded for regrading to each district health authority in the Merseyside and north-west health region; if he will publish a list showing how nurses were regraded in each district health authority in the Merseyside and north-west region and the criteria used; and if he will specify (a) the amount of money allocated to Warrington health authority and the national average sum allocated to health authorities, (b) the grades awarded in the Warrington health authority and those awarded nationally, (c) the criteria for grading used by the Warrington health authority and those used nationally and (d) the national average pay rise for nurses resulting from regrading.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 29 November 1988]: For details of the outcome of regrading in individual district health authorities, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) on 1 December. All health authorities have carried out the regrading process in accordance with the grading definitions agreed in the Nursing and Midwifery Staffs Negotiation Council and the national guidance subsequently issued by my Department.

The national average increase in the pay bill arising from the nurses' pay award is 17·9 per cent including London supplements. Outside London, the average increase is 16·8 per cent.

The total allocation for the cost of the nurses pay award in England was £731 million, of which £34·9 million was allocated to Mersey regional health authority. These figures were based on regions' own estimates of the extra cost of regrading. Allocation of funds to districts is a matter for regional health authorities, and we do not hold figures centrally. For further information the hon. Member should consult the chairman of Mersey regional health authority.

ENERGY

Oil Rigs (Equipment)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many oil rigs have ceased operation as a result of the flexible hose in blow-out prevention equipment being found not to be able to withstand pressures of up to 15,000 lb per sq in; how many rigs in the North sea use this equipment; and what new advice he is issuing about use of these hoses.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Two oil rigs have ceased operation.

There are 23 oil rigs operating or currently available for use in controlled waters on the United Kingdom continental shelf and which are fitted with 15,000 pounds per square inch (psi) blowout prevention systems. The majority of these are engaged in operations where pressures above 10,000 psi will not be encountered.

My petroleum engineering division has advised oil companies using such equipment at higher pressures to define the maximum temperatures and pressures expected to occur in individual well operations and fully assess them against the flexible hose specifications. If a company is able to provide sufficient evidence to show that it is safe to continue or to resume operations I will consider giving the consent necessary under the terms and conditions of their licence. The division is also consulting interested parties with a view to issuing general guidance about the way in which this equipment should be used to ensure that it is safe at higher pressures.

Piper Alpha

Mr. McTaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he is taking to ensure that all the debris from the Piper Alpha disaster is brought to the surface as soon as possible.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Secretary of State could require the removal of debris only in the context of an abandonment programme. As I explained to the House on 30 November Official Report, columns 757 ans 764, before approving an abandonment programme subject to conditions, the Secretary of State must give the persons who submitted the programme an opportunity to make written representations about the proposed conditions (Petroleum Act 1987 section 4(3)). The conditions which the Secretary of State has proposed should be attached to his approval of the abandonment programme for Piper Alpha include: provisions that following survey, Occidental and its co-venturers shall if required by the Secretary of State move or remove from the sea bed such remains of the installations as he may direct. Given the character and size of the central debris pile and of the jacket members which it is proposed to topple, I do not think that total removal is likely to be practicable. The Secretary of State advised Occidental and its co-venturers on 1 December of the conditions that he proposed to attach to the approval of their abandonment programme.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 142

SESSION 1988–89

22nd November–2nd December 1988

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speaker's rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
